> Union insistence on having the contractor use only union men runs counter to the general theory of free determination on which the Wagner Act was based. Elections on the part of the employees are impractical, however, in an industry where the employment may be over before an election can be held, and where the employees on the next job may be a substantially different group. It would be literally impossible to maintain a union if the men had to be organized anew each time they went to a new job. The industrial union can afford the luxury of indifference as to whom the employer hires because the important thing is to organize the employees once they are on the job. The building trade union cannot operate efficiently unless it can require the employer to hire its members in the first place.
> [B]uilding trade unions [therefore] have not organized employees by techniques familiar to manufacturing. Instead, the construction unions have, in effect, organized the employers. An agreement with the employer that he will hire only union members is much the most effective way to standardize working conditions in an industry where jobs are so fluid.

[32] In Connell, the Fifth Circuit requested that the parties and their amici submit supplemental briefs concerning the pattern of bargaining practices at the time of the 1959 amendments. The union was unable to provide any information which would allow the conclusion that stranger clauses were part of the pattern and that Congress therefore intended to preserve this practice. 483 F.2d at 1182 (dissenting opinion). Such is not the case with regard to particular union clauses. The decision of the District of Columbia Circuit in Operating Engineers, supra, as well as the House and Senate Hearings, supra, note 24, suggest that Congress was well aware of the existence of these clauses.

629, 1838. Denver Building Trades had outlawed the picketing of a contractor at a jobsite in order to force it to cease doing business with a nonunion subcontractor working there. The Connell opinion refers to congressional discussion of special problems in the construction industry related both to the § 8(e) proviso and to the attempt to overrule Denver Building Trades. That discussion, according to the Court, "focused on the problems of picketing a single nonunion subcontractor on a multiemployer building project, and the close relationship between contractors and subcontractors at the jobsite." Id. 421 U.S. at 629–30, 95 S.Ct. at 1838. The Court's footnote to this statement refers to legislative history that clearly goes beyond the problem of shoulder-to-shoulder conflict between union and nonunion workers at the jobsite. The first excerpt referred to is by Senator Morse whose statement includes the following:

> The secondary boycott ban is based upon the concept to two employers—a primary and a secondary employer. The theory is that a neutral employer should not be 1319 compelled to suffer because of a labor dispute the union has with somebody else, but the theory breaks down when the two employers are "allies." Senator Taft said that the secondary boycott section "is not intended to apply to a case where the third party is, in effect, in cahoots with, or acting as a part of, the primary employer."[33] The National Labor Relations Board and the courts have failed to keep Senator Taft's concept in mind. The Board has considered subsidiaries to be separate employers. Other enterprises, substantially controlled by the same persons, have been considered separate employers, even though one manufactured a product incorporated into the finished article produced by the other.
> The case of the building and construction industy represented probably the most flagrant injustice, where a general contractor is, in effect, entirely in control of the kind of labor relations taking place on a site which he runs. He lets subcontracts based upon price, responsibility, and the ability to handle labor relations.
> He lets those contracts, very well knowing the kind of labor relations which may exist within any of the subcontractor companies. He is not acting in the dark, Mr. President. He is not innocent of any unfair labor policies on the part of a subcontractor.

105 Cong.Rec. 17880–81; II Leg.Hist. at 1425. Even where the sources cited by Connell deal with union workers at the jobsite, they reflect a number of interests of the union that affect members of its own bargaining unit as well as the members in secondary employ. The memorandum by representatives Thompson and Udall is illustrative:

> Where all the men are employed on the same project, the division into different trades or crafts, each with its own employer, must not be allowed to obscure their common interests—they work side by side and the wages and working conditions of one trade affect all the others. This situation is utterly unlike the situation in true secondary boycotts as where carpenters in Los Angeles refuse to work on nonunion doors made in Minnesota by men whose wages could not affect the wages of carpenters in Los Angeles. The illegality of such a boycott would not be affected by the amendment.
> * * * [A] reason for outlawing secondary boycotts is that they drag neutral employers into disputes in which they have no interest. Where all the employers affected are bound together in the common work of putting up a single building, none is truly neutral. The undertaking is so integral that each is affected by and can influence the conduct of the others.

105 Cong.Rec. 15541; II Leg.Hist. 1577. These materials cited by the Connell Court suggest a number of reasons why Congress may have wanted to restrict the construction industry's use of subcontracting agreements to work done on a jobsite. These sources do not limit themselves to and, indeed, place very little emphasis on, the problem of shoulder-to-shoulder friction between union and nonunion workers actually present at the jobsite.

The Connell opinion quotes National Woodwork Manufacturers, supra, to the effect that the construction industry proviso is "designed to allow agreements pertaining to certain secondary activities on the construction site because of the close community of interests there, but to ban secondary-objective agreements concerning nonjobsite work, in which respect the construction industry is no different from any other." 421 U.S. at 630, 95 S.Ct. at 1839, quoting 386 U.S. at 638–39, 87 S.Ct. at 1265. It is clear that the Connell opinion views the jobsite consideration of National Woodwork as going well beyond the problem of friction among workers,[34] because Connell next refers to some courts that have suggested that the proviso serves an "even narrower function"—the alleviation of "the frictions that may arise when union men work continuously alongside nonunion men on the same construction site." Id. 421 U.S. at 630, 95 S.Ct. at 1839, quoting Drivers Local Union No. 695 v. NLRB, 361 F.2d 547, 553 (D.C.Cir.1966). The Connell opinion does not adopt this "even narrower" reading of the proviso, and indeed finds it unnecessary to treat the matter further because in the Connell case the union did not purport to represent any of the interests served by the proviso. 421 U.S. at 631, 95 S.Ct. at 1839.[35]

[33] Senator Taft's remarks were part of a colloquy with Senator Ives on June 30, 1949, 95 Cong.Record 8709. Senator Taft was referring to the garment industry, but he cited for his proposition a case that involved the construction industry: Douds v. Metropolitan Federation of Architects, Engineers, Chemists & Technicians, Local 231, (Project Engineering Co.), 75 F. Supp. 672 (S.D.N.Y. 1948).

We believe that it would do some violence to the language of the Connell opinion to adopt the "even narrower" view of the construction industry proviso which the Court in Connell did not represent to be its own. Yet this consequence would follow from restricting the applicability of subcontractor agreements to those instances where shoulder-to-shoulder jobsite friction can occur. Instead, we think that it is more in accord with the language of Connell to permit those agreements to apply to any jobsite at which an employer with a collective bargaining relationship with the union is a contractor.

We concede that the language of the Connell opinion dealing with congressional antagonism to "top-down organizing" may well lean in a direction contrary to our views. We think it is countered by Connell's recognition of other vital concerns of collective bargaining in the construction industry reflected in the community of interest at the jobsite. There is some "top-down organizing" effect in any subcontracting agreement, including those which all parties must admit would be valid and within the proviso. When there are union workers on the job next to nonunion workers, the enforcement of a subcontracting clause is still likely to have a top-down organizing effect. The answer to this point is simply that Congress recognized that the community of interests on the jobsite justified the top-down organizational consequences that may attend the protection of legitimate collective bargaining objectives there. The proviso is, after all, an exception to the general thrust of the 1959 amendments.[36]

The Connell opinion's condemnation of the "unlimited" top-down organizing weapon with which it was confronted must be read in the context of the applicable factual and statutory framework. Because the union in Connell disclaimed any interest in organizing or representing Connell's employees, its picketing was not limited to the 30 days established for organizational picketing uner § 8(b)(7). It could therefore picket indefinitely to obtain its objective of a subcontracting agreement covering all subcontracting by Connell.

[34] Indeed, National Woodwork contains a footnote reference succeeding the discussion of the "close community of interests" on the jobsite. 386 U.S. at 639 n. 32, 87 S.Ct. at 1265 n. 32. That footnote refers to Essex County and Vicinity District Council of Carpenters and Millwrights v. NLRB, 332 F.2d 636 (3d Cir. 1964), which does deal with shoulder-to-shoulder friction. It also refers, however, to a Yale Law Journal Comment. The Impact of the Taft-Hartley Act on the Building and Construction Industry, 60 Yale L.J. 673, 684–89 (1951), which discusses not only job-site friction but also the additional considerations of interchangeability of workers, short time span, flexible contracting arrangements, and numerous other interests that a union representing a primary group of employees may have in the employment arrangements of other employees at the jobsite.

[35] Essentially the same situation was dealt with by this court in ACCO Construction Equipment, Inc. v. NLRB, 511 F.2d 848 (9th Cir. 1975). ACCO does contain language tending to restrict the jobsite proviso to the goals of avoiding shoulder-to-shoulder friction, but we do not read that as essential to its decision. ACCO was written before Connell and it dealt with what were essentially off-site workers who only occasionally worked on-site. They and their employers were not at all involved in the "community of interest" which are emphasized in National Woodwork, Connell, and this opinion. The union's objectives in organizing such off-site workers were indirect and wholly secondary; the primary interests of workers in the bargaining unit at the jobsite could not be directly affected by, and were not interchangeable with, the off-site workers.

[36] Because the proviso is an exception to the 1959 amendments, we cannot accept the test for its interpretation adopted at the conclusion of the dissent. The issue is not which interpretation is the more faithful to Congress' overall goal in the 1959 amendments of curbing "top-down" organizing. Instead, the question is which interpretation best effectuates Congress' accommodation of the conflicting objectives of curbing "top-down" organizing and of protecting collective bargaining under the peculiar conditions of the construction industry.

If the subcontractor clause were held to be legitimate, there would be no limit at all to the coercive force the union could apply. The decision in Connell solved this problem by holding that the subcontracting agreement was an unlawful goal when it was sought outside of a collective bargaining context.

The situation is quite different when a union seeks a subcontractor clause in the context of a collective bargaining relationship. In that situation, the union's coercive force is limited. If the clause is sought in the course of organizational or recognitional picketing, that picketing will be subject to the restrictions of § 8(b)(7). If the union already represents the contractor's employees, the employer may resist any attempts to secure a subcontractor agreement by asserting its own bargaining position and presenting its own demands. The existence of a collective bargaining relationship therefore avoids the "unlimited" nature of the organizational tool involved in Connell, where a stranger contractor was powerless to resist unlimited coercion by any means other than signing the demanded subcontractor agreement.

Finally, in summarizing the proviso's effect, the Connell Court stated:

> [W]e think its authorization extends only to agreements in the context of collective bargaining relationships and, in light of congressional references to the Denver Building Trades problem, possibly to common-situs relationships on particular jobsites as well.

421 U.S. at 633, 95 S.Ct. at 1840. While it might be susceptible to another reading, we interpret this language to mean that the existence of a collective bargaining relationship clearly brings a union signatory subcontracting agreement within the proviso to § 8(e) and that in the absence of a collective bargaining relationship, it is possible that such an agreement may be valid where the union actually has workers on the job that may be threatened with shoulder-to-shoulder friction.[37] We consequently believe that the quoted summary supports our conclusion that Connell does not deny the protection of the proviso to the subcontractor agreements in the present cases.

(B) Practical Consequences.

Our reading of Connell to permit broad subcontracting clauses within a collective bargaining relationship not only accords with the apparent thrust of the legislative history, it is supported by the severe practical limitations attending a contrary conclusion. Limitation of subcontracting agreements to sites where there may be shoulder-to-shoulder conflict between union and nonunion workers presents immense practical problems. If unions are confined to negotiaating these agreements only when they find that there are union employees on the jobsite, then they must inventory and negotiate over an incredible number of jobsites. AGC itself represents some 200 general contractors. The number of jobsites at which they contract is unquestionably a multiple of that figure. Jobsite by jobsite negotiation of subcontracting agreements would seem burdensome to the point of impossibility. It also appears to run counter to Congress's accommodation in § 8(f) to the necessity in the industry of entering long term agreements applying to employees not yet hired for jobs not yet in existence. S.Rep.No. 187, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 28 (1959); I Leg.Hist. 424.

Even if general subcontracting agreements are permitted to be negotiated wholesale and then are triggered only when union workers appear on the job, the enforcement problems remain severe. The transitory nature of employment at each jobsite, as well as the difficulty of defining the applicable time span during which jobsite conflict is threatened, present substantial problems.[38] If a rule is adopted [37] Our reading of the quoted language in Connell as presenting disjunctive alternatives rather than conjunctive and cumulative requirements is supported by the District of Columbia Circuit and probably by the Third Circuit. Donald Schriver, Inc., supra; Larry V. Muko, Inc. v. Southwestern Pennsylvania Building & Construction Trades Council, 609 F.2d 1368, 1374-75 (3d Cir. 1979) (en banc). Lower courts and commentators have varied in their approach to the underlying issue. See Landscape Specialties, Inc. v. Laborers' International Union, Local 806, 477 F.Supp. 17 (C.D.Cal. 1979); Long v. Floorcraft Carpet Co., 82 Labor cases ¶ 10,044 (D.OR. 1977); St. Antoine, supra, 62 Va.L.Rev. at 619; Janofsky & Hay, Connell—Consistent with Past, Indicative of Future, Proceedings of N.Y.U. Twenty-Ninth Annual Conference on Labor 3, 21-22 (1976).

Normally, a union without a collective bargaining relationship that seeks a subcontracting clause will be pursing no interest that could impact upon its primary representation of anyone. The rare exception might occur when the union has its own employees working for some other employer on the jobsite and shoulder-to-shoulder friction threatens.

[38] The dissent makes the point that even under our decision, unions must police jobsites to ensure compliance with subcontractor clauses. We believe that it is a more manageable task, however, to police jobsites to that the appearance of any union worker on the job triggers subcontracting agreements covering the entire project, it presents an especially strong incentive for anti-union discrimination by employers.

We are presented, then, with a number of practical and theoretical considerations supporting our decision that the present subcontracting agreements, arrived at in the context of collective bargaining relationships, are within the proviso of § 8(e). First, there are overwhelming practical difficulties in confining the subcontractor agreements to jobsites where actual union-nonunion or interunion conflict occurs among workers. Second, the legislative history as well as the actual conditions existing in the construction industry militate in favor of broad subcontractor clauses in collective bargaining agreements. Third, the Connell decision, which admittedly has language that might point to either result, may fairly be read to support the validity of subcontracting clauses when there is a collective bargaining relationship, regardless of the presence or absence of union workers at the jobsite.

Given these considerations, we reject a narrow interpretation of the proviso which will substantially change the existing practice in the industry. In addition, we believe that due regard should be given to the view of the National Labor Relations Board supporting these agreements.[39] It is true that the position of the agency has not been an unwavering one,[40] but the Board's articulation of current labor policy is undoubtedly entitled to weight in our decision.

VI.

Additional Issues.

It is contended by AGC that even if the construction industry proviso authorizes clauses requiring subcontractors to have agreements with unions in general, it does not permit clauses to require a collective bargaining agreement with a particular union. We note, however, that nothing in the language of the § 8(e) proviso suggests such a limitation, even though "particular-union" clauses were a part of industry practice at the time of its enactment. Two months prior to the creation of the proviso, the District of Columbia Circuit upheld a "particular-union" subcontractor agreement in a decision that was submitted to the House committee considering the 1959 amendments. Operating Engineers Local Union No. 3 v. NLRB, supra; 2 House Hearings 803–07. In the light of this history, we do not feel free to find in the proviso a limitation not written there by Congress. We are joined in this conclusion by the District of Columbia Circuit in Donald Shriver, Inc. v. NLRB, supra, 635 F.2d at 884–886. We also note that prohibition of "particular-union" subcontractor clauses would defeat at least some of the interests that we earlier found to be served by the construction industry proviso. One such interest is that of a union in protecting the wages and benefits of its members in the primary bargaining unit who may later work for subcontractors. That concern is shared by no other union, and is best served by a "particular-union" clause.

It is next contended, this time by Woelke, that even if a subcontractor agreement is protected by the construction industry proviso, it is an unfair labor practice for a union to picket or strike in order to induce a contractor to enter such an agreement. The legislative history of the 1959 amendments is in conflict on this point.[41] The ensure that subcontractors working there have agreements with the policing union than it is to determine whether any union worker has been working on the jobsite at any time, or perhaps at any time when that worker's presence might lead to jobsite friction.

Senator Goldwater, one of the Senate conferees, and the man who may have been most responsible for the Landrum-Griffin Amendments, see 105 Cong.Rec. 15516, II Leg.Hist. 1552 (statement of Rep. Madden), said actual wording of § 8(b)(4)(ii)(A), however, prohibits coercion of any person "to enter into any agreement which is prohibited by [§ 8(e)]." [42] The negative implication of this provision is surely that picketing or striking to induce entry into an agreement protected by the proviso to § 8(e) is lawful.

After the 1959 amendments, the Board originally took the position that such agreements had to be voluntarily entered, but its position was uniformly rejected by this and other courts of appeals. Construction Production & Maintenance Laborers Union, Local 383 v. NLRB (Colson & Stevens Construction Co.), 323 F.2d 422 (9th Cir. 1963); Orange Belt District Council of Painters No. 48 v. NLRB, 328 F.2d 534, 537 (D.C.Cir. 1964); Essex County and Vicinity District Council of Carpenters and Millwrights v. NLRB, 332 F.2d 636 (3d Cir. 1964). The Board subsequently acquiesced in the courts' view. Northeastern Indiana Building & Construction Council, 148 N.L.R.B. 854 (1964), remanded on other grounds, 352 F.2d 696 (D.C.Cir. 1965). We see no reason to disturb the present law and to read into the Act a limitation that runs counter to the suggestion of its plain words. Nor do we accept the contention that picketing or striking to obtain a subcontractor agreement violates the § 7 rights of employees of subcontractors; they are no more affected by a subcontractor agreement achieved by picketing than by one voluntarily entered.

The final issue concerns the effect of the provision in the AGC contract that permits each party to resort to self-help when the other party does not comply with an arbitration decision made pursuant to the grievance procedure.[43] The Board concluded that these provisions authorized picketing or strikes to enforce the subcontractor agreement, and held that the contract was consequently unlawful. The rule that picketing or strikes may not be used to enforce subcontractor agreements arises from the fact that the 1959 amendments exempted the construction industry from § 8(e)'s prohibition against secondary boycott agreements, but did not exempt it from § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B), which forbids economic coercion to enforce such a boycott. The legislative history makes clear Congress's intent that subcontractor clauses entered pursuant to § 8(e) were to be enforced judicially rather than by self-help,[44] and this court has followed that view. NLRB v. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 405 F.2d 159, 163–64 (9th Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 395 U.S. 921, 89 S.Ct. 1772, 23 L.Ed.2d 237 (1969). We have also held that such clauses may be enforced by arbitration. La Mirada Trucking, Inc. v. Teamsters Local Union 166, 538 F.2d 286 (9th Cir. 1976).

Engineers argue, without pressing the point strongly, that self-help to enforce an arbitation award that in turn enforces a subcontractor agreement is not unlawful. The picketing or strike, according to the Union, is simply enforcing the arbitration award and not the underlying agreement. We believe that acceptance of this contention would too easily circumvent the clear intent of Congress and would do violence to the plain words of § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B). Nor can we accept the suggestion of the Union that the AGC agreement must be construed to limit the self-help clause to self-help which is determined to be lawful. We must take the agreement to mean what it says. Operating Engineers, Local No. 701 v. NLRB, 578 F.2d 841, 842 (9th Cir. 1978); Donald Schriver, Inc. v. NLRB, supra, slip op. at 57–58.

VII.

Conclusion.

We find that provisions in a collective bargaining agreement forbidding the signatory employer to subcontract work at a contruction site to firms that do not have a contract with the signatory union are within § 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, but are protected by the construction industry proviso to that section. They need not be limited to jobsites presenting the possibility of conflict between union and nonunion workers. We also find that unions may picket or strike to induce employ-

Sneed, Circuit Judge (with whom Choy, Anderson and Farris, Circuit Judges, concur) dissenting: As with many legal issues, where one ends up in this case depends upon where one starts. While I have no disagreement with the court's holding that union signatory clauses are secondary and within the scope of section 8(e), I respectfully dissent from its holding that such clauses are invariably within the construction industry proviso to section 8(e) when a collective bargaining relationship exists between the employer and the union seeking the clause. The majority reaches its conclusion by commencing with the view that the construction industry presents unique problems in labor relations that require the legitimation of union signatory clauses. Although admitting that the legislative history is not compelling, the court finds that legitimation was provided by the construction industry proviso. My starting point, on the other hand, is with Connell Construction Co. v. Plumbers & Steamfitters Local 100, 421 U.S. 616, 95 S.Ct. 1830, 44 L.Ed.2d 418 (1975), and its concern with the "top-down" organizing effect of union signatory clauses. This concern led the panel before which this case was heard originally to hold as follows:

> "We hold that the construction industry proviso extends shelter only when a collective bargaining relationship exists and even then only when the employer or his subcontractor has employees who are members of the signatory union at work at some time at the jobsite at which the employer wishes to engage a nonunion subcontractor." Pacific Northwest Chapter of the Associated Builders & Contractors, Inc. v. NLRB, 609 F.2d 1341, 1347 (9th Cir. 1979).

I would adhere to that holding and to the reasons given by the panel therefor. Id. at 1348–50.

The court rejects the panel's result because it is said to represent an "even narrower" view of the construction industry proviso than that adopted by the Supreme Court in Connell. 654 F.2d 1320. Alleviation of "the frictions that may arise when union men work continuously alongside nonunion men on the same construction site," 421 U.S. at 630, 95 S.Ct. at 1839, is said not to have been a concern of the Supreme Court in Connell because in that case "the union did not purport to represent any of the interests served by the proviso." 654 F.2d 1320. Presumably this is because there was no collective bargaining agreement between the employer and union in that case.

As I see it, the crucial language in Connell is as follows:

> "We therefore hold that this agreement, which is outside the context of a collective-bargaining relationship and not restricted to a particular jobsite, but which nonetheless obligates Connell to subcontract work only to firms that have a contract with Local 100, may be the basis of a federal antitrust suit because it has a potential for restraining competition in the business market in ways that would not follow naturally from elimination of competition over wages and working conditions." 421 U.S. at 635, 95 S.Ct. at 1841.

This language, as the majority acknowledges, is not entirely unambiguous. It is, however, not inconsistent with the panel's holding as set out above; and, more importantly, that holding is more empathetic with Connell's concern with the "top-down" organizing effect of union signatory clauses than is that of the majority.

It is true, as the majority states, that any union signatory clause has some "top-down" organizing effect. The difference between the panel's holding and that of the en banc court lies in the scope of this effect. The en banc court permits a clause that forbids subcontracting work covered by the collective bargaining agreement to any firm not having a contract with the signatory union. It matters not whether any of the employees of the signatory employer, who are members of the signatory union, are employed on the jobsite. It matters not that, in the absence of the union signatory clause, the work could have been subcontracted to a firm which, even though adhering to union standards governing wages and working conditions, was more efficient than its competitors.

It must be acknowledged that the panel's holding would not greatly diminish the "top-down" organizing effect of the union signatory clause. It would permit the choice of the more efficient firm only when to do so would entail no jobsite friction between members of the signatory union and workers performing work covered by the collective bargaining agreement. Thus, a provision in the agreement precluding subcontracting of all the covered work would prevent choice of the more efficient firm and thus provide a substantial "top-down" organizing effect. A clause prohibiting subcontracting is permissible. National Woodwork Manufacturers Association v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612, 644–46, 87 S.Ct. 1250, 1268–69, 18 L.Ed.2d 357 (1967); see also Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 85 S.Ct. 398, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964); NLRB v. Johnson, 368 F.2d 549 (9th Cir. 1966). However, the panel's holding would afford an opportunity by which an employer could accept a union signatory clause without sacrificing all right to choose the more efficient subcontractor. Preservation of this opportunity would be more consistent with the primary concern of Connell than is the position of the en banc court. I doubt that the en banc court seriously contends otherwise. It does believe that the preservation of this opportunity would provide a "strong incentive for anti-union discrimination by employers." 654 F.2d 1322. I am dubious. Under either view an anti-union employer will strive to avoid a union signatory clause. That an employer under the panel's view would have a limited opportunity to subcontract to a firm not having an agreement with the signatory union is not likely to make it more anti-union.

I agree with the en banc court that the legislative history of the construction industry proviso is not conclusive. We have previously considered the legislative history of the proviso. ACCO Construction Equipment, Inc. V. NLRB, 511 F.2d 848, 851 (9th Cir. 1975). In surveying the legislative history, we concluded that the dominant motive of Congress in adopting the proviso was to permit agreements that aimed at eliminating jobsite friction between union and nonunion workers. Id. at 851; accord, Drivers Local 695 v. NLRB, 361 F.2d 547, 553 (D.C.Cir.1966); Essex County District Council of Carpenters v. NLRB, 332 F.2d 636, 640 (3d Cir. 1964). And the National Labor Relations Board previously believed: "[T]he 8(e) proviso was intended to prevent labor strife among nonunion and union employees at the same jobsite." International Union of Operating Engineers, Locals 542, 542-A and 542-B, 216 N.L.R.B. 408, 409 (1975), enforced, 532 F.2d 902 (3d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1072, 97 S.Ct. 808, 50 L.Ed.2d 789 (1977). I see no reason to depart from our earlier analysis of the purpose of the priviso.

Admittedly, Senator Kennedy thought that the construction industry proviso would permit subcontracting clauses such as those challenged in these cases. Others argued that the proviso was intended to permit agreements not to use prefabricated pipe unless union workers did the fabricating. 105 Cong.Rec. 19785–86, 19809 (1959); II Leg.Hist. 1815–16 (extension of remarks of Senator McNamara and Representative Thompson); contra 105 Cong.Rec. 20004–05 (1959); II Leg.Hist. 1861 (extension remarks of Representative Kearns). But neither of these purposes were clearly understood as the reason for the proviso. As Connell and ACCO concluded, the legislative history supports the conclusion that most congressmen thought the proviso was intended to address the problem of jobsite friction. See, e.g., I Leg.Hist. 82 (message from President Eisenhower to Congress); 105 Cong.Rec. 15852, II Leg.Hist. 1684 (statement of Congressman Goodell); 105 Cong.Rec. 17333–34, II Leg.Hist. 1383–84 (proposed instructions for Senate conferees). Also, as I read the excerpt from the memorandum by Representatives Thompson and Udall quoted by the en banc court, 654 F.2d 1319, it too strongly supports the conclusion that the proviso was aimed at the jobsite friction problem. The references to employees working "side by side" on a "single building" so indicate. 105 Cong.Rec. 15541 (1959); II Leg.Hist. 1577.

The en banc court notes that some subcontractor clauses similar to those challenged in these cases existed in 1959. Since they conclude that the Congress intended to preserve the law relating to the construction industry as it then existed, the court argues that Congress intended that the proviso would protect broad subcontractor clauses. I believe this reasoning gives far too much weight to the bar reference to the pattern of collective bargaining referred to in the Committee Report. See Connell, supra, 421 U.S. at 628–29, 95 S.Ct at 1838. Furthermore, the lawfulness and permissible scope of subcontractor agreements had not been conclusively determined in 1959. And the proviso clearly changed the law by explicitly limiting its protection to jobsite work. That limitation at least partially overruled the Sand Door case, Local 1976, United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. NLRB, 357 U.S. 93, 78 S.Ct. 1011, 2 L.Ed.2 1186 (1958). Thus the most that can be said is that Congress intended to preserve the existing law within the scope of the proviso. That proposition, however, begs rather than answers the question of what the proper scope of the proviso is. That is what this case is about. Our decision, whatever it is, can draw but little comfort from the legislative history.

The majority also argues that practical considerations favor the result they reach. But the practical problems of following the panel's decision would not have been severe. If broad subcontractor clauses are approved, unions must still police construction sites to ensure compliance. No more is required by a rule limiting subcontractor clauses to jobsites at which members of the signatory union are employed. The serious practical problems raised by the majority would arise only if subcontractor clauses were required to be renegotiated on a jobsite by jobsite basis, but that would not be required by the panel's interpretation of the proviso.

Thus, we come to the nub of the matter. Which interpretation of the proviso is more faithful to curbing "top-down" organizing, which, it must be remembered, was Congress's objective in adopting the 1959 Act which included section 8(e). Connell, supra, 421 U.S. At 632–33, 95 S.Ct. at 1840. The holding of the panel gets my nod.[1]

FARRIS, Circuit Judge with whom CHOY and J. BLAINE ANDERSON, Circuit Judges, join, dissenting: I join Judge Sneed's dissent in all respects and add some comments regarding the scope of the construction industry proviso.

The collective bargaining agreements here prohibit signatory general contractors from subcontracting any work covered by the agreement at any construction site to nonsignatory contracts. These agreements violate subsection 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(e) (1976), unless they are permitted under the construction industry proviso, which allows "agreement between a labor organization and an employer in the construction industry relating to the contracting or subcontracting of work to be done at the site of the construction * * *." Id. The precise issue here is whether the proviso legalizes agreements that limit subcontracting at sites where the employer has not employees represented by the union. The majority holds that it does. I disagree.

In Connell Construction Co. v. Plumbers Local 100, 421 U.S. 616, 95 S.Ct. 1830, 44 L.Ed.2d 418 (1975), the Supreme Court concluded that the construction industry proviso did not authorize a construction industry employer and a union not representing its employees to agree to limit the employer's right to subcontract. Finding no congressional purpose in extending the proviso to legalize agreements between employers and "stranger" unions, the Court narrowly construed the proviso to limit its scope "to agreements in the context of collective-bargaining relationships and * * * possibly to common-situs relationships on particular jobsites as well." Id. at 633, 95 S.Ct. at 1840.

Here, the three judge panel concluded that the proviso was designed to deal with the special problem of jobsite friction in the construction industry. It read the proviso to allow a collective bargaining agreement to restrict an employer's subcontracting at the jobsite where it employs the union's members. The majority asserts that another purpose—maintenance of contract standards in the industry—requires that the proviso be read to allow restrictions on the use of nonsignatory subcontractors at any jobsite. See also Donald Shriver, Inc. v. NLRB, No. 78-2177, slip op. at 43–47 & n.29 (D.C. Cir. Oct. 20, 1980). I agree that a congressional purpose in addition to reduction of jobsite friction may require a broader scope for the proviso, but I do not agree that maintenance of contract standards in the industry is such a purpose. The Court in Connell read the proviso to allow restraints in the context of collective bargaining relationships. That does not mean that when a relationship exists any restraint can be imposed; rather, the relationship only has a bearing on the legality of the restraint when the relationship and the restraint are related. It is not sufficient that the restraint serves the interest of workers in the industry generally. It must serve the interests of the workers represented by the union in the course of their employment by the employer.

[1] Because the panel concluded that the broad subcontractor clause in the AGC agreement violated section 8(e), it did not address the lawfulness of the agreement's self-help enforcement provision. 609 F.2d at 1351. I agree with the majority of this en banc court that the self-help enforcement provision must be interpreted to mean what it says and that Congress clearly intended that subcontractor clauses were to be enforced judicially rather than by strikes or picketing. Therefore, I agree that the self-help clause in the AGC contract is invalid.

The only way the all-jobsite restraints here can serve the interests of these workers is by preventing loss of work due to subcontracting. This problem, however, is resolved by a common, primary restraint: the union standards clause. Such clauses effectively insulate workers from falling industry standards by removing the incentive to subcontract. At the same time they avoid many of the evils inherent in the restraints here. In my view the construction industry proviso is not concerned with maintenance of contract standards. See generally Archibald Cox, Derek Bok & Robert Gorman, Cases and Materials on Labor Law 892–95 (8th ed. 1977) (while garment industry proviso was concerned with maintenance of industry standards, construction industry proviso was concerned with jobsite friction). The proviso should not be read to permit restraints which extend to jobsites where no unit employees are present and which are therefore unrelated to reduction of jobsite friction.

NLRB v. Pizza Pizzaz, Inc., d/b/a Jacob Wirth Restaurant

646 F.2d 706 (1st Cir.), April 17, 1981—248 NLRB 191

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Coffin, Chief Judge, Aldrich and Winter,* Circuit Judges

Per Curiam: Adopting the findings of the administrative law judge, the National Labor Relations Board held that respondent Pizza Pizzaz, Inc., a Massachusetts corporation doing business as Jacob Wirth Restaurant, violated §§ 8(a)(1) & (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) & (3), by threatening and then discharging two employees as a result of their union activities. The Board petitions for enforcement of its order. Respondent resists enforcement, contending first that the Board improperly exercised jurisdiction in this case, and second that the Board's finding of a violation of §§ 8(a)(1) & (3) is not supported by substantial evidence. We reject both contentions and grant enforcement.

I.

Section 10(a) of the National Labor Relations Act grants jurisdiction to the Board "to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice * * * affecting commerce." 29 U.S.C. § 160(a). In enacting § 10(a), Congress vested the Board with the widest jurisdiction constitutionally permissible under the commerce clause. NLRB v. Reliance Fuel Oil Corp., 371 U.S. 224, 226, 83 S.Ct. 312, 313, 9 L.Ed.2d 279 (1963). It is undisputed that the Board has acted within its statutorily authorized power in this case.

However, in cases involving retail establishments, the Board has imposed upon itself a discretionary jurisdictional standard, requiring that an employer's gross volume of business total at least $500,000 per year. Carolina Supplies & Cement Co., 122 N.L.R.B. 88 (1958). Pizza Pizzaz has annual gross sales in excess of only $140,000. However, it is the sole stockholder of 708 Jacob Wirth, another Massachusetts corporation, which has sales in its own right of more than $380,000. The Board determined that it had jurisdiction in this case by finding that the two restaurant corporations were a single employer for jurisdictional purposes. The restaurants attack that finding.

We decline to disturb the Board's determination that Pizza Pizzaz and Jacob Wirth are a single employer. "The Board's conclusion that two corporations constitute a 'single employer' is 'essentially a factual one' and not to be disturbed provided substantial evidence in the record supports the Board's findings." NLRB v. C. K. Smith & Co., Inc., 569 F.2d 162, 164 (1 Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 957, 98 S.Ct. 3070, 57 L.Ed.2d 1122 (1978), quoting NLRB v. R. L. Sweet Lumber Co., 515 F.2d 785, 793 (10 Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 986, 96 S.Ct. 393, 46 L.Ed.2d 302 (1975). To direct that factual inquiry, we have enumerated four "controlling criteria" for determining whether two or more business entities are a single employer: "interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations and common ownership." Id., quoting Radio Technicians Local 1264 v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc., 380 U.S. 255, 85 S.Ct. 876, 13 L.Ed.2d 789 (1965).

*Of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, sitting by designation.

Common ownership is undisputed. Pizza Pizzaz is a corporation operating a fast food restaurant and is also the sole stockholder of Jacob Wirth. Interrelation of the restaurants' operations is minimal, although both serve a specially-made product, Jacob Wirth's Dark Beer, and the two corporations file a consolidated tax return.

Although each restaurant has its own manager, Sam Schwartz at Pizza Pizzaz and Robert McManus at Jacob Wirth, control over the two ultimately rests with a single individual, Richard Fallon, who is president of Pizza Pizzaz, vice-president and treasurer of Wirth, and general manager of both establishments. Fallon handles all labor relations matters. In the past he has fired a manager of Jacob Wirth for refusing to obey his orders with respect to the rehiring of an employee. Fallon testified that he consults with both Schwartz and McManus with regard to wages and the hiring and firing of personnel. He has participated in grievance proceedings involving Jacob Wirth employees and, at the time of the alleged violations, was conducting negotiations with the union regarding a collective bargaining agreement for Wirth's employees. Because Pizza Pizzaz employs only Schwartz and three members of his family, Fallon's control over labor relations at that establishment has been limited to consultations with Schwartz regarding wages and hours. In short, although the degree to which respondent's operations fulfill some of the C. K. Smith criteria may be debatable, the record provides substantial evidence from which the Board could rationally draw the conclusion that the two restaurants are a single employer.

Moreover, even if the Board erred in this factual conclusion, we should not refuse to enforce the Board's order for want of jurisdiction:

> Where statutory jurisdiction exists . . . the Board has the administrative discretion to disregard its own self-imposed jurisdictional yardstick * * *
> When the Board disregards its own self-imposed jurisdictional guidelines in asserting jurisdiction on an ad hoc basis, the courts should not intervene unless compelled to do so by extraordinary circumstances, or unless the Board has abused its discretion.

NLRB v. Erlich's 814, Inc., 577 F.2d 68, 71 (8 Cir. 1978) (citations omitted). Accord, NLRB v. Okla-Inn, 488 F.2d 498, 500 (10 Cir. 1973); Glen Manor Home for Jewish Aged v. NLRB, 474 F.2d 1145, 1149 (6 Cir.), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 826, 94 S.Ct. 130, 38 L.Ed.2d 59 (1973). We find nothing extraordinary in this case that would justify a refusal to support the Board's exercise of jurisdiction.

II.

The Board found that respondent violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act in threatening Angelo Pappas, Jr. and Mohamed Zahran, both waiters at Jacob Wirth, as a result of their union activity. Respondent does not challenge that finding. Respondent does attack the Board's finding that it violated § 8(a)(3) of the Act in firing Pappas and Zahran. We conclude that substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the Board's conclusion.

We find that the Board initially demonstrated "'significant' improper motivation" for the discharge. See, e. g., Statler Industries v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 902 (1st Cir. 1981). Because respondent does not contest the finding of a § 8(a)(1) violation, we accept as undisputed the finding of the administrative law judge that, two days before the discharge, Wirth's manager McManus warned Pappas in the presence of several waiters, "if you think you're going to bust my ass with the union, I got news for you—don't try it." Likewise, we accept the finding that McManus approached Zahran that same day and asked, referring to Pappas and Zahran, "what you two people are trying to do to me?" In that same conversation, as the administrative law judge found, McManus told Zahran to convey to Pappas the warning that, if Pappas persisted in his union activity, McManus would "break his legs." All of these statements, the accuracy of which respondent does not now contest, provide more than ample basis for the Board's finding that McManus knew of the union activity of Zahran and Pappas and acted to stop it when he discharged both men shortly after these conversations.

We also agree with the Board that respondent failed "to prove that it had a good reason, sufficient in itself, to produce the discharge." See, e. g., id. Respondent argues that the Board failed to give adequate consideration to the employer's justification for the firings: i. e., that Pappas and Zahran were among the restaurant's most unproductive workers. The administrative law judge discounted this explanation primarily because respondent failed to offer as evidence the cash register records which purportedly would demonstrate the inefficiency of the two employees. Respondent argues that these records were not submitted because Pappas and Zahran admitted their low productivity. However, even if the administrative law judge drew an improper inference from respondent's failure to produce the records, ample evidence remains to support the Board's decision to reject respondent's purported justification. Pappas and Zahran both testified that their low productivity resulted from their assignment to the less desirable tables in the restaurant. Pappas' father, a respected, long-time employee at Jacob Wirth, corroborated this explanation in his testimony.

Respondent asserts that McManus decided to fire Pappas and Zahran because of low productivity several days before making threats to both employees regarding union activity. Respondent's brief places great weight upon the fact that four other employees were fired for inefficiency or misconduct at the same time Pappas and Zahran were discharged. Also, respondent points out, an advertisement seeking new waiters was printed in the Boston Globe on the morning of August 5, 1978, the day McManus first warned Pappas about union activity.

The administrative law judge considered this evidence and found it insufficient to account for the discharges. The evidence shows only that plans probably were made prior to August 5 to fire some employees for inefficiency. However, respondent's failure to substantiate its claim that Pappas and Zahran fell within that category provided ample grounds for the administrative law judge to reject the employer's proffered justification. Moreover, as the Board argues, it seems extremely unlikely that McManus, having decided to fire Pappas for cause, would publicly threaten him about union activity soon thereafter.

ENFORCEMENT GRANTED.

Warehouse Union, Local 860, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America v. NLRB

652 F.2d 1022 (D.C. Cir.), April 17, 1981—236 NLRB 844

On petition to review Board Order

Before MCGOWAN, Chief Judge, and ROBINSON, Circuit Judge, and PARKER,* United States District Judge for the District of Columbia

BARRINGTON D. PARKER, District Judge: The National Labor Relations Board found that the petitioner Warehouse Union, Local 860 (Union or Local 860), violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., by failing to provide fair representation to certain workers during contract bargaining negotiations with the employer Emporium.[1] Specifically, the Board found that the Union violated § 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act and committed an unfair labor practice by failing to advise the membership of the clerical unit, which it represented, or prior threat of job loss by the employer if the wage increases demanded during negotiations were granted. Local 860 represented the clerical unit throughout the contract negotiations.

The Warehouse Union petitioned the Court to review and set aside the Board order. The Board has filed a cross-application requesting enforcement of its order. For the reasons set out below we sustain the Board's findings and determination that the Union violated the Act.

BACKGROUND

The factual findings of the administrative law judge (law judge) were adopted by the Board and are briefly summarized. Warehouse Union, Local 860, represented the warehouseman employed by the Emporium, a California retail sales corporation. Local 860 agreed to represent a unit of thirteen clericals which had been transfered to its jurisdicition in 1972. Twelve of these thirteen clericals were women. In the summer of 1976, Local 860 entered into negotiations with Emporium concerning a renewed contract for 1976–1979. Before the negotiations commenced, the clerical employees alerted the Union that they wanted a wage increase equal to that demanded by the warehousemen, namely, a 70-cent increase.

*Sitting by designation pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 292(a).

[1] The Board's opinion and order are reported at 236 N.L.R.B. 844 (1978).

Early in the negotiations, the Union representatives presented the wage demand to the employer. The negotiators for Emporium made it clear that such proposal was unacceptable and asserted flatly that such wages would result in the elimination of the entire clerical unit. Such unequivocal statements were made by the employer's representatives several times during the course of the negotiations. There was testimony that in response to such statements the Union representatives replied that they "didn't want the broads in the first place" but now they were stuck with them. Joint Appendix, (J.A.) at 7. With the knowledge of these statements, the Union representatives persisted in demanding the increase without consulting the clericals whom they represented.

Ultimately the wage increase was granted and the employees voted to accept the new contract. Thereafter, on October 15, Emporium terminated the clerical operation and permanently laid off the employees in that unit.

ANALYSIS

The standard of fair representation required of a unioin was enunciated by the Supreme Court in Vaca v. Slipes, 386 U.S. 171, 177, 87 S.Ct. 903, 909, 17 L.Ed.2d 842 (1967) and subsequently followed by this circuit, e.g., Branch 6000, National Association of Letter Carriers v. N.L.R.B., 595 F.2d 808, 811 (D.C.Cir.1979); International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local No. 310 v. N.L.R.B. 587 F.2d 1176, 1181 (D.C.Cir.1978). In Vaca, an employee discharged for poor health sought the union's help in regaining his job. The union decided not to take the grievance to arbitration because of insufficient medical evidence. The Supreme Court reversed the holding of the Missouri Supreme Court and held that under the applicable federal standard there was no violation since the union's acts were not proven to be arbitary or in bad faith. The court also found that a union had an obligation to "serve the interests of all members without hostility or discrimination toward any, to exercise its discretion with complete good faith and honesty, and to avoid arbitrary conduct." 386 U.S. at 177, 87 S.Ct. at 910. That standard has been interpreted to encompass a three-prong test by which to measure a union's behavior during its representation of the membership. Actions found to be hostile, discriminatory or arbitrary are likely to constitute a violation of § 8(b)(1)(A). Ruzicka v. General Motors Corporation, 523 F.2d 306, 309 (6th Cir. 1975); Griffin v. International Union of United Automobile Makers, 469 F.2d 181, 183 (4th Cir. 1974).

Quoting Griffin, the Sixth Circuit in Ruzicka accepted the three-prong test at page 309–10:

> A union must conform its behavior to each of these three separate standards. First, it must treat all factions and segments of its membership without hostility or discrimination. Next, the broad discretion of the union in asserting the rights of its individual members must be exercised in complete good faith and honesty. Finally, the union must avoid arbitrary conduct. Each of these requirements represents a distinct and separate obligation, the breach of which may constitute the basis for civil action.

In this proceeding the General Counsel attempted to prove that the representatives of Local 860 made an express agreement with Emporium as to the elimination of the clerical unit—an agreement motivated by sex discrimination. The law judge discarded the theory that the parties made an express agreement and that any agreement was based on discrimination against women. The evidence lending support to a finding of sex discrimination was that the Union agents referred to the clericals as "broads." The law judge found this evidence to be fragile and inadequate.

He did find several factors indicating that Mark O'Reilly, a Union representative, had made an implied agreement with Emporium. He did not find, however, the implied agreement to be determinative of the issue of the Union's unfair labor practice. To the contrary, he found "Respondent's [Union's] failure to advise employees of dangers well-known to Respondent that their insistence was creating, which resulted in the loss of jobs, was a violation of section 8(b)(1)(A) * * *." J.A. at 16-17. In its affirmance, the Board noted its decision was based on the law judge's finding "that Respondent failed to represent every employee in the unit fairly, impartially, and in good faith by persisting in demanding a wage increase it knew would result in their termination." J.A. at 22 n.2. It is clear that the Board's determination of a § 8(b)(1)(A) violation was based on the Union's failure to inform the clericals of the threats and not, as petitioner Union now contents, on the theory that there exists an agreement between the Union and Emporium. Substantial evidence in the record supports the Board's determination.

Two of the clerical employees testified at the administrative hearing that the Union never discussed with or presented to their unit the possibility of job layoffs; the law judge recognized and credited their testimony. There was also a stipulation that five other witnesses could corroborate that testimony. J.A. at 13. Finally, the law judge found that no Union agent notified the clericals of the representations made by the employer as to the elimination of the clericals' jobs during the negotiations or at any time thereafter.

Local 860 had at least two opportunities to inform and advise the clericals of management's statements during the negotiations. While the negotiations were continuing, O'Riley and Robert Patterson, another Union representative, met with the warehousemen and clericals to explain the Emporium was willing to agree to the demands for an increase in wages for the warehousemen. O'Riley informed the workers that they would continue to push for the wage increase for the clericals, an issue which had not been resolved. At another meeting shortly thereafter, the two discussed the terms of the new agreement and told the clericals they would receive a 70-cent per hour wage increase, but that 35 cents of the increase would be "red circled", meaning that it would not be actually reflected in the contract. The Union representatives neglected to mention the possibility of the layoffs to the clerical employees at either meeting.

When the Union learned the layoffs were to be effected in late August, 1976, O'Riley complained about the timing and asked if the action could be delayed until after Christmas. The employer's negotiator reminded him that the Union had advance warning of Emporium's plan and that they offered no objection. At O'Riley's request, the layoffs were postponed until October. After the layoffs on October 15th, the clerical employees asked O'Riley if the Union knew of the plan. He replied in the negative; he added there was some talk of elimination of the unit by Emporium's representatives but that such threats were made in all negotiations. The findings were not controverted. The Union representatives did attempt to justify their actions by pointing out that such tactics were commonplace and that the Union had no responsibility to inform the clericals of all potential threats. The law judge rejected this defense as did the Board.

In some cases, courts have found that a union's acts need not be intentional or based on hostile motives to constitute a breach of its duty. E. g., Wyatt v. Interstate & Ocean Transport Co., 623 F.2d 888, 891 (4th Cir. 1980); Robesky v. Quantas Airways, 573 F.2d 1082, 1090 (9th Cir. 1978). In N.L.R.B. v. American Postal Workers Union, etc., 618 F.2d 1249, 1255 (8th Cir. 1980), the court emphasized:

> if a union representative makes no effort to communicate with the persons directly affected by its actions and takes action without investigation or adequate notice and opportunity to be heard, these acts and omissions may constitute a breach of the duty of fair representation.

There, a union's failure to contact an employee before it revoked its assent to her request for a temporary shift change was found to be arbitrary conduct although the union intended no harm. As the Ninth Circuit stated. "[a]cts of omission by union officials not intended to harm members may be so egregious, so far short of minimum standards of fairness to the employee and so unrelated to legitimate union interests as to be arbitrary." Robesky v. Quantas Airways, 573 F.2d at 1090.

Under the facts and circumstances presented in this proceeding, we find that the Union had a duty to inform its membership of management's position so that they, in turn, could make an informed reassessment of their wage demand. The Union's failure to apprise the clericals of the ultimate danger and risk of job loss created by their wage demand was clearly an arbitrary action and constituted a breach of duty. The Board's finding of a violation of the Act should not be disturbed.

Finally, the petitioner Union's contention that the Board exceeded its remedial authority in ordering the Union to make the clerical employees whole for their loss of wages has little, if any, merit. The Board is vested with broad remedial powers and our review is limited. International

642 F.2d 350 (9th Cir.), April 20, 1981—243 NLRB 837

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before FLETCHER and FERGUSON, Circuit Judges, and FITZGERALD,* DISTRICT JUDGE

FITZGERALD, District Judge: The National Labor Relations Board ruled that Carlton's Market of El Monte, California engaged in unfair labor practices which dissipated a union majority within the bargaining unit and brought about conditions making a fair representation election impossible. As a consequence, the Board issued a bargaining order and now comes to this court for enforcement.[1]

On November 28, 1977, Michael Provenzano and Steven Davis, both experienced in grocery management but inexperienced in labor relations, entered into an agreement with Tajico Corporation to acquire Carlton's Market. The business was in poor financial shape. On the same date, the union[2] completed collection of authorization cards from 13 out of 17 employees at the market.

The new management was opposed to the union. Provenzano and Davis discharged six of their employees because of their pro-union activities. Provenzano also told employees that he would do anything to keep

He threatened to fire union supporters, offered wage increases to those who took his side, threatened not to hire people with pro-union sympathies, mentioned reductions in hours for pro-union employees, and stated that he could obtain the discharge of pro-union employees who left his store to work elsewhere if they should prove troublesome to him.

On March 13, 1978, the union filed a charge of unfair labor practices with the National Labor Relations Board. Provenzano and Davis then consulted a skilled labor attorney who provided them with a "crash course" in employee relations. There have been no new allegations of unfair labor practices at the market since.

An administrative law judge held hearings on the union's complaint in December 1978 and January 1979. The judge refused to admit some evidence indicative of a change of attitude on the part of the management. However, Provenzano and Davis were permitted to show that the number of employees at the market had grown from 17 to 37, of whom 27 had been hired subsequent to any unfair labor practices. At the time of the hearing, only nine members remained of the work force employed at the time the unfair labor practices were committed.

*Honorable James M. Fitzgerald, United States District Judge for the District of Alaska, sitting by designation.

[1] This court has jurisdiction under 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1975) a section of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 151-69 (1975). Hereinafter "the Act."

[2] Retail Clerks Union, Local 1428, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO.

The judge found that 15 separate unfair labor practices had occurred in addition to the six prohibited discharges which had been stipulated to. The Board adopted the judge's recommendation and issued an order requiring Carlton's Market to cease and desist its unfair labor practices and to recognize and bargain with the union.

Despite respondent's contentions to the contrary, we find substantial evidence in the record as a whole to establish that in December 1977 the union represented a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit, and that the management thereafter committed serious unfair labor practices against the employees and the union. We hold, as well, that the Board's inquiry into whether a fair election might be held was adequate and that the Board's reasons are sufficiently explicit to justify the bargaining order.

ANALYSIS

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Company,[3] the Supreme Court ruled that a bargaining order could issue in these circumstances if (1) "the Union demonstrates that it represented a majority of the unit employees who signed valid union authorization cards," (2) the employer committed unfair labor practices, and (3) those practices are "bad enough to undermine the free election process."[4]

The Union Majority

The Board correctly determined that the proper size of the bargaining unit was 17, rather than 20 as respondent contends. It found (1) that Donald Conroy was essentially an expert on pricing working for Tajico rather than an employee of the market, (2) that Naushad Kurji was a management trainee with special status more closely aligning him with management than with employees, and (3) that Angus Garrison could be properly excluded as a meat employee in line with current industry practice separating meat and grocery employees. These findings are not arbitrary and capricious as they are supported by substantial evidence.[5]

Respondent contends that a majority was not achieved within the unit because the purpose of the authorization cards was misrepresented to the signers. In Gissel the Court adopted the Board's Cumberland Shoe doctrine for dealing with authorization cards when such claims arise.

> [I]f the card itself is unambiguous (i.e., states on its face that the signer authorizes the Union to represent the employee for collective bargaining purposes and not to seek an election), it will be counted unless it is proved that the employee was told that the card was to be used solely for the purpose of obtaining an election.[6]

In this case, the card was unambiguous. Therefore, the management must establish that the signer was told that the card would be used solely for an election in order to exclude it from the count. Our examination of the evidence now relied upon by the respondent reveals that, at best, it can be viewed as conflicting. The testimony of William Rodriguez, who collected the cards, provides substantial evidence in the light of the entire record that a sufficient number of signature cards were properly signed to obtain a majority.

The Unfair Labor Practices

Four employees were discharged by Carlton's Market within a week of signing their union authorization cards. Later two more employees who had signed cards were terminated. Although all six were subsequently offered reinstatement and back pay, we conclude that discharges for protected union activity strike directly at the Act's stated purpose of "encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining * * * by protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association * * *."[7] Such violations are among the most serious infringements of the Act possible. Besides these six, there are seven additional findings of unfair labor practices by Carlton's Market which are undisputed. They include Provenzano's coercive interrogation of employees about union sympathies, a statement to an employee that he was trying to keep the union out, his threat to get another employee discharged from any future job because of union activities, and his statements to still another employee that he did not want any discussion of union organization in the market, or anyone in the store who was for the union. These findings reveal a pattern of sustained and serious violation of section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[8]

[4] The Gissel test as paraphrased and explained in NLRB v. Anchorage Times Publishing Co., 637 F.2d 1359 (9th Cir. 1981). As pointed out in Anchorage Times, Gissel recognized two situations in which a bargaining order may issue. The first occurs where an employer has committed unfair labor practices during an election campaign which are so "outrageous" and "pervasive" that they destroy any possibility of a fair re-run election. In such circumstances, a bargaining order is almost always warranted. The second situation, at issue here, involves less flagrant violations which nonetheless undermine the possibility of a fair election. It requires a showing that the union once achieved majority status within the unit. Gissel also identified a third situation in which a bargaining order is not justified because the employer's practices have had minimal effect on the election process.

Finally, six more findings of unfair labor practices rest on the administrative law judge's determinations of credibility. All involve conversations which Provenzano had with individual employees. The employees testified that Provenzano threatened discharges and cuts in hours if the union organized the store, repeatedly interrogated them about their attitudes toward the union, and promised wage increases if they would not support it.

The findings of the Board must be upheld if supported by substantial evidence viewing the record as a whole.[9] "* * * [T]he examiner's findings as to credibility should not be disturbed unless a 'clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces that they are incorrect.' "[10] Here the administrative law judge made credibility resolutions on the basis of the demeanor and appearance of the witnesses and explicitly presented her analysis and reasoning for crediting some and not crediting others in her findings. Significant testimony in the record supports her findings which we will not disturb.

The Bargaining Order

An employer's commission of an unfair labor practice does not automatically result in an order to bargain. In choosing a remedy, Gissel instructs the Board to consider the extensiveness of the unfair labor practices, their past effect on election conditions,[11] the likelihood of their reoccurrence, and the probability that a fair election can be held.[12] The relevant time period for consideration of the possibility of a fair election is when the case is before the Board.[13]

To document is consideration of these factors, the Board must make findings which are sufficiently explicit to support issuance of a bargaining order. The Board must "clearly articulate the reasons behind any order, and particularly why other remedies were found inappropriate."[14] These findings may not be perfunctory.[15] However, when the Board has considered these matters and determined that a bargaining order is necessary, Gissel counsels deference to the Board's determination of a remedy.[16]

In her decision, the administrative law judge concluded that the misconduct of Carlton's management was so pervasive that it made a fair election infeasible:

> Finally, I reject Respondent's argument that any effect of the unfair labor practices has been dissipated and a fair election is now possible. The extent of Respondent's unfair labor practices are so pervasive that traditional remedies will not erase the effects thereof. Provenzano and Davis deliberately embarked upon a course of action designed to, and which did, undermine the Union's majority. The leading union adherent was discharged along with 5, probably 6, of the 13 card signers in a unit of only 17. Nine of the current employees were employed at the time of the unfair labor practices. The nature of Respondent's conduct—discharges, threats of dis> charges, threat to cause discharge from future employment—is the type of conduct which employees are apt to relate to other employees and which is rather difficult, probably impossible to forget or discount. Nor are employees likely to miss the point that backpay and offers of reinstatement made some 9 to 11 months after the discharge does not necessarily compensate for the financial hardship and emotional and mental anguish apt to be experienced during an interim period of unemployment. Thus, such conduct would have a longlasting, if not permanent, effect on the employees' freedom of choice in selecting or rejecting a bargaining representative and it is unlikely, if not impossible, that the Board's traditional remedies would dispel the coercive atmosphere which Respondent has created.

able inferences.[17] Moreover, Gissel teaches that, "* * * a reviewing court must recognize the Board's competence in the first instance to judge the impact of utterances made in the context of the employer-employee relationship." [18]

Respondent suggests that the ruling is perfunctory and mechanically applies Gissel, without regard to context, in a manner forbidden by NLRB v. Western Drug.[19] In that case an administrative law judge determined that the union had failed to achieve a majority within the unit. He made no findings on the question of whether a fair election could be held.[20] The Board reversed the findings of the judge and issued a bargaining order. In reversing the Board, the court in Western Drug said:

> We limit our holding to the facts presented. The circumstance changed completely before the unfair practice charges were tried, and there was no unusual delay in trying the charges. All the employees in the unit voluntarily terminated their employment for reasons unrelated to the unfair practices. And the Board's findings do not suggest any alternative ground for concluding that an election would not reflect the present employees' true wishes.[21]

Western Drug is distinguishable from the case now before this court. Here the administrative law judge clearly stated the reasons upon which she rested her conclusion that remedies short of a bargaining order would be ineffectual. The Board adopted her detailed statement of reasons and in conformity with her findings issued the bargaining order. Western Drug is simply not on point.

Respondent argues that the proper time to consider whether a fair election can be held is when the issue is before the Board [22] in contending that the administrative law judge improperly rejected evidence of change in management attitude toward the union after March 13, 1978.

The judge correctly refused to allow an employee to be questioned as to whether a fair election would be possible in the near future. Gissel points out:

> We also accept the observation that employees are more likely than not, many months after a card drive and in response to questions by company counsel, to give testimony damaging to the union, particularly where company officials have previously threatened reprisals for union activity in violation of § 8(a)(1). We therefore reject any rule that requires a probe of an employee's subjective motivations as involving an endless and unreliable inquiry.[23]

Other evidence excluded by the judge included Provenzano's offer to testify as to his present attitude toward unions and to his intentional hiring of employees with prounion sympathies after March, 1978. While this evidence is probative of a change of heart on management's part, the error, if any, was harmless since the record contains evidence of events occurring after March, 1978. Detailed records of employee turnover were received, as was evidence of the settlement resulting in reinstatement and back pay for improperly discharged employees.

Respondent suggests that reinstatement, plus the published notices, must have "inevitably dissipated any fear that past misconduct will recur." The judge, however, drew a different inference:

The change in the behavior of the Carlton management after it consulted labor counsel was apparent to the administrative law judge; the excluded evidence would have added little. The judge determined that such altered behavior when one faces charges before the National Labor Relations Board is not surprising and probably not a reliable guide to the future. She was justified in concluding that the impact of the management's past unfair labor practices had not been dissipated, and their extent was so pervasive that traditional remedies were inadequate.

We find, therefore, that there is substantial evidence in the record to support the factual findings, errors on evidentiary matters, if any, are harmless, and the holdings are sufficiently explicit to support the issuing of a bargaining order. The Board's order is hereby ENFORCED.

On petitions to review Board Order

Before LAY, Chief Judge, and BRIGHT and MCMILLIAN, Circuit Judges

842

LAY, Chief Judge: Tobey Fine Papers of Kansas City, Graham Paper Company and Butler Paper Company separately petition this court for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board finding that the petitioners violated section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (5). The Board held that petitioners were guilty of unfair labor practices by refusing to honor collective bargaining agreements negotiated by the Paper Industry of Kansas City, a multiemployer bargaining association to which each company belonged.[1] The Board found petitioners had made an untimely and ineffective withdrawal from the multiemployer collective bargaining negotiations because their withdrawals occurred, after negotiations had begun and were not justified by "unusual circumstances." Petitioners urge that each of their withdrawals were motivated by an impasse in negotiations which constituted, as a matter of law, "unusual circumstances" justifying unilateral withdrawal. Alternatively, petitioners urge that the bargaining unit was fragmented by the withdrawal, with Union consent, of two members of the association and the Union's execution of separate agreements [2] with the two companies. In each case, the Board cross-petitions for enforcement of its order.

We enforce the Board's order in each case on a limited ground; we find substantial evidence on the record as a whole sustaining the Board's finding that the actual reason for each company's withdrawal was not based upon impasse or fragmentation, but on the fact that the employees of the individual companies expressed a doubt as to the Union's representation of a majority of each company's employees. It is well settled that this constitutes an impermissible reason for a company to withdraw from multiemployer bargaining. See NLRB v. Sheridan Creations, Inc., 357 F.2d 245, 248 (2d Cir. 1966).

[2] Separate agreements are final contracts between the union and employers which are completely independent of any agreement that may be reached later between the union and association. Interim agreements are temporary contracts which govern the employee-employer relationship between the time a previous contract expires and the time a new contract is negotiated by the union and the association. By the terms, the interim agreement adopts the language of and is superseded by any subsequent contract between the union and association.

Petitioners urge that their motivation for withdrawing from the bargaining unit was that contract negotiations had reached an impasse and the Union had executed separate agreements with Bermingham & Prosser and Nationwide Papers, the largest employer of the group. The Union and association met three times to negotiate a new contract before June 1, 1978, the date the existing contract expired. No agreement was reached and the Union struck all association employers on June 6. On June 8, Bermingham & Prosser withdrew from the association with Union consent and reached a separate agreement with the Union on June 26, 1978. On July 25, one week after the only negotiation session held since the strike began, Nationwide Papers withdrew, with Union consent, from the association and signed an agreement on July 31, 1978. After the withdrawal of Bermingham & Prosser and Nationwide Papers the number of employees in the bargaining unit declined from 130 to 75 members. On August 11, Tobey and Graham notified the Union and the association that they were withdrawing from the association. On August 14, Butler also informed the Union it had withdrawn from the association. The Union refused to consent to these withdrawals. Subsequently, the original wage package tendered to the Union by the association was resubmitted to the 75 employees remaining after the withdrawal of Bermingham & Prosser and Nationwide Papers. On August 25, the wage package was approved by a vote of 19 to 12 and a contract between the association and the Union was subsequently signed. Tobey, Graham and Butler have refused to recognize or bargain with the Union or to execute or abide by the agreeement.

Petitioners urge that it is the overwhelming law of the circuits that an employer may withdraw from a multiemployer group once an impasse has been reached, citing NLRB v. Independent Association of Steel Fabricators, Inc., 582 F.2d 135 (2d Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Beck Engraving Co., 522 F.2d 475 (3d Cir. 1975); NLRB v. Association Shower Door Co., 512 F.2d 230 (9th Cir. 1975); and NLRB v. Hi-Way Billboards, Inc., 500 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1974). Petitioners also rely upon the dicta in Fairmont Foods Co. v. NLRB, 471 F.2d 1170, 1172 (8th Cir. 1972), that an impasse was an "unusual circumstance" justifying unilateral withdrawals.[3] This rule has had recent reappraisal by the Board and least three courts of appeals. For reasons discussed, we need not pass on the impasse issue. However, because of the importance of the issue, we think it helpful to point out the reasons we feel it best to resolve the issue at a later date.

The Ninth Circuit recently reaffirmed its earlier position taken in Associated Shower Door and commented that "Courts of Appeals have consistently recognized an impasse in negotiations as justification for a unilateral withdrawal from a multiemployer unit." H&D, Inc. v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 139, 142 (9th Cir. 1980), quoting Authorized Air Conditioning Co. v. NLRB, 606 F.2d 899, 907 (9th Cir. 1979). The Ninth Circuit, however, did not discuss Charles D. Bonanno Linen Service, Inc. v. NLRB, 630 F.2d 25 (1st Cir. 1980), cert. granted, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 1512, 67 L.Ed.2d 813 (1981), which questioned the right of an employer to withdraw simply on the basis of an impasse reached in negotiations. The First Circuit in Bonanno thoroughly analyzed the policy background involved in the controversy and adopted the Board's position that without evidence of fragmentation or of an intent by the Union to destroy the bargaining unit, an impasse in negotiations, standing alone, is not a sufficient basis for an employer's unilateral withdrawals. Id. at 35. In Bonanno, unlike the present case, no separate agreements were consensually reached after impasse between the Union and withdrawing employers.

[3] The First Circuit in NLRB v. Charles D. Bonanno Linen Service, Inc., 630 F.2d 25, 30 & n.7 (1st Cir. 1980), cert. granted, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 1512, 67 L.Ed.2d 813 (1981), notes that Fairmont Foods relied on the Board's prior decisions in Ice Cream Council, Inc., 145 N.L.R.B. No. 71 (1964), and Morand Bros. Beverage Co., 91 N.L.R.B. No. 58 (1950), enf. in part 190 F.2d 576 (7th Cir. 1951). The First Circuit correctly points out that Ice Cream Council approved withdrawal only upon union consent. Id. It further distinguishes Morand Bros., which provided employers "unlimited freedom" to withdraw "at any time * * * at their will or fancy," as abandoned by the Board in Retail Associates, Inc., 120 N.L.R.B. No. 66A (1958). Id. In any event, the Board made its position clear in Hi-Way Billboards, Inc., 206 N.L.R.B. No. 1 (1973), enf. denied, 500 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1974), that it no longer recognizes the right of any employer to withdraw from a multiemployer group solely on the basis of an impasse in the negotiations. Since the dicta in Fairmont Foods relied primarily on what this court perceived to be the Board's policy and in view of the change of this policy, Fairmont can no longer be considered controlling in this circuit.

As recently as January 30, 1981, the Fifth Circuit has reevaluated its position taken earlier in Hi-Way Billboards. NLRB v. Marine Machine Works, Inc., 635 F.2d 522 (5th Cir. 1981). In Hi-Way Billboards, the Fifth Circuit declined to adopt the Board's reasoning that impasse alone could not constitute an "unusual circumstance" justifying unilateral withdrawal. The court perceived that it was unfair to employers for the Board to allow the union to negotiate separate agreements with the individual employer members of the association, and in effect withdraw from the multiemployer bargaining at least with respect to those employers, and not to allow the remaining employers a similar right of unilateral withdrawal.[4] 500 F.2d NLRB at 183–84. In Marine Machine Works, the Fifth Circuit observed the Board had recently addressed the unfairness perceived in Hi-Way Billboards in two ways. First, "the only separate agreements that the Board will permit [a union and employer to enter into] are temporary or interim agreements pending the outcome of negotiations in the multiemployer unit." 635 F.2d at 525. Second, "the execution of a final separate agreement by a union and an individual employer of the multiemployer unit is violative of section 8(b)(3), 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(3) (1976), by the Union and of section 8(a)(5) by the employer, unless all parties—the union, the employer, and the employer association—consent to the agreement" Id. (citing Callier's Custom Kitchens, 243 N.L.R.B. No. 143, enf'd on other grounds, 630 F.2d 595 (8th Cir. 1980); Charles D. Bonanno Linen Service, Inc., 243 N.L.R.B. No. 140, enf'd, 630 F.2d 25 (1st Cir. 1980); Teamsters Union Local No. 378 (Olympia Automobile Dealers Ass'n), 243 N.L.R.B. No. 138, enf. pending, No. 79-7683 (9th Cir. argued Nov. 5, 1980)).

Under these circumstances, the Fifth Circuit now holds:

> The Board's rules balance an individual party's legitimate interest in striking its own separate bargain against the parties' and the public's legitimate interest in achieving the benefits afforded by continued multiemployer bargaining including avoiding the industrial strife likely to result from frustration of the bargaining process. In reaching this balance, the Board is treating both unions and employers equally and fairly. The Board permits each to use all available economic weapons in aid of reaching an overall settlement. On the other hand, the Board prohibits each from taking action that is destructive of the multiemployer unit: unions may not seek to negotiate separate permanent agreements with employers, and employers may not withdraw from the unit and seek separate permanent negotiations with the union. This result is well within the Board's broad discretion to resolve the inevitable questions arising in the multiemployer bargaining context.

One of the decisions relied upon by the Fifth Circuit is the Board's opinion in Teamsters Union Local No. 378 (Olympia Automobile Dealers Ass'n) 243, N.L.R.B. No. 138, enf. pending, No. 79-7683 (9th Cir. argued Nov. 5, 1980). In Olympia Automobile Dealers, the Board, for the first time, held that an employer may not withdraw from a multiemployer unit without the permission of the association.

Assuming that the Fifth Circuit's understanding of the Board's position is correct, that is, separate permanent agreements may no longer be entered into, and the Olympia Automobile Dealers decision is enforced,[5] it would appear that few controversies concerning unilateral withdrawal from multiemployer bargaining by employers will hereafter arise.[6]

[4] As the court stated:

> [T]he Board permitted a union to negotiate separate final agreements with individual employer members of the multiemployer unit. We felt that this was tantamount to allowing the union to withdraw from the multiemployer unit, at least with respect to those individual employers. For the Board to then deny to the other employers a similar right of unilateral withdrawal did not accord with the Board's espoused commitment to applying to both employers and unions the same rules concerning the right to withdraw. See generally, Evening News Association, 154 N.L.R.B. 1494, 1495–97 (1965), enforced sub nom. Detroit Newspaper Publishers Association v. NLRB, 372 F.2d 569, 570–71 (6th Cir. 1967).

Marine Machine Works, 635 F.2d 525.

[5] Olympia Automobile Dealers specifically allows negotiation of interim agreements without association consent.

[6] One difficulty remains. We find the Board's position still somewhat equivocal as to the impropriety of the union to enter into separate permanent contracts with withdrawn employers. Apparently the Board represented to the Fifth Circuit, in Marine Machine Works, that it would not allow unions to enter into permanent contracts. The court relied upon

Although both the Board and petitioner urge the issue is before us and although strong policy considerations seemingly support the Fifth Circuit's recent analysis, nevertheless, we find the issues not easily resolved.[7] We are concerned with the fact that the Board has evidently taken different positions before this court in Tobey, where the Board apparently approved negotiation of separate contracts between the Union and two employers that had withdrawn, and before the Fifth Circuit in Marine Machine Works, where the Board represented that only temporary, interim contracts would be approved by the Board. We note as well that certiorari is now granted in Bonanno.

Under these circumstances, rather than speculate over the Board's future policy or as to the Supreme Court's analysis of Bonanno, we elect to decide this case on the Board's narrow, alternative holding.

For over 20 years each of the petitioners belonged to the Paper Industry of Kansas City during which time the association had entered into successive collective bargaining agreements with Teamsters Local No. 955, the most recent of which was to expire on June 1, 1978. After negotiations of a new contract failed to bring about agreement, the members authorized an economic strike which the union members commenced on June 6, 1978, against all of the association members. Six of the eight employees employed by Tobey as well as six of eight employees of Graham struck their employers. Eight of Butler's employees also joined the strike.

After Nationwide Papers withdrew from the association, with Union approval, on July 25 and reached a separate agreement with the Union on July 31, Tobey, Graham, and Butler received statements from a majority of their respective employees stating they no longer wished to be represented by the Union. Both Tobey and Graham received these statements from their employees on August 11, the same day they each filed representation petitions with the Board's regional office in Kansas City and notified the Union and association, by telegram, that they were withdrawing from the association. Each stated their reason for withdrawing was because their employees no longer wished to be represented by the Union. On July 31, Butler received a statement signed by its eight employees stating that they wished to resign from the Union and wanted "the opportunity to vote the union out." Butler filed a representation petition on August 9 this representation along with the Board's decisions in Callier and Bonanno in deciding to change the position it had taken in Hi-Way Billboards. However, in Tobey Fine Papers, decided shortly after Callier and Bonanno, the Board said that separate permanent contracts are not per se unacceptable to the Board. The Board observed:

> In our recent Bonanno decision, we reexamined the impact of a bargaining impasse upon multiemployer negotiations in light of its potential as an affirmative device to aid in achieving agreement and we reemphasized that parties have great leeway during impasse, absent proof of unlawful motivation, to exert concurrent economic pressure upon each other. We also concluded that the negotiation of individual "interim" agreements during impasse may prevent, rather than cause, significant multiemployer unit fragmentation. Respondent herein in essence contends that the Union's negotiation of final, separate agreements establishes its unlawful motivation and per se created new withdrawal rights in Respondent, and in Butler and Graham. In our view, it does not follow ipso facto that execution of individual separate final contracts with former Association members either proves an intention to destroy, or necessarily causes the fragmentation of, a multiemployer unit. Rather, the facts of each case must be assessed in order to ascertain the impact of the parties' conduct upon the continued viability of multiemployer bargaining.

[7] Although we recognize the expertise of the Board in these matters and the deference accorded its decisions, the Board's interpretation of labor policy is not unreviewable. The Supreme Court in NLRB v. Insurance Agents Int'l Union, 361 U.S. 477, 499, 80 S.Ct. 419, 432, 4 L.Ed.2d 454 (1960) said,

> We recognize without hesitation the primary function and responsibility of the Board to resolve the conflicting interests that Congress has recognized in its labor legislation. Clearly, where the "ultimate problem is the balancing of the conflicting legitimate interests" it must be remembered that "The function of striking that balance to effectuate national labor policy is often a difficult and delicate responsibility, which the Congress committed primarily to the National Labor Relations Board, subject to limited judicial review." * * * But recognition of the appropriate sphere of the administrative power here obviously cannot exclude all judicial review of the Board's actions * * *. Where Congress has in the statute given the Board a question to answer, the courts will give respect to that answer, but they must be sure the question has been asked.

In the multiemployer bargaining context the Supreme Court said,

> Of course due deference is to be rendered to agency determinations of fact, so long as there is substantial evidence to be found in the record as a whole. But where, as here, the review is not of a question of fact, but of judgment as to the proper balance to be struck between conflicting interests, "[t]he deference owed to an expert tribunal cannot be allowed to slip into a judicial inertia which results in the unauthorized assumption by an agency of major policy decisions properly made by Congress." American Ship Building Co. v. Labor Board, [380 U.S. 300, 318, 85 S.Ct. 955, 967, 13 L.Ed.2d 855 (1965)] * * *. Congress has not given the Board untrammelled authority to catalogue which economic devices shall be deemed freighted with indicia of unlawful intent.

and on August 14 Butler notified the Union of its withdrawal stating its reasons for withdrawal were "changed circumstances and a management decision made at our headquarters."

Under our decisions, the Board is directed to base the validity of an employer's withdrawal from multiemployer bargaining on the actual motivation for the company's withdrawal. NLRB v. Custom Wood Specialities, Inc., 622 F.2d 381, 385 (8th Cir. 1980). There is no dispute that an employer's withdrawal predicated on loss of the union's majority status among its employees does not justify withdrawal. NLRB v. Sheridan Creations, Inc., 357 F.2d 245, 248 (2d Cir. 1966). A union's majority status must be tested by the multiemployer unit and not on an individual employer basis. The Board found "that the concurrent withdrawals [of Tobey, Graham and Butler] and filings of representation petitions were, in each case, expressly tied to an expression of doubt as to the Union's majority support among the respective employees." The Board relied on this finding to support its conclusion that Tobey's, Graham's and Butler's withdrawals from the association were untimely.

Petitioners argue that we can ignore the stated reasons for their withdrawals and view the overall circumstances which indicate the real reasons for their actions. They urge their withdrawals were motivated by the impasse in negotiations and the subsequent fragmentation caused by the withdrawal of Bermingham & Prosser and Nationwide Papers and their negotiation of separate agreements with the Union. Even if we assume that petitioners are not indulging in hindsight reasoning, and it is indeed difficult for us to do so, we nonetheless cannot ignore the factual findings made by the Board based on the petitioners' telegrams sent on August 9 to the association. We cannot substitute our judgment for the Board's where substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the Board's findings. We find that substantial evidence on the record as a whole sustains the findings of the Board as to the actual motivation of Tobey and Graham for withdrawing and, therefore, reject their contentions.

Butler urges that it stands in different shoes than Tobey and Graham. It states that it did not rely on the changed attitude of its employees in deciding to withdraw from the association. The Board found otherwise. The Board reasoned that negotiations had been at an impasse for more than two months, and Bermingham & Prosser had withdrawn a month before and these were not "changed circumstances." The Board concluded that the "changed circumstances were the July 31 letter from the former union steward saying all of Butler's employees no longer wished to be represented by the Union and Butler's filing of a petition for a representation election on August 9. The Board fortified its conclusion by the fact that Butler withdrew from the association on the same day the representation petition was filed.

Here again, we must give credence to reasonable inferences drawn by the Board and must support the Board's findings if they are supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. We conclude that the record as a whole supports the Board's finding that Butler's withdrawal was motivated by a doubt as to the Union's majority status among its employees.

There is another even more cogent reason on this appeal why we feel compelled to enforce the Board's finding against Butler. Butler agreed to have its case before the Board presented on a stipulated record. Unlike Tobey and Graham it did not file a brief with the Board nor did it seek to have the Board reconsider its findings. Its claim that the record does not support the Board's finding as to the reason for withdrawal is raised here for the first time. It is difficult for us to understand that Butler makes a good faith contention when it did not attempt to resist the brief of the General Counsel made before the Board as to the actual motivation for Butler's withdrawal. Butler's reasoning is not only after-the-thought, it simply cannot be properly considered at this time. See 29 U.S.C. § 160(e); International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union v. Quality Manufacturing Co., 420 U.S. 276, 281 n.3, 95 S.Ct. 972, 975 n.3, 43 L.Ed.2d 189 (1975); Glaziers' Local No. 558 v. NLRB, 408 F.2d 197, 202–03 (D.C.Cir. 1969).

We thus find the actual motivation for the withdrawal of Tobey, Graham and Butler was based upon their employees' desire to withdraw from the Union. This does not justify unilateral withdrawal. Under the circumstances, the Board's order finding that each of the petitioners violated sections 8(a) (5) and (1) is enforced.

New England Lumber Division of Diamond International Corporation v. NLRB

646 F.2d 1 (1st Cir.), April 21, 1981; rehearing and rehearing en banc denied May 18, 1981—252 NLRB 95

BREYER, Circuit Judge: This case came before the court upon the petition of the New England Lumber Division of Diamond International Corporation ("Diamond") for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board and the Board's cross-application for enforcement. The order requires Diamond to bargain collectively with the United Paper Workers international Union and its Local No. 80, AFL-CIO (the "Union"). Diamond based its refusal to bargain upon its claim that the Union was not validly chosen to represent its employees because the Union had an improper observer present at the representation election. We reject Diamond's claim and enforce the Board's order.

The dispute in the case concerns an observer designated by the Union at a representation election held in accordance with an agreement or stipulation between the Union and the company. The election was held on October 25, 1979, at the stud mill operated by Diamond's New England Lumber Division. From the morning of the election, Diamond has consistently urged that the designation of the Union's president Phillip Veilleux, an employee of Diamond's Penobscot Division, to act as the Union observer at the election, violated the specific provisions of the "Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election". It adds that a rerun of the election (which the Union won) must be ordered. In response to petitioner's objections, the Regional Director of the NLRB conducted an administrative investigation, and recommended that the objections be overruled. The Board adopted the Regional Director's Report.

Diamond's argument is based on paragraph 4 of the printed form stipulation,[1] prepared by the NLRB, entitled "United States of America, National Labor Relations Board, Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election". It states:

> "4. OBSERVERS.—Each party hereto will be allowed to station an equal number of authorized observers, selected from among the non-supervisory employees of the Employer, at the polling places during the election to assist in its conduct, to challenge the eligibility of voters, and to verify the tally." (Emphasis added.)

Diamond argues that Veilleux is not a non-supervisory employee of the "employer" within the meaning of the stipulation because Veilleux is a nonsupervisory employee of the Penobscot Division of Diamond, not its New England Lumber Division. Diamond argues that the Penobscot Division and the New England Lumber Division are autonomous entities operating within a large multinational corporation, and that it is the Lumber Division, not Diamond as a whole, which is the "employer" within the terms of stipulation.

The facts related to the stipulation's meaning are as follows: First, the stipulation does not explicitly state whether the New England Lumber Division or the larger company is the "employer" within the terms of paragraph 4. However, the words "Diamond International Corporation, New England Lumber Division" were typed above the printed word "(Employer)" at the place on the form which calls for a signature.

Second, paragraph 8 of the form stipulation calls for the parties, presumably the employer, to "insert commerce facts" establishing that the employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sections 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act; and, the typewritten words inserted appeared to name Diamond International Corporation as the corporation. The remainder of the typed response in paragraph 8, however, limited the facts establishing effect on commerce to facts concerning the New England Lumber Division, not Diamond as a whole.[2]

[2] 2. The paragraph 8 response reads:

"Diamond International Corporation is a Delaware corporation with offices in Passadumkeag, Maine where it engages in the manufacture of framing materials. It annually purchases materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside of Maine and annually ships materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside of Maine from its Passadumkeag location.

Third, a letter from the NLRB to Diamond's New England Lumber Division and the Union enclosed the completed stipulation for signature. It stated in part:

> "Enclosed in accordance with our telephone discussions is the Stipulation for Certification upon Consent Election . . . Each party may designate an election observer. These observers must be nonsupervisory employees."

The letter is not specific about whether nonsupervisory employees of any division of Diamond or only of its New England Lumber Division were intended to be qualified observers. But the letter is captioned "RE: DIAMOND INTERNATIONAL CORP, NEW ENGLAND LUMBER DIV."

It is clear that the Board has discretion to interpret ambiguity in a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election. NLRB v. Detective Intelligence Service, Inc., 448 F.2d 1022, 1025 (9th Cir. 1971). In that case, the Ninth Circuit stated, "where a Stipulation is ambiguous, the Board has authority to interpret the agreement according to what its finds to have been the intent of the parties." Id. Whether the stipulation is sufficiently ambiguous here to warrant the Board's interpretation is uncertain, given the instances in the relevant papers where the "employer" is referred to as Diamond International Corporation, New England Lumber Division. But, we need not decide that question, for even if use of Veilleux as an observer was inconsistent with the terms of the stipulation, the NLRB's decision to accept the election results is still valid.

The NLRB has broad discretion in the conduct of representation elections. NLRB v. A.J. Tower Co., 329 U.S. 324, 330, 67 S.Ct 324, 327, 91 L.Ed. 322 (1946); NLRB v. Morgan Health Care Center, 618 F.2d 127, 128 (1st Cir. 1980). The Board's determination can be set aside only for an abuse of discretion in determining that the election was fairly conducted. See NLRB v. Mattison Machine Works, 364 U.S. 123, 124, 81 S.Ct. 434, 435, 5 L.Ed.2d 455 (1961). In this instance, the relevant legal standard is whether any breach in the stipulation was sufficiently prejudicial or sufficiently material to warrant setting the election aside. Did a breach of the stipulation significantly impair the fairness of the election process? Summa Corp. v. NLRB, 625 F.2d 393, 295 (9th Cir. 1980); Grant's Home Furnishings, Inc., 229 N.L.R.B. 1305 (1977).

The Board has found that any breach of the stipulation was immaterial: even if Veilleux is not an "employee" under the stipulation, his presence as an observer did not warrant setting aside the election. We cannot say that the Board abused its discretion in arriving at this conclusion. The Board's determination rests upon the view that the stipulation—in limiting observers to "nonsupervisory employees of the employer"—is aimed primarily at preventing intimidation that might take place should the employer choose to have supervisory employees present. It is not aimed at stopping observers who are union officials.[3] Such an interpretation of the language is a reasonable one; nothing in the record indicates any conflict between that interpretation and the parties' intent. And the Board's view of the matter should be given weight in light of the fact that the Board itself wrote the stipulation; the parties adopted language that appeared in the Board's printed form. On this interpretation of the clause, the presence of a nonsupervisory Diamond employee from outside the New England Lumber Division as an observer, would, at worst, constitute a nonmaterial breach of the stipulation.

Diamond also argues that, if management is prohibited from sending supervisory employees to observe, so should the Union be prohibited from sending union officials to observe. There are obvious differences, however, between permitting a local union official to be present in the polling place during voting and permitting individuals closely identified with management to be there. The Board could reasonably conclude that the presence of supervisors in the polling place during voting, even in the role of observers, might create an atmosphere of fear or intimidation where the similar presence of a local union official would not. See NLRB v. Golden Age Beverage Co., 415 F.2d 26, 30 (5th Cir. 1969). The Board has consistently held, with court approval, that the designation of a union official as observer does not warrant overturning an election unless there is evidence that the official engaged in improper conduct while acting in that capacity. See Shoreline Enterprises v. NLRB, 262 F.2d

[3] Indeed, how could this standard language do so, for many employers will have union officials among their nonsupervisory employees? Of course, Diamond might argue that here it was aware that the language would protect it against observers who were union members. But the record does not suggest that if accepted the form language with such a purpose of effect in mind. And, had Diamond focused upon this effect in advance and sought it, why did it allow the definition of "employer" to remain somewhat ambiguous?

933, 942 (5th Cir. 1959); NLRB v. E–Z Davies Chevrolet, 395 F.2d 191, 193 (9th Cir. 1968); Soerens Motor Company, 106 N.L.R.B. 1388, 1389–90 (1953); Dallas City Packing Co., 110 N.L.R.B. 8 (1954).[4] Thus, we find the Board's decision here reasonable, its application for enforcement is granted and Diamond's petition is denied.

---

[4] Petitioner's reliance upon Summa Corp. v. NLRB, supra, is misplaced. There, an unequal number of observers was permitted in material breach of the election stipulation, over the company's objection, creating the "significant risk" of an impression of union predominance and of partiality on the part of the Board. There was so such inequality here.

David D. Sutherland, d/b/a Maaco Auto Painting and Body Work v. NLRB

646 F.2d 1273 (8th Cir.), April 21, 1981

On petition to review Board Order

Before Heaney, Stephenson and McMillian, Circuit Judges

Per Curiam: David D. Sutherland, d/b/a Maaco Auto Painting and Body Work, petitions this Court to review and set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board. The Board found that Maaco had violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by discharging Donald Rubino for engaging in protected concerted activity. The Board ordered Maaco to cease and desist, and also ordered Rubino's reinstatement with back pay. David D. Sutherland, d/b/a Maaco Auto Painting and Body Work, 249 N.L.R.B No. 184, 104 LRRM 1323 (1980). The Board requests that we enforce its order. The two questions raised on appeal are (1) whether the Board properly asserted jurisdiction over the dispute, and (2) whether substantial evidence supports the Board's finding of a section 8(a)(1) violation.

After careful review of the entire record, we hold that the Board properly exercised jurisdiction of this matter under its non-retail standard. Siemons Mailing Service, 43 LRRM 1056, 1058 (1958). The company's records show that it grossed over $50,000 from non-retail services provided to automobile dealerships and truck companies, themselves subject to the Board's jurisdiction; and that it purchased over $50,000 worth of goods from points outstate. The fact that Sutherland had purchased the company and had managed it for less than a year does not affect the Board's jurisdiction. Cf. Aroostook Fed'n of Farmers, Inc., 36 LRRM 1611, 1611 (1955); Reliable Roofing Co., 103 LRRM 1006, 1007 (1979).

We are also convinced, after reviewing the entire record, that substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that the company violated section 8(a)(1) by discharging Rubino for engaging in protected concerted activity. The National Labor Relations Act guarantees employees the right to engage in concerted activity that is intended for the employees' mutual aid and protection. It is clear that when employees join together and seek, through their actions, better terms, tenure or working conditions, that activity is protected under section 7 of the Act. Crenlo, Division of G. F. Business Equip., Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 529 F.2d 201, 204 (8th Cir. 1975); Koch Supplies, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 646 F.2d 1257 at 1259 (8th cir., 1981). Moreover, it is well settled that when an employee is discharged for engaging in protected union activity, that discharge is in violation of section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Koch Supplies, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., supra, at 1259.

The record clearly demonstrates that Rubino and another employee met with Sutherland and told him that the other employees, as well as themselves, were dissatisfied with their wages and the fact that all the employees were not equally paid for equal work. Moreover, they were upset about the company's decision to shelve its employee bonus system.[1] Finally, they told Sutherland that some of the employees were unhappy about the working conditions in the shop. The evidence clearly shows that Rubino and his coworker approached Sutherland in an effort to bring about changes beneficial to themselves and the other employees. These are classic forms of concerted activity. See N.L.R.B. v. Sencore, Inc., 558 F.2d 433, 434 (8th Cir. 1977).

[1] We note that the record does not support the company's contention that Rubino was seeking unlawful bonuses for himself and the other employees.

This is not a case involving the mere personal griping of a single employee who has no intention to benefit other coworkers. Koch Supplies, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., supra. Here, Rubino was clearly engaged in protected concerted activity, and he was discharged for it. His discharge was in violation of section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[2]

The order of the Board is enforced.

NLRB v. Rexair, Inc.

646 F.2d 249 (6th Cir.), April 23, 1981—243 NLRB 876

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Keith, Merritt and Martin, Circuit Judges

249

The National Labor Relations Board is applying to the court under § 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), to enforce its order setting aside the results of a disputed election in which the United Furniture Workers Union lost its bid to represent the employees at Rexair's Cadillac, Michigan plant; requiring Rexair to cease and desist from engaging in certain activities violating §§ 8(a)(1) and

8(a)(3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and 158(a)(3); and ordering Rexair to recognize and bargain with the Union upon request. The challenged activities occurred after the Union obtained authorization cards from a large majority of the plant's employees in early December 1977 and requested recognition by Rexair. The latter refused, and the two parties entered into a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election. The election was held on February 14, 1978. The Union lost, and it filed objections to the election, charging that Raxair had engaged in numerous unfair labor practices during the campaign. After a hearing, the administrative law judge found that almost every one of the challenged activities constituted an unfair labor practice, and he held that Rexair's unlawful conduct "impeded the election process, undermined the Union, and destroyed its majority status" (App. 23). He held that issuance of a cease and desist order and holding a new election would be an unsatisfactory remedy, and he therefore ordered that the Union be recognized without a rerun election and that Rexair bargain with it upon request. The Board upheld the ALJ's decision, stating simply, "The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the [ALJ] and to adopt his recommended Order [with small modifications not relevant here]" (App. 29) (footnote omitted).

The standard employed by courts reviewing a Board determination of factual issues is whether its findings are "supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole." 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). Upon review of the record we hold that the ALJ's finding that Rexair engaged in unfair labor practices during the unionization drive is supported by substantial evidence. Although some of Rexair's challenges reveal that there may be some debate about individual findings of the ALJ, we do not believe that Rexair has sustained the burden of demonstrating that the ALJ erred in concluding that the company had engaged in unfair labor practices necessitating the vacating of the election results.

More difficult, however, is the issue of the remedy imposed. In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), the Supreme Court held that although holding a new election is the preferred remedy, a bargaining order may issue without a new election in either of two situations: when employer violations have been "flagrant" or "egregious"; or when a union obtained a majority status at some point prior to the election, and the employer's conduct, though not outrageous, "nonetheless still [has] the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election process." 395 U.S. at 613-15, 89 S.Ct. at 1939-1941. The ALJ found that the present case fell into the second category, and he stated,

> I am of the opinion that the possibility of erasing the effects of the Company's unfair labor practices and insuring a fair election by the use of the traditional remedy of a cease-and-desist order is

[2] We agree with the Board that the fact that Rubino may have been classified as a probationary employee should not affect the ruling of this Court.

> slight, and that in this case the employees sentiment expressed through the authorization cards obtained by the Union would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order * * *.

(App. 23).

We disagree. We recognize that "the determination of a remedy is peculiarly within the province of the Board." Automated Business Systems v. NLRB, 497 F.2d 262, 272 (6th Cir. 1974); see Gissel, supra, at 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct. at 1939 n.32 ("In fashioning its remedies . . . the Board draws on a fund of knowledge and expertise all its own, and its choice of remedy must therefore be given special respect by reviewing courts.") Nonetheless, this court has exercised less deference to the Board and scrutinized its decision more closely when it has imposed the very strong remedy of issuing a bargaining order without holding a new election. See, e.g., Donn Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 613 F.2d 162 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 447 U.S. 906, 100 S.Ct. 2988, 64 L.Ed.2d 855 (1980); NLRB v. East Side Shopper, Inc., 498 F.2d 1334 (6th Cir. 1974); Automated Business Systems v. NLRB, 497 F.2d 262

(6th Cir. 1974); Pulley v. NLRB, 395 F.2d 870 (6th Cir. 1968). Bargaining orders have not been enforced when "[t]he Board made no findings or detailed analysis as to the residual impact * * *, or the likelihood of recurrence, of any of the unfair labor practices, " or when they are "based on conclusory statements unsupported by sufficient facts," Donn Products, supra, at 166, or when the Board's reasoning consisted simply of " 'a litany, reciting conclusions by rote without factual explication,' " East Side Shopper, supra, at 1336, quoting NLRB v. American Cable Systems, Inc., 427 F.2d 446, 449 (5th Cir. 1970).

The Board has failed to support its conclusion that a bargaining order is the only satisfactory remedy in the present case. The ALJ simply recites his findings of the Company's improper activities and then states that a cease-and-desist order could not cure these wrongs. There is no analysis of the residual impact or possible recurrence of these violations, nor explanation why a cease-and-desist order would fail to prevent possible recurrence. Nor is there any " 'analysis of the causal connection between the unfair labor practices and the conclusion that the election process was undermined' " to the point that a bargaining order must issue. Automated Business Systems, supra, at 275, quoting New Alaska Development Corp. v. NLRB, 441 F.2d 491, 494 (7th Cir. 1971). Given the lack of reasoning to support the Board's conclusion, we decline to enforce the bargaining order. Instead, we believe that the purposes of the Act will be better served by the holding of a new election.

Accordingly, the Board's finding that Rexair engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and 158(a)(3) is affirmed, as is its cease-and-desist order (with the one exception noted below) and the order to restore the working conditions enjoyed by Earl Fox prior to February 6, 1978. The conclusion that Rexair violated 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5) by refusing to bargain with the Union is reversed, and enforcement of the order requiring Rexair to reognize and bargain with the Union upon request (including that part of the cease and desist order requiring the Company to cease its refusal to bargain) is denied. References to bargaining will be deleted from the notice to employees that the Board ordered posted.

647 F.2d 745 (7th Cir.), April 24, 1981; certiorari denied October 13, 1981—246 NLRB 1

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Wood and Cudahy, Circuit Judges, and Marovitz, Senior District Judge*

Cudahy, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board has petitioned this court pursuant to Section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act for enforcement of an order issued against respondent, Lyon & Ryan Ford, Inc., (the "Company") for violations of Sections 8(a)(5), 8(a)(3) and 8(a)(1) of the Act. See 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), § 158(a) (1979). In its order, the Board adopted the findings and recommendations of an Administrative Law Judge[1] and concluded that respondent had recognized Automobile Mechanics Local 701, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO (the "Union") as the employees' bargaining representative. According to the Board, the Company later withdrew this recognition by demanding a "federal election" and refused to bargain with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. The Board further found that the employees' strike in response to the Company's withdrawal of recognition was an unfair labor practice strike, and that the Company's action in discharging six employees because of their involvement in that strike violated Sections 8(a)(3), and 8(a)(1). Finally, the Board determined that a Company executive's conversations with two employees' concerning their feelings about the Union constituted impermissible interrogation and also violated the provisions of Section 8(a)(1). The order which the Board seeks to enforce requires the Company to bargain with the Union on request, to reinstate the six discharged employees with backpay and to cease and desist from engaging in further violations of the National Labor Relations Act. For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that the Board's findings are supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, and therefore, we grant enforcement of the Board's order.

I.

THE FACTS

Lyon & Ryan Ford, Inc. is a new and used car dealership located in Antioch, Illinois, which employs workers in various capacities to prepare and service the cars it sells. On August 17, 1978, a representative of the Union met with certain Company employees to discuss the benefits of unionization. Several days later at a second meeting ten Company employees signed union authorization cards and applications for union membership.[2]

These cards were presented to Company President Larry Ryan by Union business representatives Donald Carlson and Ed Vaughn at an impromptu meeting on August 24, 1979. Carlson and Vaughn went to Ryan's office with a copy of a letter, allegedly in the mail, which advised the Company that a majority of its "mechanics, bodymen, painters, semi-skilled and apprentices" had designated the Union as their collective bargaining agent. The letter demanded formal recognition of the Union and commencement of negotiations for a collective bargaining agreement.

During the ensuing discussion with Ryan, Carlson clarified the composition of the proposed bargaining unit. Carlson stated that the Union traditionally represented only those employees "who turn wrenches, not anybody else." In the Ryan dealership, "the parts men, the chasers, the parts chasers, the car washers and the hikers" would be excluded, leaving approximately twelve to fourteen employees in the unit represented by the Union. Ryan personally examined each of the eleven signed union authorization cards and membership applications. He also inspected a copy of the recently expired master contract for the Chicago area and a voting information sheet which contained the changes to be included in the new, but then unpublished, master contract. Carlson briefly explained the general terms of the contract and answered Ryan's specific questions on the cost of welfare and pension provisions and the Union's insurance coverage. Before concluding the meeting, Carlson reviewed the proposed wage scale with Ryan and pointed out that the Union and the Company were not far apart on this issue. Carlson asked for another meeting and Ryan agreed.

The second meeting between representatives of the Union and the Company occurred four days later on August 28, 1978 Carlson, Vaughn, Larry Ryan and his son, Patrick, who served as general manager for the dealership, were in attendance. The discussion, once again, centered on the terms of the master contract. Larry Ryan stated that the Company's present vacation policy was better than the Union's contractural provision on the subject, but Carlson replied that he would take the good with the bad and go with a straight "701 Contract."

The focus of the meeting then shifted to the job classification of specific employees.

[2] A total of eleven authorization cards were signed by Company employees. There was evidence presented, however, that employee Mark Mantsch, whose signed card was dated August 22, 1978, did not attend the Union meeting. As a result, the Administrative Law Judge decided not to count his card for the purpose of determining the Union's majority status.

All but two of the employees were classified as mechanics, semi-skilled or apprentices. The two exceptions were Gary Wilke, whom Larry Ryan categorized as a detailer, and Mark Mantsch, a wash boy, who had been doing mechanical work under the supervision of another employee. Carlson subsequently sorted through the authorization cards and placed the cards of five employees in a pile identified as journeyman. The cards of four other employees were placed in a separate pile labeled semi-skilled and apprentices. A third pile was created for the cards of Wilke and Mantsch. Carlson commented that there was a "problem" with respect to the manner in which these individuals would be classified within the unit or whether they would be included in the unit at all. The parties then discussed the balance required between mechanics, semi-skilled and apprentices, and Carlson gave examples of the situation at other dealers. Carlson requested a third meeting to resolve the Wilke-Mantsch classification question and was then given permission to go into the shop and talk to some of the employees.[3]

Later that day, Patrick Ryan approached employee Anthony Hynous at his work station and asked about the "circumstances with the Union." Hynous replied that the employees felt the Union could obtain better benefits for them. Ryan asked if more money would do, and Hynous indicated that the employees would have to evaluate that. Ryan left with the comment that "he guessed he had some talking to do."

Similarly, on August 29, the younger Ryan called employee Michael Stern into his office and asked him what he thought about the Union. Stern answered that it sounded good, and that the Union was something the employees really wanted. Ryan then asked if money would make a difference, and Stern responded that he really didn't know.

When Carlson and Vaughn arrived for the third scheduled meeting with the Company on September 1, 1978, Larry Ryan called for a "federal election." Carlson responded that he was very disappointed with the decision since everything had been going along fine with the exception of two employees. He announced that the union didn't have the time or the need for an election and if a contract was not signed by September 12th, "there would be a work stoppage." Carlson and Vaughn then informed two unit employees that the Company wanted an election and that the employees should be prepared to strike if a contract had not been signed by September 12th.

Eleven Company employees walked off the job on September 12, 1978, and began picketing the dealership. Six of those employees received a copy of the following form letter from the Company at various times during the month of October.

> This letter is to inform you that effective ———————, we have hired an individual who will replace you on our work force. Accordingly, it will not be our intention to recall you to work at the conclusion of our labor dispute inasmuch as the new employee will be taking your place.

246 NLRB at 4.[4] The strike was still in effect on April 11, 1979, when an Administrative Law Judge conducted a hearing in this case.

From these facts, the ALJ concluded that the Union represented a majority of the employees in an appropriate unit and had satisfactorily demonstrated the status to Company President Larry Ryan, who recognized the Union as bargaining representative for unit employees on August 24, 1978. The ALJ further found that the Company had engaged in discussions and negotiations with [3] At the administrative hearing, Larry Ryan denied that he ever gave Carlson and Vaughn permission to talk to the employees on work time. But the ALJ credited the Union representatives' testimony over that of Ryan and explained:

> I was not impressed with the demeanor of Mr. Ryan or of his son Patrick Ryan who testified regarding the second and third visits Carlson and Vaughn made to Ryan's office. I found Carlson and Vaughn to be more open and cooperative on cross and their testimony appeared more logical under the circumstances. Also there were noticeable conflicts between Larry and Patrick Ryan, the most notable involving the authorization and application cards. . . . Therefore, I have discredited the testimony of Larry and Patrick Ryan to the extent it conflicts with the testimony of Carlson and Vaughn.

Ronald Blood—October 4, 1978—effective October 4, 1978
Patrick J. Cullinan—October 30, 1978—effective October 30, 1978
Anthony Hynous—October 30, 1978—effective October 30, 1978
Michael Stern—October 30, 1978—effective October 30, 1978

the Union over terms of the proposed contract on that date and on other occasions but subsequently violated Section 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act by withdrawing recognition and refusing to bargain. In addition, the ALJ found that the strike which began on September 12, 1978, resulted directly from the Company's withdrawal of recognition and was thus an unfair labor practice strike. By discriminatorily discharging six employees for their involvement in that strike, the Company violated Sections 8(a)(3) and 8(a)(1) of the Act. The ALJ also concluded that a separate 8(a)(1) violation occurred when a company executive interrogated two employees about their Union activity.[5]

On October 5, 1979, the Board issued an order adopting the findings and recommendations of the Administrative Law Judge. The order instructed Lyon & Ryan Ford, Inc., to bargain with the Union on request and to reinstate the six discharged employees with backpay from the date of their discharge letters, even if this required the release of replacement employees. The Company was also ordered to cease and desist from engaging in further violations and to post appropriate notices. The Board subsequently petitioned this Court for enforcement of the order.

II.

The scope of judicial review accorded to an NLRB order upon petition for enforcement is appropriately narrow. The National Labor Relations Act specifically directs that "the findings of the Board with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole shall be conclusive." 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). Our inquiry is thus limited to determining whether the record in its entirety provides a proper basis for the Board's decision. Although all evidence which fairly detracts from the weight of the Board's decision must be considered, it is not our function to substitute our judgment for that of the Board when its judgment is supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. See Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); NLRB v. Mars Sales & Equipment Co., 626 F.2d 567 (7th Cir. 1980); Altemose Constr. Co. v. NLRB, 514 F.2d 8 (3d Cir. 1975).

A. The Section 8(a)(5) Violation

The National Labor Relations Act authorizes two methods for the establishment of a binding bargaining relationship between an employer and a labor union. 29 U.S.C. § 159(a). Generally, NLRB certification of a union's success in an election is the more prevalent practice, but it is not the only route by which a union may acquire the status of bargaining representative. NLRB v. Newspapers, Inc., 515 F.2d 334 (5th Cir. 1975). An employer's voluntary recognition of a majority union remains "a favored element of national labor policy." NLRB v. Broadmoor Lumber Co., 578 F.2d 238, 241 (9th Cir. 1978). An employer who has not committed unfair labor practices and has not recognized a union has the right to require an election regardless of the union's showing of majority status. But once the employer recognizes the union, no matter how informally, he loses the right to require an election. NLRB v. Brown & Connolly, Inc., 593 F.2d 1373 (1st Cir. 1979);

NLRB v. Gogin, 575 F.2d 596 (7th Cir. 1978). The essence of voluntary recognition is the "commitment of the employer to bargain upon some demonstrable showing of majority [status] * * *. Once the commitment [is] made, [the employer cannot] unilaterally withdraw its recognition and to do so [is] a violation of the Act." Jeer-Dan Corp., 237 NLRB 302, 303 (1978), enforced, 601 F.2d 575 (3d Cir. 1979). Accord. Brown & Connolly, 583 F.2d at 1374; NLRB v. A. Lasaponara & Sons, Inc., 541 F.2d 992 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 430 U.S. 914, 97 S.Ct. 1325, 51 L.Ed.2d 592 (1977); Toltec Metals Inc. v. NLRB, 490 F.2d 1122 (3d Cir. 1974).

In the present case the record substantially supports the Board's conclusion that the Company recognized the Union as majority rerresentative of its mechanics, semi-skilled, apprentices, bodymen and painters when Larry Ryan checked the employees' union authorization cards and membership applications on August 24, 1978.[6] At this initial [5] This Section 8(a)(1) violation is not contested on appeal.

[6] The Company questions the finding that Ryan examined the cards at the August 24th meeting by pointing to an alleged conflict in the testimony of the two Union representatives. According to the Company, "one [of the representatives] stated that the cards were offered to Mr. Ryan in response to his questions concerning the composition of the unit they claimed to represent, * * * and the other implied that Mr. Ryan's question was more in the nature of a demand for proof of majority status."

meeting with Union representatives, Ryan also examined a copy of the proposed contract and discussed various contractual provisions. He voiced no objection to the Union as a properly designated bargaining representative, and negotiations continued at a second meeting serveral days later, in which the parties compared Union contractual provisions with current company policy and considered the job classification of employees within the proposed bargaining unit. After scheduling a third meeting to settle differences over the inclusion of two employees in the bargaining unit, Larry Ryan gave the Union representatives permission to speak to employees during working hours. This course of conduct is consistent with, and indicative of, the commitment necessary to create a bargaining relationship and warranted a finding by the Board that the Company had recognized the Union as the employees' bargaining agent.

The Company argues, however, that Ryan never recognized the Union, firts because the parties failed to agree on an appropriate bargaining unit, and second, because the Union did not represent a majority of the required employees.[7] It is undisputed that identification of an appropriate bargaining unit is a prerequisite to the determination of a union's majority status. NLRB v. SAC Constr. Co., 603 F.2d 1155 (5th Cir. 1979). In the instant case, both the ALJ and the Board concluded that the parties were in agreement as to the definition of the unit. Neither party disputes the fact that the Union demanded recognition as the bargaining agent only for the dealership's "mechanics, bodymen, painters, semiskilled and apprentices." In response to specific questions from Larry Ryan, Union representatives stated that they represented only "people who turn wrenches, not anybody else." The "parts people, the chasers, the parts chasers, the car washers and the hikers" were expressly excluded. Ryan made no objection to the scope of the unit at any time during these discussions.

The issue of job classification was discussed in greater detail at the second meeting between the parties. Union representatives explained that in a "new" shop, the employees classified themselves by describing the job they were hired to fill. Final classification, however, remained a subject a negotiation. When Ryan and Union representatives examined the job description on each employee's authorization card, agreement was reached on the classification of nine mechanics, semi-skilled and apprentices, but Ryan objected to the inclusion of Gary Wilke, a detailer, and Mark Mantsch, a wash boy, in the unit. The Company now contends that the Union's attempt to include these individuals in the bargaining unit "created confusion about the overall scope of the unit sought and made it apparent that, in the context of the realities of Respondent's employee situation, the Union's definition of the unit was ambiguous." Respondent's Br. at 24. Since a union request to bargain on behalf of an ambiguously defined unit may be fatally defective, the Company claims that Ryan never recognized the Union.

The Company's argument is unpersuasive The fact that the parties failed to agree on the inclusion within the unit of two employees does not necessarily prove that the parties failed to agree substantially on the definition or scope of the unit. In National Can Corp. v. NLRB, 374 F.2d 796 (7th Cir. 1967), this court explained, "once having defined the unit it claims to represent and having made a bargaining demand on that basis, the Union has thereby established the frame of reference for measuring the validity of its demand." Id. at 801. Here, the Union clearly defined the unit it sought to represent as "mechanics, bodymen, painters, semi-skilled and apprentices" and made a bargain-

Respondent's Br. at 17. In view of the Company's statement that "Both Union representatives testified that Mr. Ryan looked at each card handed to him [at the first meeting]", we find no meaningful conflict in this testimony which would cast doubt upon the Board's finding that Ryan examined the cards on August 24th. See Respondent's Br. at 5.

[7] The Company also attempts to justify its withdrawal of recognition on the basis of the Supreme Court's decision in Linden Lumber Div., Summer & Co. v. NLRB, 419 U.S. 301, 95 S.Ct. 429, 42 L.Ed.2d 465 (1974), which held that an employer had the right to refuse to recognize the union and to request an election on the basis of a proffered card majority. In Linden, however, the Court carefully noted that the employer and the union "had never voluntarily agreed upon any mutually acceptable and legally permissible means other than a Board conducted election for resolving the issue of union majority status." Id. at 310 n. 10, 95 S.Ct. at 434. Since the Court expressly reserved the question whether a union which possessed a card majority was required to submit to an election "if the employer breache[d] his agreement to permit majority status to be determined by means other than a Board election," the Linden decision is not controlling here. One an employer has voluntarily recognized a union, he loses his right to require an election. NLRB v. Brown & Connolly, Inc., 593 F.2d 1373 (1st Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Gogin, 575 F.2d 596 (7th Cir. 1978); NLRB v. A. Lasaponara & Sons, Inc., 541 F.2d 992 (2d Cir. 1976); Toltec Metals, Inc. v. NLRB, F.2d 1122 (3d Cir. 1974).

ing demand on the basis of authorization cards from a majority of employees in those categories.

While it is true that the Board usually groups all employees in an automotive service department into a single bargaining unit, (see, e.g., Graneto-Datsun, 203 NLRB 550 (1973)), a smaller unit is acceptable if it has been agreed to by the parties and is not repugnant to the National Labor Relations Act. Otis Hospital, Inc., 219 NLRB 164 (1975); Harvey Russell, 145 NLRB 1486 (1964). The Union in this case was a party to over three hundred similar agreements with Chicago area auto dealerships and all but two of these agreements covered the same scope of bargaining unit as defined here. The existence of these comparable units tends to negate any claim that the failure to include all automotive service personnel in the particular bargaining unit in the instant case creates any fatal frailties in the definition of the unit.

Moreover, there was substantial evidence in this case to support the Board's conclusion that the parties agreed to the smaller bargaining unit. The Company not only failed to make any objection to the scope of the unit, but also negotiated with the Union over membership within that unit. The Board has long sought to encourage parties to agree voluntarily to the coverage of an appropriate bargaining unit. NLRB v. Chelsea Clock Co., 411 F.2d 189 (1st Cir. 1969). The salutary purpose of such agreements would be frustrated if, once concluded, the parties were free to repudiate them at will. In the absence of extraordinary circumstances or a clear denial of employees' rights, neither of which are present in the instant case, we cannot sanction the subsequent repudiation of a Union's right to bargain on behalf of a smaller, yet otherwise appropriate, bargaining unit which has received the Company's implicit approval.

The Company also claims that the Board erred in concluding that Larry Ryan recognized the Union on August 24th because the Union failed to properly demonstrate its majority status. According to the Company, Ryan never examined the employees' authorization cards at the initial meeting with Union representatives. This argument relies primarily on the testimony of witness Michael Stern, a former Lyon & Ryan employee. At the hearing before the ALJ, Stern testified that he attended a Union organizational meeting on the evening of August 28th (well after August 22nd) with ten or eleven of the dealership's employees, and all of the employees present then signed union authorization cards. Stern explained further that one of the employees whose signed card had been included in the evidence before the ALJ was not present at the card-signing meeting on August 28th. The ALJ credited that portion of Stern's testimony which related to the absent employee and refused to count the employee's card when determining the Union's majority status. Stern's testimony was discredited, however, insofar as it indicated that the cards were not signed on August 22nd, the date indicated on the cards. The Company suggests that the ALJ arbitrarily selected those portions of Stern's testimony which supported the ALJ's conclusion and ignored the rest.

This court accords great weight to the credibility determinations of an administrative law judge, which are based on the first hand observations of a witness' demeanor. NLRB v. Blue Hills Cemetery, Inc., 567 F.2d 529 (1st Cir. 1977). In reviewing the ALJ's findings, however, this court should consider "the consistency and inherent probability of the testimony." Universal Camera Corp., 340 U.S. at 496, 71 S.Ct. at 468. We conclude that the discredited portions of Stern's testimony are directly contrary to the testimony of other witnesses and inherently improbable. The ALJ based his finding that the authorization cards were signed prior to the August 24th meeting on three factors: 1) the testimony of Union representatives Donald Carlson and Ed Vaughn; 2) the testimony of Company employee Anthony Hynous, which corroborated the Union representatives' testimony as to the dates of the organizational meetings; and 3) the dates entered on the cards themselves. It is not this court's function to second guess the ALJ or to retry the case on appeal when substantial evidence supports the administrative determination. After reviewing the record, we conclude that the factors outlined by the ALJ satisfy the substantial evidence test and adequately resolve any doubts raised by contrary testimony or inferences.

The course of conduct pursued by the Company following the Union's demand for recognition on August 24th supports the Board's finding that a bargaining relationship had been established. After voluntarily recognizing the Union, the Company was obligated to bargain for a reasonable period so that the relationship could be given a fair chance to succeed. Franks Bros. v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 702, 706, 64 S.Ct. 817, 819, 88 L.Ed. 1020 (1944). We believe that three meetings in seven days does not exhaust the requirement for bargaining over a reasonable period. Hence, we accept the Board's finding that the Company's request for a federal election on September 1, 1978, constituted a withdrawal of recognition and a refusl to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and enforce that portion of the Board's order.

B. The Section 8(a)(3) Violation

After the Company's unlawful withdrawal of recognition and refusal to bargain on September 1st, Union representatives informed Ryan that the employees would strike if they did not have a signed contract by September 12th. When no contract was forthcoming, eleven Company employees stuck and picketed the dealership. Less than a month later, several of the strikers received letters from the Company stating that a replacement employee had been hired and the Company had "no intention" of recalling the striking employee to work at the end of the labor dispute.

After examining the ALJ's report, the Board concluded that the strike was "caused and prolonged" by the Company's withdrawal of recognition and refusal to bargain. A strike which is caused in whole or in part by an employer's unfair labor practice is an unfair labor practice strike. NLRB v. My Store, Inc., 345 F.2d 494 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. (927, 86 S.Ct. 315, 15 L.Ed.2d 340 (1965); NLRB v. Waukesha Lime & Stone Co., 343 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1965). Unlike employees who strike for economic reasons, unfair labor practice strikers "do not lose their [employee] status and are entitled to reinstatement with backpay, even if replacements for them have been made." Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 76 S.Ct. 349, 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956). The Board therefore concluded that the letters which stated that the Company had no intention of recalling the strikers constituted notices of discharge and violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

In these enforcement proceedings the Company contends that the Board erred by ignoring evidence of the Union's express purpose in calling the strike. Relying on the testimony of a Union representative which indicated that the employees' picket signs read, "On Strike for Recognition," the Company argues that the Board failed to accord proper weight to the Union's own characterization of the strike. The Company contends that in Drug Package, Inc. v. NLRB, 570 F.2d 1340 (8th Cir. 1978), on remand, 241 NLRB No. 44 (1979), petition den. sub nom. Willenbrink v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 1088 (8th Cir. 1980), the court considered both the availability and use of picket signs bearing slogans indicating that union recognition had not taken place and rejected the Board's determination that a strike should be characterized as arising out of an unfair labor practice.

We are, however, unpersuaded by the Company's argument. A strike may be an unfair labor practice strike even though it contains some recognitional objectives. Larand Leisurelies, Inc. v. NLRB, 523 F.2d 814, 820 (6th Cir. 1975); NLRB v. Juniata Packing Co., 464 F.2d 153, 155 (3d Cir. 1972). Contrary to the Company's assertion, the Drug Package court did not reject the finding of an unfair labor practice strike because of the Union's picket sign slogans. Instead, the court, having reversed the Board's 8(a)(5) finding concluded that, "without that crucial element [an 8(a)(5) violation], the strike cannot be deemed an unfair labor practice strike." Drug Package, 570 F.2d at 1348. In the instant case, on the other hand, we have accepted the Board's determination of a Section 8(a)(5) violation. After a thorough review of the record, we also conclude that substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that the strike, although perhaps seeking some recognitional objectives, was primarily caused by the Company's unlawful withdrawal of recognition and refusal to bargain.

Finally, the Company objects to the Board's conclusion that the dealership permanently discharged and refused to reinstate six striking employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1). The Company claims that the Board failed to articulate any basis for this finding. It is the Company's position that the letter sent to the employees represented notice of replacement to economic strikers rather than notice of discharge to unfair labor practice strikers.

Having concluded that the employees were participating in a bona fide unfair labor practice strike, we need only determine whether substantial evidence supports the Board's conclusion that the letters constituted notice of discharge. The pertinent portions of the letter stated, "we have hired an individual who will replace you on our work force. Accordingly, it will not be our intention to recall you to work at the conclusion of our labor dispute inasmuch as the new employee will be taking your place." While the letter carefully avoids using the words, "discharged," "fired," or "terminated," we think the Company's purpose is clear. By indicating that the employee would not be recalled, the Company emphasized that a request for reinstatement would be futile. Under the facts of the instant case, there is no meaningful distinction between discharging an employee and permanently replacing him. Thus, the record fully supports the Board's determination that the Company discharged six unfair labor practice strikers in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1).

III.

Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act directs the Board to develop remedies which will carry out the policies of the Act. NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 346, 73 S.Ct. 287, 288, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953). Since the relation of remedy to policy in the field of unfair labor practices is a matter within the Board's particular experience and administrative competence, the courts accord wide discretion to the Board in this area. Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 194, 61 S.Ct. 845, 852, 85 L.Ed. 1271 (1941). "Unless it can be shown that the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act," the Board's determination will be affirmed. Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. NLRB, 319 U.S. 533, 540, 63 S.Ct. 1214, 1218, 87 L.Ed 1568 (1943).

In the present case, the Board, relying on its decision in Abilities & Goodwill, Inc., 241 NLRB No. 5 (1979), ordered the Company to reinstate the six unlawfully discharged employees with backpay from the date of discharge. The Company responds that this remedy, the imposition of which overrules more than thirty years of Board precedent with respect to strikers, improperly places an unreasonable burden on the employer and should be set aside. Because we think the Board could reasonably conclude that its former policy, which had the effect of sanctioning disparate treatment as between discriminatorily discharged working employees and discriminatorily discharged striking employees, is inequitable and inadequate, we affirm the Board's backpay order.

The discretion accorded the Board in devising appropriate remedies for labor violations has been most evident with respect to backpay awards. Rather than relying on rigid formulas, the Board has tried to use a more flexible approach "to attain just results in diverse, complicated situations." Phelps, 313 U.S. at 198, 61 S.Ct. at 854. In each case, the "just result" represents "a restoration of the situation, as nearly as possible, to that which would have obtained but for the illegal discrimination." Id. at 194, 61 S.Ct. at 852.

In the case of an unlawfully discharged working employee, a "just result" requires reinstatement and backpay from the date of discharge. No request for reinstatement was necessary because the Board reasoned that such a plea would fall on deaf ears. Generally, an employer would not voluntarily grant a request to rehire an individual whom he had just fired. In addition, the Board believed that the employer, who unlawfully discharged the employee in the first place, bore the onus of undoing the damage by offering the employee immediate reinstatement and reimbursement for all losses suffered from the date of the discriminatory action.

A different rule controlled, however, when the Board considered the case of an unlawfully discharged striking employee. In the absence of an unconditional offer by the employee to return to work, a "just result" included reinstatement but no backpay. For many years, this rule was applied as "established Board precedent" although it enjoyed less than unanimous Board approval.[8]

In Abilities & Goodwill, the Board (with members Pennello and Murphy dissenting) announced a change in the policy governing backpay awards.

[8] See, e.g., Bartlett-Collins Co., 230 NLRB 144 (1977); Michael Muldoon Elder, d/b/a Vorpal Galleries, 227 NLRB 446 (1976); Valley Oil Co., Inc., 210 NLRB 370 (1974); Roosevelt Roofing and Sheet Metal Works, Inc., 204 NLRB 671 (1973); Astro Electronics, Inc., 188 NLRB 572 (1971); Universal Services, Inc., 184 NLRB 381 (1970); Sea-Way Distributing, Inc., 143 NLRB 460 (1963); Elm Tree Baking Co., 139 NLRB 4 (1962); Sea View Industries, Inc., 127 NLRB 1402 (1960); Wheatland Electric Cooperative, Inc., 102 NLRB 1119 (1953); National Gas Co., 99 NLRB 273 (1952); Happ Brothers, Inc., 90 NLRB 1513 (1950); Kallaher and Mee, Inc., 87 NLRB 410 (1949); Massey Gin and Machine Works, Inc., 78 NLRB 189 (1948).

The Board declared "a discharged striker is a discharged employee and entitled to be treated as such, for there is nothing peculiar to a strike which justifies dissimilar treatment. The nature of the employer's unlawful conduct is not changed by the fact that the employee happens to be a striker at the time of discharge. "Goodwill at 3. As a result, the Board concluded that an unlawfully discharged striker is no longer required to request reinstatement to trigger an employer's backpay obligation.

The Company argues, however, that the Abilities & Goodwill remedy is inappropriate because the employer who discharges a striking employee cannot aptly be termed a "wrongdoer." After all, the Company contends, the employees would not have been "permanently replaced" if they had not engaged in the strike. This argument highlights the ambiguity inherent in the discharge of a striker. As this court recently explained:

> On the one hand, the employee may voluntarily be refraining from work, as evidenced by the fact that he was initially on strike. [I]n this case, a back pay award would more than make him whole for his unlawful discharge and thus would not be consistent with the remedial purposes of the Act. See Republic Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 7, 61 S.Ct. 77, 85 L.Ed. 6 * * * (1940). On the other hand, the employee may not have returned to work because of the unlawful discharge, thinking it futile to even ask to be reinstated.

NLRB v. Mars Sales & Equipment Co., 626 F.2d 567, 574 (7th Cir. 1980). Rather than requiring the discharged employee to engage in the presumably futile act of requesting reinstatement, we believe that the ambiguity may be resolved against the employer who committed the unfair labor practice. The employer is thus liable for backpay unless he can affirmatively establish that the unlawful discharge did not prevent the employee from returning to work.[9]

This result is not as onerous as it may appear. As in the case of any discharged employee, the employer must make an offer of reinstatement. If the striking employee thereafter refuses to return to work, the employer's position is vindicated and his backpay obligation is tolled. When the employee willfully withholds his services, the employer is thus not responsible for his corresponding loss of earnings. Even where an employer fails to offer reinstatement, he is entitled to reduce his backpay liability by presenting evidence that the employee would have refused the reinstatement offer had it been made.

Moreover, the policy we enforce here is not so much an abrupt departure from Board precedent as it is the natural evolution of the Board's efforts over the years to achieve a "just result." Several years prior to Abilities & Goodwill, the Board created a futility exception to the reinstatement rule for discharged strikers. Under this exception to the reinstatement rule for discharged strikers. Under this exception, if evidence indicated that a request for reinstatement would be futile, the striker was entitled to reinstatement with backpay even if no request had been made. See, e.g., Sigma Service Corp., 230 NLRB 316 (1977); Valley Oil Co., Inc., 210 NLRB 370 (1974). It was neither unreasonable nor unforeseeable that the Board should elect to extend this exception by creating a presumption of apparent finality of discharge in strike situations. It would appear to be a rare case where a reinstatement request by a striking employee who had just been fired would not be futile. Since the backpay award for unlawfully discharged working employees is based on an identical presumption of futility, the reasons for distinguishing logically between the two situations tend to disappear. Particularly in the instant case, where the employer unlawfully discharged employees for participating in a strike caused by the employer's unlawful withdrawal of recognition and refusal to bargain, we see no reason to deny these employees reinstatement with backpay from the date of discharge. We emphasize, however, that essentially our conclusion only supports the Board's exercise of discretion and that some other result, if arrived at by the Board pursuant to the Act, might also in the appropriate circumstances be quite defensible.

[9] We implicitly accepted this remedy in NLRB v. Mars Sales & Equipment Co., 626 F.2d 567 (7th Cir. 1980). In that case, the Board found that the Company violated Sections 8(a)(1) and (3) by discharging two employees, Metzger and Neaville, who were participating in an economic strike. Since permanent replacements had not been hired for these individuals at the time they were discharged, the Board ordered the Company to offer reinstatement to both employees with backpay from the date of their unlawful discharge. We enforced the Board's order as to employee Neaville because it was "consistent with the remedial policies of the Act." Id. at 574. We declined to enforce the Board's order as to employee Metzger, however, because Metzger had resigned from the Company during the strike.

Finally, the Company argues that the Board's retroactive application of the remedy announced in Abilities & Goodwill was improper because the strikers were discharged before the new backpay policy had been announced. We decline to adopt an unnecessary limitation on a policy which not only rectifies an apparent disparity in the treatment of discharged employees but which was also not an unforeshadowed departure by the Board from its prior line of decisions.

Generally, a decision which changes existing law or policy is given retroactive effect unless retroactive application would cause "manifest injustice." Chevron Oil Co. v. Huson, 404 U.S. 97, 92 S.Ct. 349, 30 L.Ed.2d 296 (1971). The Supreme Court has devised a three part test to identify situations in which a civil, nonconstitutional precedent should be applied on a prospective basis only:

1) Does the decision "establish a new principle of law, either by overruling clear past precedent on which the litigants may have relied, * * * or by deciding an issue of first impressin whose resolution was not clearly foreshadowed?"
2) Considering "the prior history of the rule in question, its purpose and effect," does retroactive application "further or retard" the operation of the rule?
3) Does retroactive application create "injustice or hardship" for one of the parties?

Chevron Oil Co. v. Huson, 404 U.S. 106–07, 92 S.Ct. at 355 (1971). Since there is a presumption favoring retroactivity, all three Chevron factors must support prospective application in order to limit the retroactive effect of the decision. Valencia v. Anderson Bros. Ford, 617 F.2d 1278, 1289 (7th Cir.), cert. granted, —— U.S. ——, 101 S.Ct. 395, 66 L.Ed.2d 242 (1980); Schaefer v. First Nat'l Bank, 509 F.2d 1287, 1294 (7th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 943, 96 S.Ct. 1682, 48 L.Ed.2d 186 (1976).

In the instant case, the matter seems settled for us because the new rule was not an unforeshadowed departure from the Board's previously existing practice, and the Board has sufficiently demonstrated a basis for its view that retroactive application will further rather than retard the operation of the rule. In addition, retroactive application will not create substantial injustice or undue hardship for either party. The Board finds no valid reason for distinguishing between the status of an unlawfully discharged striker and of an unlawfully discharged working employee. Contrary to the Company's claim, the rule enforced here does not provide a windfall to striking employees but merely places the burden of undoing the wrong on the wrongdoer, where it seems properly to belong.

For the foregoing reasons, we grant enforcement of the Board's order.

NLRB v. Pepsi-Cola Distributing Company of Knoxville, Tennessee, Inc.

646 F.2d 1173 (6th Cir.), May 1, 1981; rehearing denied November 21, 1981—241 NLRB 869

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before EDWARDS, Chief Judge, BROWN, Circuit Judge, and BATTISTI,[*] District Judge

EDWARDS, Chief Judge: The National Labor Relations Board petitions for enforcement of it order entered April 13, 1979, reported at 241 NLRB No. 136.

Pepsi-Cola Distributing Company of Knoxville, Tennessee, Inc. purchased a distributorship previously owned and operated by Hartman Beverage Company. For a considerable number of years, Hartman had paid its route salesmen a year-end bonus calculated at one cent per case sold by individual route salesmen during the previous year. The bonus was paid annually approaching the Christmas season and had been so paid before the union, Teamsters Local Union No. 519, negotiated a one year contract, effective November 27, 1975. At the time of these negotiations, no mention was made of the year-end bonus for route salesmen but Hartman paid the bonus in late 1975. The following year, Hartman and the union executed another contract and the bonus was discussed but no reference to it was put in the labor management contract.

[*] Honorable Frank J. Battisti, Chief Judge, United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, sitting by designation.

During the year 1976, respondent Pepsi-Cola Distributing Company purchased Hartman's business without actual knowledge of the Hartman practice of paying a one cent a case bonus to its salesmen. While the new ownership became effective February 1, 1977, and the management told the route salesmen that there would be no change in pay structure, the record indicates that the new management did not become aware of the bonus until some time in May. Respondent did not duscuss the matter with the union or with its route salesmen until some of them began asking about the bonus, at which time General Manager Moore reviewed Hartman's payroll records and found that Hartman had paid its route salesmen the full rate due under the contract and that the one cent per case bonus was paid in addition to wages under the contract. At that point, Moore informed the route salesmen that the would not pay the year-end bonus.

On complaint filed by the General Counsel alleging that the company had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act by unilaterally withholding the 1977 bonus, the Administrative Law Judge who heard this case initially found that the Christmas bonus "was essentially part of [the route salesmen's] employment as distinguished from being in nature a gift or gratuity" and that the employer was under a duty to negotiate with the union prior to effecting any change therewith, citing NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962); Leeds & Northrup Co. v. NLRB, 391 F.2d 874 (3rd Cir. 1968), unless the union had previously waived its bargaining rights. On his analysis, the ALJ concluded that the waiver clause in the contract previously signed by Hartman with the union served to relieve the successor Pepsi-Cola Distributing Company of any obligation to continue the bonus or to negotiate with the union in relation to discontinuing it in advance of doing so even though the ALJ acknowledged "that employees hired after respondent's takeover were told that their pay and conditions would remain the same." In this respect, the ALJ relied upon Bancroft-Whitney Co., Inc., 214 NLRB 57 (1974).

On review by the NLRB, a three-number panel thereof held that the Bancroft-Whitney decision was not determinative in relation to this case. Its reasoning concerning Bancroft-Whitney bears quotation here:

> * * * the Board found that the union had clearly waived any right to bargain about the payment of an annual wage dividend during the contract's duration. In that case, bargaining was extensive and the contract contained a clear and specific provision that "all wages and other benefits to be received are contained in this agreement."
> The law is settled that the right to be consulted concerning unilateral changes in terms of employment is a right given by statute and not one obtained by contract and that, it order to establish a waiver of a statutory right, there must be a showing of a clear relinquishment of the right. Whether there has been a clear relinquishment of the right is to be decided on the facts and circumstances surrounding the making of the contract.[4] Having considered all the circumstances herein, we concluded that there has been no showing that the Union relinquished its statutory right to bargain over the year-end bonus.
> [4] McDonnell Douglas Corporation, 224 NLRB 881, 887 (1976).

The Board thereupon ordered respondent to cease and desist from "unilaterally without notification of or consultation with the union discontinuing its past practice of conferring upon its route salesmen a year-end bonus" and required the respondent to pay the 1977 year-end bonus and to bargain collectively in relation to any change of practice concerning it.

While this case is not beyond dispute, we conclude that the union had a statutory right to be consulted about changes in relation to the bonus paying practices before it was discontinued and that the Board's order is consistent with Section 8(d) of the Act which requires the parties to "confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment." In the unanimous decision in NLRB v. Katz, supra, the opinion for the court said as follows:

> The duty "to bargain collectively" enjoined by § 8(a)(5) is defined by § 8(d) as the duty to "meet * * * and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment." Clearly, the duty thus defined may be violated without a general failure of subjective good faith; for there is no occasion to consider the issue of good faith if a party has refused even to negotiate in fact—"to meet * * * and confer"—about any of the mandatory subjects.[10] A refusal to negotiate in fact as to any subject which is within § 8(d), and about which the union seeks to negotiate, violates § 8(a)(5) though the employer has every desire to reach agreement with the union upon an over-all collective agreement and earnestly and in all good faith bargains to that end. We hold that an employer's unilateral change in conditions of employment under negotiation is similary a violation of § 8(a)(5), for its is a circumvention of the duty to negotiate which frustrates the objectives of § 8(a)(5) much as does a flat refusal.[11]

> In Medo the court held that the employer interfered with his employees' right to bargain collectively through a chosen representative, in violation of § 8(1), 49 Stat. 452 (now § 8(a)(1)), when it treated directly with employees and granted them a wage increase in return for their promise to repudiate the union they had designated as their representative. It further held that the employer violated the statutory duty to bargain when he refused to negotiate with the union after the employees had carried out their promise.
> May held that the employer violated § 8(1) when, after having unequivocally refused to bargain with a certified union on the ground that the unit was inappropriate, it announced that it had applied to the War Labor Board for permission to grant a wage increase to all its employees except those whose wages had been fixed by "closed shop agreements."
> Crompton-Highland Mills sustained the Board's conclusion that the employer's unilateral grant of a wage increase substantially greater than any it has offered to the union during negotiations which had ended in impasse clearly manifested bad faith and violated the employer's duty to bargain.

369 U.S. at 742–743, 82 S.Ct. at 1111–1112.

The dissent in this case relies upon NLRB v. Southern Materials Co., 447 F.2d 15 (4th Cir. 1971). There on somewhat similar facts, enforcement of a Board order to pay Christmas bonuses was denied. In that case, however, the bonuses were small and consistent with being Christmas gifts, as opposed to part of regular compensation.

In our instant case, Pepsi-Cola has assured employees that their compensation would be the same as it has been under the Hartman administration. Additionally, it appear clear to use that the year-end payments were not mere bonuses, but were a regularly calculated part of the route salesmen's compensation, based upon a formula of one cent per case. Thus, what we deal with here, as opposed to Southern Materials, in a unilateral management change of one of the fundamental issues of collective bargaining; namely, wages.

On this record, where a successor employer has promised to continue previously established compensation, a general waiver clause, which does not refer specifically to waiver of a portion of the promised compensation, should not be regarded as a clear and unmistakable waiver of the union's right to collective bargaining.

The petition of the Board to enforce its order is hereby granted.

BAILEY BROWN, Circuit Judge, dissenting: I respectfully dissent.

The precise issue before the Board was whether Pepsi-Cola, as a successor employer that adopted the existing collective bargaining contract effective November 1976-November 1977, committed an unfair labor practice under Section 8(a)(5) by its failure to bargain with respect to the payment of the 1977 Christmas bonus. I recognize that the Union's statutory right to bargain cannot be held to have been waived unless such result is required by the provisions of the collective bargaining contract and the surrounding circumstances. The ALJ determined that the right to bargain was waived by the clear terms of the contract and that the surrounding circumstances did not support a different result. The Board determined that the contract was not clear as to waiver of the right to bargain, and that moreover, the surrounding circumnstances did not support a waiver by the Union. In my view, under the collective bargaining contract the parties waived the right to bargain by language that could not have been clearer had it been written by Abraham Lincoln and etched in stone. Moreover, there was nothing in the surrounding circumstances that supported a different result.

I would agree, as the ALJ determined, that this bonus, though not mentioned in the contract, was not a gratuity and had become part of Hartman's (the predecessor employer's) wage structure. It might well be that, if the Union had taken this bonus issue to arbitration, it should have prevailed. It could have possibly prevailed either on the theory that the bonus claim had not been waived by the contract or on the theory that, even if so waived, Pepsi-Cola in effect "waived the waiver" when it obtained some information from Hartman about the bonus in May of 1977 and did not then take the matter upon with the Union. (In May, Pepsi-Cola did receive information from Hartman about the bonus, but it was incorrect; the information was that the route salesmen were paid one cent per case less than the contract rate and that this amount was accumulated and paid as a "bonus" at the end of the year.) But, as I have indicated, the question before the Board was not whether the Union had effectively waived the right to the bonus but rather whether the Union has waived the right to bargain with respect to the bonus. It was not for the Board to determine whether Pepsi-Cola was bound to pay the bonus where, as here, there was an arbitration provision in the contract to resolve such disputes. See N.L.R.B. v. C & C Plywood Corp., 385 U.S. 421, 87 S.Ct. 559, 17 L.Ed.2d 486 (1967), at 426–428, 87 S.Ct. at 562–564.

[11] Compare Medo Corp. v. Labor Board, 321 U.S. 678, 64 S.Ct. 830, 88 L.Ed. 1007; May Department Stores v. Labor Board, 326 U.S. 376, 66 S.Ct. 203, 90 L.Ed. 145; Labor Board v. Crompton Highland Mills, 337 U.S. 217, 69 S.Ct. 960, 93 L.Ed. 1320.

First, I will deal with the terms of the collective bargaining contract and then with the surrounding circumstances.

The operative provision of this contract provided as follows:

> Section 2. The Employer and the Union agree that all matters desired by either party have been presented, discussed and incorporated herein or rejected. Accordingly, it is agreed that for the life of this Agreement each party voluntarily and unqualifiedly waives the right and each agrees that the other shall not be obligated to bargain collectively with respect to any subject or matter, whether or not referred to in this Agreement. (Emphasis supplied.)

In N.L.R.B. v. Southern Materials Co., 447 F.2d 15 (4th Cir. 1971), the Fourth Circuit found the following clause to be a "clear and unmistakable" waiver of the union's right to negotiate about Christmas bonuses. The clause in Southern Materials stated (at 17):

> The Company and the Union, for the life of this Agreement, each voluntarily and unqualifiedly waives the right and each agrees that the other shall not be obligated to bargain collectively with respect to any subject matter referred to or covered in this Agreement or with respect to any subject matter not specifically referred to or covered in this Agreement. 447 F.2d at 17.

There is no difference of consequence between the waiver clause presented here and the waiver clause before the court in Southern Materials.

As stated, there is nothing in the surrounding circumstances that could be interpreted as a waiver of this waiver provision. It is without dispute that Pepsi-Cola had no knowledge of this practice of Hartman of paying a Christmas bonus when Pepsi-Cola bought this business and adopted this collective bargaining contract, which did not mention bonus, in February of 1977. Pepsi-Cola did, in adopting this contract, verbally assure that compensation of employees would continue as under Hartman, but it obviously meant the compensation set out in the contract would be paid. Pepsi-Cola did receive some incorrect information about the bonus from Hartman, as before stated, in May of 1977 and did not consult with the Union about it. But the only effect this could have possibly had on the rights of these parties would be to create a waiver of its contract right not to pay the bonus. It could not effect a waiver of Pepsi-Cola's contract right not to bargain with respect to the bonus.

Even if the Board were correct in determining that Pepsi-Cola was guilty of an unfair labor practice in failing to bargain with respect to the bonus, it is doubtful that it had the authority to in effect, adjudicate the obligation of Pepsi-Cola to pay the bonus (see C & C Plywood Corp., supra, 385 U.S. at 428, 87 S.Ct. at 564) rather than to order Pepsi-Cola to bargain. In any case, the Board exercised some overkill when, in spite of Pepsi-Cola's strong position, it ordered Pepsi-Cola to pay the 1977 bonus rather than to bargain with respect to it and when, in spite of the fact that the parties had settled the bonus issue as to future years, it ordered Pepsi-Cola to bargain as to future years.

For these reasons, I respectfully dissent and would deny enforcement.

NLRB v. Clerks and Checkers Local No. 1583, International Longshoremen's Association, AFL–CIO

644 F.2d 408 (5th Cir.), May 4, 1981—243 NLRB 8

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before GODBOLD, Chief Judge, HATCHETT, Circuit Judge and MARKEY, Chief Judge*

409

GODBOLD, Chief Judge: The union local, affiliated with the International Longshoremen's Association, represents stevedoring clerks and checkers in the Jacksonville, Florida area. This local was a party to collective bargaining agreements with the Jacksonville Maritime Association, Inc. The agreements incorporated by reference trust provisions of collective bargaining agreements between the Association and ILA Local No. 1408, which represents longshoremen in the Jacksonville area. The provisions required the signatory association employers to make welfare, vacation, and pension contributions to the ILA Welfare, Vacation and Pension Fund for the benefit of eligible union members. The Fund is a joint trust fund administered by a board of six trustees, three appointed by the ILA and three by the Association.

In an unfair labor practice case brought against the union local, the Board found that the union had violated §§ 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by refusing to refer employee Beckham for employment through its exclusive referral service and that the referral system illegally conditioned referral priority upon union membership. The Board ordered the union and its representatives to make Beckham whole for any loss of pay suffered by reason of the discriminatory refusal to refer him.

The Board's General Counsel, the union and Beckham reached an agreement on the amount of back pay owed Beckham and the amount of contributions to be paid to the Fund to prevent his suffering loss of contractual fringe benefits. The General Counsel, the union, and the Fund and its trustees then entered into a stipulation regarding compliance with the Board's order. The union and the Fund stipulated that: they had no objection to the Board's order, which they conceded was valid in all respects; the union and General Counsel had agreed on the amount of contributions that the union was willing to pay; the only compliance issue that has arisen was that the Fund refused to accept the retroactive contributions on Beckham's behalf. It was stipulated that the Board's Regional Director would bring a supplemental proceeding in which the Fund was guaranteed the right to intervene and that in the event judicial proceedings were necessary to enforce the Board's determination of compliance the only issue before the court would be that of the Fund's refusal to accept the contributions.

The Regional Director issued a back pay specification setting out the fringe contributions to be paid and alleging that but for the union's unlawful discrimination employer members of the Association would have forwarded the contributions for Beckham during the relevant period and the Fund would have been required under the collective bargaining agreements to accept them. The Fund filed its answer setting forth several defenses.[1]

The case was transferred to the Board, and the General Counsel moved for summary judgment. The Fund objected to summary judgment on the ground that no provisions had been made for payment of interest, insurance premiums, and costs and additional administrative expenses that might arise and that the Fund should be made whole for these items.

The Board granted summary judgment. It found that for purposes of accepting fringe benefits contributions the Fund was an agent of the union and the signatory contributing employers, and as such was required to accept the contributions. The Board found merit to the Fund's financial objections and ordered the union to compensate the Fund for administrative costs and other expenses and loss of interest occasioned as a result of the Fund's acceptance of the retroactive contribution.

*Honorable Howard T. Markey, of the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, sitting by designation.

[1] The Fund was denied due process because it was not a party to the Board's original order; a compliance order against the fund would jeopardize the status of the Fund under Internal Revenue and Department of Labor laws and regulations; the Fund lacked authority to accept the contributions because acceptance would violate the Labor Management Relations Act; acceptance of the funds would be a prohibited transaction under ERISA; a retroactive participation in the Fund would deprive participants of the right to interest and income that would have been earned had the contributions been made when required; the Fund would incur additional administrative expenses and costs in providing retroactive benefits to Beckham; a compliance order would establish a bad precedent; the Fund can deny retroactive coverage in order to achieve economic stability and maintain maximum earning potential.

The Board has moved for an enforcement order. The Fund contends that the Board had no jurisdiction or authority to order the Fund to accept the contributions. The Board's predicate for bringing the Fund in as a party and for entering an order against it is that for the limited purpose of accepting contributions the Fund is an agent of both union and employer. We agree. See Local 138, International Union of Operating Engineers v. NLRB 321 F.2d 130, 137 (2d Cir 1963); Local 38, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, 194 NLRB No. 17, 1972 NLRB Dec. ¶ 23, 634; Local 80, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, 161 NLRB No. 7, 1967 NLRB Dec. ¶ 20, 806. But see NLRB v. United Brotherhood of Carpenters, 531 F.2d 424, 426–27 (9th Cir. 1976).

When implementing back pay awards the Board is granted broad discretion in formulating remedies to make employees whole and to effectuate the policies of the Act, Golden State Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 414 U.S. 168, 94 S.Ct. 414, 38 L.Ed.2d 388 (1973); NLRB v. Pilot Freight Carriers, Inc., 604 F.2d 375 (5th Cir 1979). For the limited purpose of accepting contributions, the Fund is a mere receptacle into which the union must pay contributions in order to carry out the Board's back pay order and make the employee-beneficiaries whole for the union's unfair labor practice.

This limited agency of the Fund to receive contributions does not conflict with common law principles relating to fiduciaries or with ERISA provisions requiring that trustees of such a fund not be subject to the control of any other person or organization. It does not extend to discretionary decisions of the trustees involving investment of trust funds or determination of eligibility requirements for benefits,[2] see Agro v. Joint Plumbing Industry Bd., 623 F.2d 207 (2d Cir. 1980); Pierce v. NECA–IBEW Welfare Trust Fund, 620 F.2d 589 (6th Cir. 1980); Gordon v. ILWU–PMA Benefit Funds, 616 F.2d 433 (9th Cir. 1980). Moreover, because the union and not the Fund must pay the costs associated with processing the contributions, compliance with the Board order and acceptance of the contributions fall squarely within the fiduciary duty imposed on the Fund's trustees by both ERISA and the common law: to administer the trust solely in the interest of its beneficiaries, 29 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(1); Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 170. It is hornbook law that trustees have a duty to take possession of trust property as soon as reasonably possible. G. C. Bogert & G. T. Bogert, Law of Trusts, § 97 (5th ed. 1973).

The Fund also urges that it was deprived of due process in the initial determination by the Board of the fact of the employer's obligation to make contributions and the amount of the contributions. It is difficult to understand how the Fund had any interest in this part of the proceeding, and, moreover, it has agreed that it does not controvert these aspects of the Board's actions. The Fund became a party in interest only in the remedy proceedings, and it was brought in as a party and participated. The Fund now contends that it was entitled to be a party in the ascertainment of the amount of contributions because it does not maintain a separate account for each employee, as the Board either assumed or found, but rather that all funds received are comingled and income is earned on the total pool of funds at variable and varying rates, and differing levels of benefits are paid and credited to the different beneficiaries from time to time paid from this common account. Thus the Fund contends that the raw calculation of the amount to be paid in cannot be correct. The Fund couples with this an argument that the Board's order that the union shall be responsible for costs and expenses is not a sufficient protection to it.

In oral argument the Fund asserts that retroactive payment of contributions into its single general account will necessitate recalculating thousands of benefits heretofore paid and that this undertaking is in a practical sense an impossible task and enormously expensive. The short answer to this due process argument is that it was not raised by the Fund as an issue when it appeared as a party before the Board. Even if due process was an issue the contention now made that it will be necessary to go back and recalculate all benefits that have been paid since the contribution for Beckham should have been made, and that this task is an impossible one and the costs thereof astronomical, are arguments not made in this case until the case was on appeal and even then not clearly presented until oral agrument.

---

[2] We need not decide whether the Fund's limited agency extends to decisions by the trustees to refuse to accept contributions ordered by the Board where the Fund's administrative and processing costs in receiving and handling the contributions will exceed those normally incurred in handling contributions generally and the Board has not ordered the union to pay these costs to the extent they are extraordinary. In this case the Board ordered the union to pay any excess costs.

On certiorari to 6th Cir.

402

J. Albert Woll, Laurence Gold, and George Kaufmann filed a brief for the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations as amicus curiae urging affirmance.

JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

In Atkinson v. Sinclair Refining Co., 370 U.S. 238 (1962), the Court held that § 301 (a) of the Labor Management Relations Act. 1947, 61 Stat. 156, 29 U.S.C. § 185(a) does not authorize a damages action against individual union officers and members with their union is liable for violating a no-strike clause in a collective-bargaining agreement. We expressly reserved the question whether an employer might maintain a suit for damages against "individual defendants acting not in behalf of the union but in their personal and nonunion capacity" where their "unauthorized individual action" violated the no-strke provision of the collective-bargaining agreement. 370 U.S. at 249 n. 7. We granted certiorari to decide this important question of federal labor law, 449 U.S. 898 (1980).

I.

Petitioners are three companies engaged in the transportation by truck of motor vehicles. All three are parties to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Teamsters Union the covers operations at their respective facilities in Flint,

403

Mich. Respondents are employees of petitioners and members of Teamsters Local Union No. 332. The collective-bargaining agreement contains a no-strike clause,[1] and subjects all disputes to a binding grievance and arbitration procedure.

On June 8, 1976, respondents commenced a wildcat strike, because they believed that "the union was not properly representing them in * * * negotiations for amendments to the collective-bargaining agreement." 614 F.2d 1110, 1111 (CA6 1980). Soon thereafter, petitioners brought this § 301 (a) action in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, seeking injunctive relief and "damages against the [employees], in their individual capacity, for all losses arising out of the unlawful work stoppage and for attorneys fees." App. 21. Petitioners alleged that the strike was neither authorized nor approved by the union and, therefore, sought no damages from the union. See 614 F.2d. at 1115; App. 18, 20–21. After a hearing the District Court found that "the issue which had caused the work stoppage was not arbitrable" because it was "an internal dispute between factions in the Local." App. to Pet. for Cert. 15a-16a. and accordingly denied preliminary injunctive relief, citing Boys Markets, Inc., v. Retail Clerks, 398 U.S. 235 (1970).[2]

Following additional hearings and settlement of the "internal dispute." the District Court concluded that "the work stoppage continued only because of a dispute between the Local and [petitioners] over amnesty for the strikers [and that] this issue was arbitrable." App. to Pet. for Cert. 16a. The court therefore, issued a preliminary injunction, enjoining continuation of the strike. Respondents obeyed the order and returned to work on June 21, 1976.

Nine months later, respondents moved to dissolve the preliminary injunction and to dismiss the complaint for damages. Relying on this Court's intervening decision in Buffalo Forge Co. v. Steelwork-

[1] The no-strike clause provides that "[t]he Unions and the Employees agree that their shall be no strike, tie-up of equipment slowdowns or walkouts on the part of the employees, nor shall the Employer use any method of lockout or legal proceeding without first using all possible means of a settlement, as provided for in this Agreement, of any controversy which might arise." See Exhibit A to Complaint of Complete Auto Transit, Inc., 24–25.

[2] In Boys Markets, Inc., v. Retail Clerks, 398 U.S., at 253–254, this Court held that the Norris-LaGuardia Act's prohibition against enjoining strikes does not apply where the "collective-bargaining contract contains a mandatory grievance adjustment or arbitration procedure," where the grievance is subject to arbitration, and where the usual requirements for obtaining equitable relief have been satisfied.

ers, 428 U.S. 397 (1976),[3] the District Court dissolved the injunction on the ground that the work stoppage was not precipitated by an arbitrable issue. App. to Pet. for Cert. 18a. The court also dismissed petitioners' claim for damages, holding that "an employer may not sue his employees for monetary relief for breach of the collective bargaining agreement * * * whether or not the union may also be liable." Id., at 16a.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit reversed the District Court's dissolution of the injunction, holding that an injunction may be granted even where the issue which precipitated the strike was nonarbitrable provided an arbitrable issue, other than the simple legality of the strike itself, caused the continuation of the strike with the purpose of "compel[ling] the employer to concede on the arbitrable issue." 614 F.2d, at 1114. Petitioners do not seek review of this part of the Court of Appeals' ruling.[4]

The Court of Appeals affirmed the District Court's dismissal of petitioners' claim for damages from the individual union members. Relying principally on the legislative history of § 301, the Court of Appeals concluded that Congress had not intended through § 301 to "create a cause of action for damages against individual union members for breach of a no-strike agreement." 614 F.2d, at 1116. We agree.

II

Since Textile Workers v. Lincoln Mills, 353 U.S. 448 (1957), it has been settled that § 301(a)[5] does more than confer jurisdiction on federal courts to decide lawsuits alleging violations of collective-bargaining agreements. Section 301(a) also "authorizes federal courts to fashion a body of federal law for the enforcement of these collective bargaining agreements." Textile Workers v. Lincoln Mills, 353 U.S., at

406

451. Lincoln Mills defined the mode of analysis for fashioning this body of federal law as follows:

> "The Labor Management Relations Act expressly furnishes some substantive law. It points out what the parties may or may not do in certain situations. Other problems will lie in the penumbra of express statutory mandates. Some will lack express statutory sanctions but will solved by looking at the policy of the legislation and fashioning a remedy that will effectuate that policy. The range of judicial inventiveness will be determined by the nature of the problem." Id., at 457.

Of course, "Lincoln Mills did not envision any freewheeling inquiry into what the federal courts might find to be the most desirable rule, irrespective of congressional pronouncements." Howard Johnson Co. v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees, 417 U.S. 249, 255 (1974). Rather, it is clear that in fashioning federal law under § 301(a) substantial deference should be paid to revealed congressional intention. See Atkinson v. Sinclair Refining Co., 370 U.S., at 248–249.

In Atkinson, the court relied on the intent of Congress in passing § 301(b) to hold that individual union members may not be sued for damages where the union has breached the no-strike provision of its collective-bargaining agreement. Section 301(b) states in pertinent part that "[a]ny money judgment against a labor organization * * * shall be enforceable only against the organization as an entity and against its assets, and shall not be enforceable against any individual member or his assets." Thus, in Atkinson, we noted that "in discharging the duty Congess imposed on us to formulate the federal law to govern § 301(a) suits, we are strongly guided by and do not give a niggardly reading to § 301(b)." Ibid. Accordingly, we consulted and relied on the legislative history of § 301(b) which made it "clear that th[e] third clause [of § 301(b)] was a deeply felt congressonal reaction against the Danbury Hatters case * * * and an expression of legislative determination that the aftermath * * * of that decision was not to be permitted to recur." Id., at 248.[6] Similarly, in deciding the question presented, in this case, we "discharg[e] the duty Congress imposed on us to formulate the federal law to govern § 301(a) suits," id., at 248–249, by looking to the "penumbra" of § 301(b), 353 U.S., at 457, as informed by its legislative history. See Howard Johnson Co. v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees, supra, at 255.

[3] In Buffalo Forge Co. v. Steelworkers, 428 U.S., at 407 (emphasis in original), this Court held that the Federal District Court properly refused to enjoin a sympathy strike because "the strike was not over any dispute between the Union and the employer that was even remotely subject to the arbitration provisions of the contract." The Court further held that, even though the "dispute whether the sympathy strike violated the Union's no-strike undertaking * * * was arbitrable," injunctive relief was not warranted, since to hold otherwise "would cut deeply into the policy of the Norris-LaGuardia Act and make the courts potential participants in a wide range of arbitrable disputes." Id., at 410.

[4] We express no view on whether the Court of Appeals' ruling was correct.

[5] Section 301, as set forth in 29 U.S.C. § 185, states in pertinent part:

"(a) Suits for violation of contracts between an employer and a labor organization representing employees in an industry affecting commerce as defined in this chapter, or between any such labor organizations, may be brought in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties, without respect to the amount in controversy or without regard to the citizenship of the parties.

"(b) Any labor organization which represents employees in an industry affecting commerce as defined in this chapter and any employer whose activities affect commerce as defined in this chapter shall be bound by the acts of its agents. Any such labor organization may sue or be sued as an entity and in behalf of the employees whom it represents in the courts of the United States. Any money judgment against a labor organization in a district court of the United States shall be enforceable only against the organization as an entity and against its assets, and shall not be enforceable against any individual member or his assets."

Section 301(b) by its terms prohibits a money judgment entered against a union from being enforced against individual union members. See Atkinson v. Sinclair Refining Co., supra. It is a mistake to suppose that Congress thereby suggested by negative implication that employees should be held liable where their union is not liable for the strike. See Sinclair Oil Corp. v. Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, 452 F.2d 49, 52 (CA7 1971). Although lengthy and complex, the legislative history of § 301 clearly reveals Congress' intent to shield individual employees from liability for damages arising from their breach of the no-strike clause of a collective-bargaining agreement, whether or not the union participated in or authorized the illegality. Indeed, Congress intended this result even though it might leave the employer unable to recover for his losses. See Atkinson v. Sinclair Refining Co., supra, at 248.

The legislative history of § 301 begins with a review of congressional efforts in the year prior to adoption of the Labor Management Relations Act. Section 10 of the Case bill H.R. 4908. 79th Cong., 2d Sess. (1946), passed by both Houses of Congress, but vetoed by the President in 1946, was "the direct antecedent of § 301." Charles Dowd Box Co. v. Courtney, 368 U.S. 502, 509 (1962). Since § 10 "contained provisions substantially the same * * * as the provisions of § 301," ibid., its legislative history is highly relevant in ascertaining congressional intent with respect to § 301, see id., at 511–512.

The purpose of § 10 was "to establish a mutual responsibility when the collective-bargaining process has resulted in a contract." 92 Cong. Rec. 838 (1946) (remarks of Rep. Case). As introduced in the House, § 10 provided for collective-bargaining agreements to be enforceable "against each of the parties thereto."[7] The Senate adopted a bill which encompassed the purposes of § 10 the House version and which, in addition, explicitly permitted an employer to discharge an employee who participated in a strike which was not authorized by the [6] In the Danbury Hatters case, "an antitrust treble damage action was brought against a large number of union members, including union officers and agents, to recover from them the employer's losses in a nationwide, union-directed boycott of his hats. The union was not named as a party, nor was judgment entered against it. A large money judgment was entered, instead, against the individual defendants for participating in the plan 'emanating from headquarters' * * *, by knowingly authorizing and delegating authority to the union officers to do the acts involved. In the debates, Senator Ball, one of the Act's sponsors, declared that § 301, 'by providing that the union may sue and be sued as a legal entity, for a violation of contract, and the liability for damages will lie against union assets only, will prevent a repetition of the Danbury Hatters case, in which many members lost their homes.'" Atkinson v. Sinclair Refining Co., 370 U.S., at 248. See Savings Bank of Danbury v. Loewe, 242 U.S. 357 (1917); Lawlor v. Loewe, 235 U.S. 522 (1915); Loewe v. Lawlor, 208 U.S. 274 (1908).

[7] Section 10 of the Case bill provided:

"All collective-bargaining contracts shall be mutually and equally binding and enforceable either at law or in equity against each of the parties thereto, any other law to the contrary notwithstanding. In the event of a breach of any such contract or of any agreement contained in such contract by either party thereto, then in addition to any other remedy or remedies existing either in law or equity, a suit for damages for such breach or for injunctive relief in equity may be maintained by the other party or parties in any United States district court having jurisdiction of the parties. If the defendant against whom action is sought to be commenced and maintained is a labor organization, such action may be filed in the United States district court of any district wherein any officer of such labor organization resides or may be found." H.R. 5262, 79th Cong., 2d Sess. (1946).

Representative Case explained that the "parties" against whom a "suit for damages" would lie were limited to the employer and to "the recognized bargaining agent rather than an individual." 92 Cong. Rec. 765 (1946).

union.[8] Senator Taft, principal proponent of the provision, explained:

> "If the union violates its collective bargaining-agreement, it is responsible, but no individual member is responsible, and he can in no way be deprived of his rights. But if the union tries to keep its contract and, in violation of its undertaking, some of its members proceed to strike, then the employer may fire those members and they do not have the protection of the Wagner Act." 92 Cong. Rec. 5705–5706 (1946).

Thus the Senator stopped short of proposing that individual employees be held liable in damages for engaging in unauthorized strikes.

The House's subsequent consideration of the Senate's version reflected its clear understanding of the Senate's limitation on employers' remedies. Representative Case explained the Senate amendment on the floor of the House:

> "Individual members of a union are not made liable for any money judgment, I might point out, but only the union as an entity. If employees strike in violation of their agreement, the only individual penalty that can be employed is the forfeiture of their right to employment under that contract which is cured when the employer re-employs them." Id., at 5930–5931 (emphasis added).[9]

The House then passed the Senate version. In doing so, the House, like the Senate, clearly intended to protect employees from the sanction of a suit for damages for a strike in breach of the collective-bargaining agreement, whether or not the union participated in or authorized the strike. It is true that the President vetoed this bill and that his veto was sustained. Nevertheless, the substantial similarity between the pertinent language of the Case bill as passed by Congress and of § 301 as it reads today makes the legislative history of the Case bill vitally significant to a full understanding of the policy behind § 301(b).

Six months after the veto, Congress began work on the legislation which became § 301.[10] The bill ultimately passed by the House created a federal cause of action for breach of a collective-bargaining agreement.[11] The

---

[8] Senate Amendent No. 3 to H.R. 4908, passed by the Senate, stated in pertinent part:

"(a) Suits for violation of a contract concluded as the result of collective bargaining between an employer and a labor organization if such contract affects commerce as defined in this act may be brought in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties.

"(b) Any labor organization whose activities affect commerce as defined in this act shall be bound by the acts of its duly authorized agents acting within the scope of their authority from the said labor organization and may sue or be sued as an entity and in behalf of the employee whom it represents in the courts of the United States: Provided, That any money judgment against such labor organization shall be enforceable only against the organization as an entity and against its assets, and shall not be enforceable against any individual member or his assets.

* * * * *

"(d) Any employee who participates in a strike or other stoppage of work in violation of an existing collective-bargaining agreement, if such strike or stoppage is not ratified or approved by the labor organization party to such agreement and having exclusive bargaining rights for such employee, shall lose his status as an employee of the employer party to such agreement for the purposes of section 8, 9, and 10 of the National Labor Relations Act: Provided, That such loss of status for such employee shall cease if and when he is reemployed by such employer." 92 Cong. Rec. 5705 (1946).

[9] Representative Halleck echoed Representative Case:

"Mr. Speaker, there is substituted for that [the provision] which has to do with the responsibility of the individual who goes out on a wildcat strike in violation of a contract and in violation of the wishes of his organization. All we say is that if he breaches his contract as an individual in that manner, his employer does not have to take him back unless he wants to. What is the matter with that[?]" Id., at 5932.

[10] In the House, Representative Case introduced a bill containing a provision establishing federal-court jurisdiction over actions for breaches of collective-bargaining agreements. Subsections (a) and (b) were virtually identical to their counterparts in the bill passed in the previous session of Congress. As Representative Case explained the bill before the House Committee on Education and Labor, "there is no provision for suing individual workers, as such, or rendering any judgment against them." Hearings before the House Committee on Education and Labor on Amendments to the National Labor Relations Act, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 125 (1947). Instead, wildcat strikers would be subject to discharge. Ibid.

Representative Case's testimony before the House Committee is also instructive:

"Mr. LANDIS. I agree that you can deny the members the rights of the Wagner Act, but say there is one coal mine—we had an instance in Indiana where one coal mine went out on a wildcat strike, and the United Mine Workers organization did not like it, and they tried to get the men to go back to work, and they would not go back to work and still refused to go back to work for several days.

"Who would you sue in that case?

"Mr. CASE. Of course, I would think the United Mine Workers, as an organization, would have a pretty good defense to any suit for damages against them, if they ordered the men back to work.

"It would seem to me, if you had a local that went out on strike, and they were parties to a contract, the local would be liable for damages." Id., at 126.

Continued

Committee Report explained that "actions and proceedings involving violations of contracts between employers and labor organizations may be brought by either party." H.R. Rep. No. 245, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 45–46 (1947). Section 302(b) also contained express language precluding enforcement against individuals of judgments entered against unions.[12] In addition, the bill included an amendment to § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act providing that "violations of collective bargaining-agreements" would not be protected under the Act. H.R. 3020, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. (1947), § 7(a), thereby allowing employers to discharge wildcat strikers.[13] The House bill also included a provision, however, which allowed an employer to recover damages from individual employees. Section 12 created a damages action against any person engaging in an unlawful concerted activity. The bill defined "unlawful concerted activities" to include, inter alia, jurisdictional strikes, sympathy strikes, and certain picketing activities.

Significantly, however, the Senate rejected the House's imposition in § 12 of damages liability against individuals for unlawful concerted activity, and a Conference Committee adopted the Senate version.[14] The Senate counterpart to § 12 of the House bill was § 303. Senator Taft offered a floor amendment to § 303 which would have established a damages action against individuals who engage in certain types of unlawful concerted activity such as secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes, 93 Cong. Rec. 4900 (1947). In a critical exchange during the debate on the proposed amendment, Senator Taft altered the language to limit damages actions to claims against unions, in order to conform with § 301(b) and bar imposition of individual damages liability against employees:

> "Mr. MORSE: [T]he proposal of the Senator from Ohio would open wide the doors of the Federal courts to damage suits against any person who engaged in a strike or attempted to persuade other employees to engage in a strike for one of the prohibited objectives.
> "The proposal would very definitely take us back at least 40 years and we would again have the spectacle of mass suits against employees, similar to the infamous Danbury Hatters case. Senators will recall that in that case some 150 members of the union were sued by their employer and the Supreme Court of the United States sustained a judgment against them in the neighborhood of a quarter million dollars * * *.

"(a) Any action for or proceeding involving a violation of an agreement between an employer and a labor organization or other representative of employees may be brought by either party in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties, without regard to the amount in controversy, if such agreement affects commerce, or the court otherwise has jurisdiction of the cause." H.R. 3020, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. (as passed by the House) (1947).

[12] Section 302(b) stated:

"(b) Any labor organization whose activities affect commerce shall be bound by the acts of its agents, and may sue or be sued as an entity and in behalf of the employees whom it represents in the courts of the United States. Any money judgment against a labor organization in a district court of the United States shall be enforeceable only against the organization as an entity and against its assets, and shall not be enforceable against any individual member or his assets." H.R. 3020, supra.

[13] The Committee Report stated that "[t]he committee has revised this section by writing into it in express terms that employees who strike or engage in similar activities in violation of collective-bargaining agreements * * * forfeit the protection of the Labor Act." H.R. Rep. No. 245, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 27 (1947).

[14] The Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare had earlier reported a bill creating a federal cause of action for breach of a collective-bargaining agreement. It stated in pertinent part:

"Sec. 301(a) Suits for violation of contracts concluded as the result of collective bargaining between an employer and a labor organization representing employees in an industry affecting commerce as defined in this act may be brought in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties, without respect to the amount in controversy or without regard to the citizenship of the parties.

"(b) Any labor organization which represents employees in an industry affecting commerce as defined in this Act may sue or be sued in its common name in the courts of the United States: Provided, That any money judgment against such labor organization shall be enforceable only against the organization as an entity and against its assets, and shall not be enforceable against any individual member or his assets." H.R. 3020, supra.

> lieu thereof 'labor organization,' so the action will be open only against labor organizations promoting this type of strike." Id., at 4839–4841.[15]

The Senate passed this version of the bill, foreclosing individual damages liability in both § 301 and § 303 lawsuits.

At conference, the Conference Committee squarely rejected § 12 of the House bill in favor of § 303 of the Senate bill, thereby refusing to create a damages action against individual employees for the condcut prohibited in that section. In addition, the Committee deleted the provision in the House bill which had removed protection under § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act for concerted activity in breach of a collective-bargaining agreement for the stated reason that the provision was unnecessary in light of recent decisions of the National Labor Relations Board. Those provisions had held that "strikes in violation of collective bargaining contracts were not concerted activities protected by the act and [the NLRB had] refused to reinstate employees discharged for engaging in such activities." H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 510, 80th 415 Cong., 1st Sess., 39 (1947). The Committee, therefore, opted for a discharge remedy for violations of § 303 by individuals, rather than for the damages remedy that had been proposed by the House. At the same time, it preferred discharge as the employer's remedy under § 301 where employees violate the no-strike provision of their collective-bargaining agreement.[16]

Thus, while § 301(b) explicitly addresses only union-authorized violations of a collective-bargaining agreement the "penumbra" of § 301(b). Textile Workers v. Lincoln Mills, 353 U.S., at 457, as informed by its legislative history, establishes that Congress meant to exclude individual strikers from damages liability, whether or not they were authorized by their union to strike.[17] The legislative debates and the process of legislative amendment demonstrate that Congress deliberately chose to allow a damages remedy for breach of the 416 no-strike provision of a collective-bargaining agreement only against unions, not individuals, and, as to unions, only when they participated in or authorized the strike. See Carbon Fuel Co. v. Mine Workers, 444 U.S. 212, 216 (1979). Congress itself balanced the competing advantages and disadvantages inherent in the possible remedies to combat wildcat strikes, and "we are strongly guided by" its choice.[18] Atkin-

[15] During the floor debate, proponents of the Committee bill emphasized the limited nature of the damages remedy in the proposed legislation. For example, Senator Ball stated: "[W]e give to employers the right to sue a union in interstate commerce, in a Federal court, for violation of contract. It does not go beyond that." 93 Cong. Rec. 5014 (1947) (emphasis added).

[16] "Many of the matters covered in section 12 of the House bill are also covered in the conference agreement in different form, as has been pointed out above in the discussion of section 7 and section 8(b)(1) of the conference agreement. Under existing principles of law developed by the courts and recently applied by the Board, employees who engage in violence, mass picketing, unfair labor practices, contract violations, or other improper conduct, or who force the employer to violate the law, do not have any immunity under the act and are subject to discharge without right of reinstatement. The right of the employer to discharge any employee for any such reason is protected in specific terms in section 10(c). Furthermore, under section 10(k) of the conference agreement, the Board is given authority to apply to the district courts for temporary injunctions restraining alleged unfair labor practices temporarily pending the decision of the Board on the merits." H. R. Conf. Rep. No. 510, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 59 (1947).

[17] Petitioners' reliance on the statement of Hines v. Anchor Motor Freight, Inc., 424 U.S. 554, 562 (1976) (emphasis added), that "Section 301 contemplates suits by and against individual employees" is misplaced. We decide a much narrower question not before the Court in Hines: that § 301 does not contemplate recovery of damages from individual employees as a result of a breach of the no-strike provision of a collective-bargaining agreement. Whether Hines contemplated injunctive suits against individuals was not decided by the Court in Hines and we have no occasion to decide that issue now. See n. 18, infra.

[18] Petitioners argue that a damages remedy against individual employees is indispensable to preserve the integrity of the collective-bargaining agreement and thereby to further the national labor policy of promoting industrial peace. This proposition is questionable on its own terms, overlooks an array of potential remedies that are available to the employer apart from a damages remedy against individuals, and in any event was rejected by Congress.

It is by no means certain that an individual damages remedy will meaningfully increase deterrence of wildcat strikes above that resulting from use of other available remedies. It is just as likely that damages actions against individuals would exacerbate industrial strife: "an action for damages prosecuted during or after a labor dispute would only tend to aggravate industrial strife and delay an early resolution of the difficulties between employer and union." Boys Markets, Inc., v. Retail Clerks, 398 U.S., at 248 (footnote omitted); see Gateway Coal Co. v. Mine Workers, 414 U.S. 368, 381, n. 14 (1974).

The significant array of other remedies available to employers to achieve adherence to collective-bargaining agreements casts further doubt on petitioners' proposition. First, an employer may seek damages against the union where responsibility may be traced to the union for the contract breach. See 29 U.S.C. § 185 (b); Carbon Fuel Co. v. Mine Workers, 444 U.S. 212, 216–218 (1979); Atkinson v. Sinclair Refining Co., 370 U.S., at 247–249. Second, an employer may discharge, or otherwise discipline, an employee who unlawfully walks off the job. See id., at 246; NLRB v. Rockaway News Supply Co., 345 U.S. 71, 80 (1953); Lakeshore Motor Freight Co. v. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, 483 F. Supp.

son v. Sinclair Refining Co., 370 U.S., at 249. See Howard Johnson Co. v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees, 417 U.S., at 255. Accordingly, we hold that § 301(a) does not sanction damages actions against individual employees for violating the no-strike provision of the collective-bargaining agreement, whether or not their union participated in or authorized the strike.

Affirmed.

JUSTICE POWELL, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

The Court's opinion makes clear that Congress, in enacting the Taft-Hartley amendments to the National Labor Relations Act, did not intend to hold individuals liable in damages for wildcat strikes. I therefore join the Court's judgment and most of its opinion. I do not, however, share the Court's view that there remains to management a "significant array of other remedies," ante, at 416, n. 18, with which to deter or obtain compensation for illegal strikes. In fact, the "remedies" said to be available are largely chimerical.

I

Collective-bargaining agreements typically contain a promise by the union not to strike during the agreement's term. Unions agree to these no-strike clauses in exchange for the employer's promise to arbitrate disputes arising in contract administration. Textile Workers v. Lincoln Mills, 353 U.S. 448, 449, 455 (1957). Each promise is the "quid pro quo" for the other, Steelworkers v. American Mfg. Co., 363 U.S. 564, 567 (1960), because the employer yields traditional managerial autonomy in exchange for industrial peace.

Despite the mutual benefits of the no-strike/grievance-arbitration pact, strikes in breach of contract occur with disturbing frequency. In some cases, these strikes are encouraged or even instigated by union leaders.[1] Often, however, they are true "wildcats"—strikes that arise spontaneously to protest grievances against the company and occasionally, against the union leadership itself. Responsible unions disapprove of such strikes but some officials, especially those at the local level, may acquiesce in them because of the fervor of intransigent members.

Whatever the cause, strikes in breach of contract frequently injure all concerned: the employer,[2] employees, and the public. Strikes and lockouts by their nature squander human working capacity, the full use of which is essential to the enjoyment of the Nation's productive potential. To be sure, the national labor policy recognizes that, in some circumstances, the use of weapons of strike and lockout is consistent with and protected by law. Labor, management, and the public nevertheless share a "common goal of uninterrupted production." Steelworkers v. Warrior & Gulf Navigation Co., 363 U.S. 574, 582 (1960). The essential tenet of our labor policy is that "a system of industrial self-government" based on consensual (albeit vigorously negotiated) labor contracts, see Steelworkers v. American Mfg. Co., supra, at 570 (BRENNAN, J., concurring), is preferable to "strikes, lockouts, or other self-help." Boys Markets, Inc. v. Retail Clerks, 398 U.S. 235, 249 (1970).

1150, 1154, n. 2 (WD Pa. 1980) (wildcat strikers discharged, and those allowed to return were rehired as new employees). Third, the union itself may discipline its members. See Carbon Fuel Co. v. Mine Workers, supra, at 220; Sinclair Oil Corp. v. Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, 452 F. 2d 49, 54 (CA7 1971); see 92 Cong. Rec. 5706 (1946) (Sen. Capehart) (debate on Case bill). Finally, an employer may seek injunctive relief against unions for breach of a no-strike provision in a collective-bargaining agreement where the underlying dispute giving rise to the breach is subject to binding arbitration. See Buffalo Forge Co. v. Steelworkers, 428 U.S., at 407; Gateway Coal Co. v. Mine Workers, supra, at 380–387; Boys Markets, Inc. v. Retail Clerks, supra. Whether a Boys Markets-Buffalo Forge injunction could have issued against individual union members engaged in the wildcat strike at issue here is not before us. It may be that an injunction would not issue against a participating or authorizing union in circumstances otherwise the same: in the instant case the District Judge found that the strike commenced over a nonarbitrable labor dispute, and that ruling was not disturbed by the Court of Appeals.

[1] Strike encouragement sometimes is explicit but more often is cryptic. A union may employ subtle signals to convey the message to strike. One court noted that unions sometimes employ "a nod or a wink or a code * * * in place of the word 'strike.'" United States v. UMW, 77 F. Supp. 563, 566 (DC 1948), aff'd, 85 U.S. App. D.C. 149, 177 F.2d 29, cert. denied, 338 U.S. 871 (1949).

[2] Production disruptions have obvious short-term adverse consequences. And one commentator has pointed out that the long-term consequences of these strikes may be even more severe. A strike rends the "closely integrated supply and distribution systems" that the company has developed. M. Jay Whitman, Wildcat Strikes: The Unions Narrowing Path to Rectitude?, 50 Ind. L.J. 472, 473 (1975). Such systems "presume predictability. A business with a reputation for labor problems, let alone wildcats, simply cannot provide its customers with that predictability," ibid., leading once-regular customers to seek other sources of supply.

When the Taft-Hartley amendments were enacted in 1947, the Nation had experienced a wave of labor unrest.[3] Congress found that "the balance of power in collective-bargaining" had been destroyed because employers, who had promised to arbitrate disputes in exchange for no-strike promises, often failed to obtain the industrial peace for which they bargained. S. Rep. 14.[4]

II

It is increasingly clear that the 1947 Taft-Hartley amendments did not provide employers with an effective remedy for wildcat strikes. The Court today holds, properly I think, that Congress intended to foreclose a damages remedy against individual wildcat strikers. The Court states, however, that there remains a number of legal weapons with which to deter or terminate illegal strikes, or to obtain compensation when they occur. Ante, at 416–417. n. 18. In support of its view, the Court contends that the employer may (i) obtain an injunction, (ii) discharge the strikers, (iii) request the union to use its internal disciplinary powers, or (iv) sue the union entity for damages. Ibid. In reality, more often than not, each of these remedies is illusory.

Injunctions in labor disputes are generally prohibited by the Norris-LaGuardia Act.[5] In Boys Markets, Inc. v. Retail Clerks, supra, the Court recognized a limited exception to the anti-injunction provisions of that Act. Boys Markets permits injunctions to terminate strikes pending arbitration if the grievance underlying the strike is arbitrable. However, Boys Markets offers only "narrow" relief, 398 U.S. at 253 because injunctions cannot be obtained in strikes of other kinds. E.g., Buffalo Forge Co. v. Steelworkers, 428 U.S. 397 (1976) (injunctions not available in sympathy strikes). Moreover, even when an injunction is available, workers on strike often are disinclined to obey it.[6] Courts may be reluctant to impose contempt penalties on individual workers; if ordered, such penalties are difficult to enforce.

Nor is discharge a realistic remedy in most cases. Because a strike in breach of contract is unprotected conduct under the National Labor Relations Act, see NLRB v. Sands Mfg. Co., 306 U.S. 332 (1939), workers who strike illegally may be terminated. It therefore has been argued that discharge effectively deters strikes and punishes wrongdoers because discharge is "the industrial equivalent of capital punishment." M. Jay Whitman, Wildcat Strikes: The Union's Narrowing Path to Rectitude?. 50 Ind. L.J. 472, 481 (1975). There are at least three reasons why this remedy in practice often is not effective. First, in a large wildcat strike, wholesale discharges are not practical because an employer cannot terminate all or most of his labor force without crippling production. See Boys Markets supra, at 248–249, n. 17.[7] Second, certain kinds of selective discharges arguably are illegal. The National Labor Relations Board takes the position that an employer may not discipline a union officer more severely than other strike participants, even where the union officer failed to fulfill a contractual undertaking to help terminate strikes.[8] In any event, discharging only selected

[3] The Senate Report accompanying the Taft-Hartley amendments observed that the Nation in 1945 experienced "the loss of approximately 38,000,000 man-days of labor through strikes. This total was trebled in 1946 when there were 116,000,000 man-days lost * * * ." S. Rep. No. 105, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 2 (1947) (hereinafter S. Rep.).

[4] The Senate Report stated that if workers "can break agreements with relative impunity, then such agreements do not tend to stabilize industrial relations. The execution of such an agreement does not by itself promote industrial peace. The chief advantage which an employer can reasonably expect from a collective labor agreement is assurance of uninterrupted operation during the term of the agreement. Without some effective method of assuring freedom from economic warfare for the term of the agreement, there is little reason why an employer would desire to sign such a contract." Id., at 16.

[5] Section 4 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, 47 Stat. 70, 29 U.S.C. § 104, provides, in pertinent part:

"No court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue any restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction in any case involving or growing out of any labor dispute * * * ."

[6] Compare Old Ben Coal Corp. v. Local 1487, UMW, 457 F. 2d 162 (CA7 1972), with Old Ben Coal Corp. v. Local 1487, UMW, 500 F. 2d 950, 952 (CA7 1974). See Gould, On Labor Injunctions Pending Arbitration: Recasting Buffalo Forge, 30 Stan. L. Rev. 533, and n. 47 (1978).

[7] Discharging the entire work force would "caus[e] mountainous personnel problems. Consider the sheer logistics of hiring, training and acclimating an entirely new work force with suitable skills. Even if a new labor force could be recruited, the time and expenses of this process, from recruitment to full production, could very well sound the death knell of the business." Fishman & Brown, Union Responsibility for Wildcat Strikes, 21 Wayne L. Rev. 1017, 1021 (1975).

[8] E.g., Miller Brewing Co., 254 N.L.R.B. 266 (1981); South Central Bell Telephone Co., 254 N.L.R.B. 315 (1981); Precision Casting Co., 233 N.L.R.B. 183 (1977). The Board's position is so clear that employers may be deterred from conducting selective discharges. This Court has not ad-

strikers is unlikely to influence the rank and file to return to work. Such discharges actually may aggravate worker discontent and thereby prolong the strike. Cedar Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 560 F. 2d 1153, 1157 (CA4 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1047 (1978); see 86 Harv. L. Rev. 447, 454.

n. 33 (1972). At a minimum, strikers may insist that their discharged colleagues be reinstated as a condition to returning to work. Fishman & Brown, Union Responsibility for Wildcat Strikes, 21 Wayne L. Rev. 1017, 1022 (1975). Third, arbitrators not infrequently refuse to sustain discharges of strikers. See Handsaker & Handsaker, Remedies and Penalties for Wildcat Strikes: How Arbitrators and Federal Courts Have Ruled, 22 Cath. U. L. Rev. 279, 284 (1973).

The union itself normally will not discipline its striking members. Most unions have the legal authority to take such action, see Summers, Legal Limitations on Union Discipline, 64 Harv. L. Rev. 1049, 1065 (1951), but the power seldom is used. In a wildcat strike, worker recalcitrance sometimes is directed at the incumbent union leadership as much as at company management. In these circumstances, the union's attempt to discipline is unlikely to be effective and may be counterproductive. Moreover, under this Court's decision in Carbon Fuel Co. v. Mine Workers, 444 U.S. 212 (1979), a parent union normally is not obligated to take affirmative steps to prevent or terminate a wildcat strike. Absent such an obligation, there is little incentive for the union to intervene, even where intervention would be useful.

Finally, a suit for damages against the union entity rarely is feasible.[9] Last Term, in Carbon Fuel, supra, we largely foreclosed this possibility when we held that liability normally may not be imposed on a parent union [10] absent proof that it authorized or ratified the strike.[11] It is a foolish union that would invite a damages suit by explicitly endorsing a strike in this manner. See n. 1, supra.

III

The Court plainly is unrealistic, therefore, when it suggests that employers have at their disposal a battery of alternative remedies for illegal strikes. Ante, at 416–417, n. 18. The result of the absence of remedies is a lawless vacuum. Despite a no-strike clause, a plant may be closed with adverse consequences that often are far-reaching. The strike injures the employer, other companies and their employees, and consumers in general. Frequently, the strike is harmful even to the majority of strikers, who feel obligated to honor the picket line of minority wildcatters.

It is, of course, the province of Congress to set the Nation's labor policy. I do not suggest that authorizing a damages remedy against individual wildcat strikers would be desirable. I do believe, however, that the absence of an effective remedy leaves such strikes undeterred and the public interest unprotected. The National Labor Relations Act, as amended in 1947, was intended to further broader national interests than those of dressed the question, but some Courts of Appeals have not warmly received the Board's reasoning. See Gould, Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F. 2d 728 (CA3) (denying enforcement to 237 N.L.R.B. 881 (1978), cert. denied sub nom. Moran v. Gould Corp., 449 U.S. 890 (1980); Indiana & Mich. Electric Co. v. NLRB, 599 F. 2d 227 (CA7 1979) (denying enforcement to 237 N.L.R.B. 226 (1978)); see also NLRB v. Armour-Dial, Inc., 638 F. 2d 51, 54–56 (CA8 1981).

[9] Sophisticated employers for tactical reasons may elect to forgo tenable poststrike suits for damages. As the Court points out such suits may "exacerbate industrial strife," ante, at 416, n. 18, and thereby delay the dissipation of the acrimony engendered by the strike. Employers also may elect not to sue for damages because they do not want to subject themselves to the disclosure attendant to litigation. A damages suit "necessarily involves detailed discussion of an employer's most intimate financial secrets. By making a damage claim, the employer puts its . . . finances * * * at issue in the litigation. The discovery rules of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure give the union and its accountants the right to explore every corner of the employer's books. If the union conducts its case properly, it will know everything from per-unit profit to the finer details of [corporate] management." M. Jay Whitman, supra n. 2, at 474 (footnote omitted).

Finally, part of the price of setting the stike often is a promise that the company will waive its claim for damages. Ransdell v. International Assn. of Machinists, 97 LRRM 2738. (ED Wis. 1978); Gould, On Labor Injunctions, Unions, and the Judges: The Boys Market Case, 1970 S. Ct. Rev. 215, 231.

[10] Carbon Fuel did not consider the quantum of proof necessary to establish damages liability against a local union. Because of the local's proximity to workers, an inference of agency—and hence, liability—arguably may arise even without explicit proof of strike authorization or ratification. See § 301(e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 185(e). The possibility that the local will be liable may be of little practical benefit, however, because the local often is judgment-proof.

[11] Carbon Fuel recognized, of course, that an explicit contractual undertaking by the parent to intervene to terminate wildcats could be the basis for damages liability. See 444 U.S., at 218–222.

either labor or management. It was conceived not only as a charter for labor rights but also as a framework of law to promote orderly labor relations. Wildcat strikes are at war with these objectives.

Chief Justice Burger, with whom Justice Rehnquist joins, dissenting.

The Court today holds that individual employees who, without the approval of their union, breach a covenant not to strike in the collective-bargaining agreement between their union and their employers may not be held liable for resulting damages to the employers. At stake is the fundamental principle that individuals are accountable when they breach a voluntarily executed contract.

The underlying facts in this case are not in dispute. The respondents are members of Local 332 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, which acts as their exclusive bargaining agent with petitioners, their employers. The union and the petitioners have entered into a collective-bargaining agreement that provides in part:

> "The Unions and Employers agree that there shall be no strike, tie-up of equipment, slowdowns or walkouts on the part of the employee * * * without first using all possible means of settlement, as provided in this Agreement, of any controversy which might arise." App. 14–15.

Despite this covenant, the respondents embarked on what is commonly called a "wildcat" strike; it is admitted that the local union "did not aid, assist or authorize the work stoppage or a tie-up of any equipment." Id., at 25.

Section 301(a) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 185(a), makes collective-bargaining agreements enforceable in federal courts against both unions and employers. See H.R. Rep. No. 245, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 46 (1947); S. Rep. No. 105, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 15–16 (1947). Of course the union, acting on behalf of its members, may sue the employeer for any breaches of the agreement, and the employer may sue the union for its breaches. This is no more than a corollary to the enforceability of the contract under § 301(a). Moreover, the Court has had no problem in the past in holding the parties responsible for a breach accountable for their conduct. An employee may sue the employer directly for breach of the agreement even though the employee is not technically a party to the agreement, Smith v. Evening News Assn., 371 U.S. 195 (1962), but the employer may not sue an individual worker for union-sponsored breach, Atkinson v. Sinclair Refining Co., 370 U.S. 238 (1962) (applying Labor Management Relations Act § 301(b), 29 U.S.C. § 185(b)). Nor may the employer sue the union for members' breaches that the union has not condoned, Carbon Fuel Co. v. Mine Workers, 444 U.S.C. 212 (1979).[1] This case presents the final unresolved situation: May individual union members be held accountable in a suit by the employer for a plain violation of the agreement committed without the approval of the union?

On the basis of literally centuries of the common law of contracts, one would have thought that the traditional notions of accountability for one's voluntary actions would govern. Instead, the Court holds that individual workers, acting without union approval, are a special, privileged class who may with impunity violate an agreement voluntarily reached in arm's-length bargaining. This result finds no support in the statute, it significantly undermines the usefulness and reliability of the collective-bargaining process, and it will not advance the goals the Court claims for it.

In reaching this unusual conclusion, the Court mistakenly relies on the last sentence in § 301(b) of the Labor Management Relations Act, which states:

> "Any money judgment against a labor organization in a district court of the United States shall be enforceable only against the organization as an entity and against its assets, and shall not be enforceable against any individual member or his assets." 29 U.S.C. § 185(b).

On its face, this clause does no more than insulate union members from personal liability for union breaches of the contract; Congress intended this provision to give union members a protection analogous to that afforded stockholders in corporations against personal liability for corporate acts. S. Rep. No. 105, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 16 (1947) ("members of the union would secure all the advantages of limited liability without incorporation"). It is acknowledged that Congress added this provision to the Act to prevent a recurrence of the Danbury Hatters situation, see Lawlor v. Loewe, 235 U.S. 522 (1915); Loewe v. Lawlor, 208 U.S. 274 (1908), where the participants in a strike were held personally liable for the union's actions on the theory that the union, as an unicorporated association, could not be sued. Ante, at 406–407, and n. 6; Atkinson v. Sinclair Refining Co., supra, at 248; 93 Cong. Rec. 5014 (1947) (remarks of Sen. Ball). But the language of § 301(b) says nothing about holding union members harmless when they, without the approval of their union, individually breach the contract.

[1] Thus, the union is not an "insurer" of members' compliance with the collective-bargaining agreement, or vice versa. Had this been the case, I might have been willing to join in the Court's position, for the union would remain liable for failing to see that its members abided by the agreement.

The special exemption in § 310(b) affords individual union members protection against individual liability for collective action; this simultaneously encourages group action through the union—which is what unions are all about—and prevents potentially large damage awards against individual workers. But when Congress changed the law regarding individual liability for union conduct, it did not even hint at changing the common-law rule of contract law of individual liability for individual conduct, which does not more than articulate the basic idea of individual accountability essential to an organized society.[2] When an individual, either personally or, as here, through an agent, voluntarily enters into a binding agreement, that individual is liable in damages for breach. A provision whose language governs—and whose history indicates it was designed to govern—only situations of individual liability for collective action should not be construed to wipe out core principles of personal accountability for individual actions.

Curiously, the Court, ante, at 416, n. 18, and the respondents suggests that this anomaly will promote more harmonious relations between employers and striking workers by preventing a long and drawn-out fight in the courts. This argument is wholly specious, and it is contradicted by the views Congress expressed when it adopted § 301. Congress fully recognized that agreements, if breachable with impunity, "do not tend to stabilize industrial relations. The execution of an agreement does not by itself promote industrial peace." S. Rep. No. 105. 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 16 (1947). If workers can "have their cake and eat it too" by holding the employer liable for its breaches but receiving immunity for their own, employers will be less likely to enter into mutually satisfactory collective-bargaining agreements in the first place.

"Without some effective method of assuring freedom from economic warfare for the term of the agreement, there is little reason why an employer would desire to sign such a contract." Ibid. Indeed, the Court's logic would insulate unions from suit as well: an action against the union for a strike it had sponsored but that since has ended similarly tends to "reopen old wounds." Moreover, I have difficulty seriously entertaining an argument that the employer is responsible for jeopardizing industrial harmony by seeking damages for injuries it has sustained when it was the unlawfully striking employees themselves who broke the peace in the first place. One must resist the temptation to recall the youth who, having deliberately murdered both parents, pleads for the court's mercy as an orphan.

The respondents believe—and the Court accepts, ante, at 416, n. 18—that the threat of discharge by the employer or discipline by the union is sufficient to ensure that collective-bargaining agreements generally will be followed by the union and its members.[3] These measures, however, are no answer; they may be too little[4] and they surely

[2] The Court cites various comments by Members of Congress regarding immunity for union members when they act with union approval. Those remarks do not address the issue before us—individual liability for individual conduct undertaken without union involvement. The nearest the Court comes to finding support on that question is a remark by Senator Taft, made during debate on a predecessor bill subsequently vetoed by the President, that employers may fire "wildcat" strikers. Ante, at 409. Even Senator Taft's statement does not directly touch on individual liability for individual action, and, ironically, the Court's use of it follows on the heels of the Court's own admonition to avoid "suggest[ions] by negative implication." Ante, at 407.

[3] The Court also mentions the employer's suit against the union itself when the union is responsible. Obviously, that remedy is wholly irrelevant to this case. See supra, at 425.

[4] JUSTICE POWELL, in his separate opinion, thoroughly analyzes the inadequacy of these measures. The union's impotence is demonstrated by its failure to control its members in the first place. In addition, union officome too late, after the employer has suffered substantial losses to its business due to a strike that, under the contract, never should have occurred. In theory, the employer might mitigate damages by hiring substitute workers, but this assumes qualified workers could be found who would be willing to cross even a "wildcat" picket line.

Accountability of each individual for individual conduct lies at the core of all law—indeed, of all organized societies. The trend to eliminate or modify sovereign immunity is not an unrelated development; we have moved away from "The King can do no wrong." This principle of individual accountability is fundamental if the structure of an organized society is not to be eroded to anarchy and impotence, and it remains essential in civil as well as criminal justice. Today the Court penalizes the employer for the "wildcat" breaches of the employees and rewards those errant employees.

It seems to me that, by now the American labor movement has matured sufficiently so that neither unions nor their members need this kind of artificial, excessively paternalistic protection for admittedly illegal acts—a protection contrary to fundamental, centuries-old concepts of individual accountability. The stability of unions and the harmony of industrial relations will be enhanced, not impaired, by applying to union members the same standards of accountability that govern all other individuals in society.[5]

The Court ought not to make two classes of contract breakers under collective-bargaining agreements, one liable and one immune. I submit that if union members understand that where they breach a contract without the approval of their union, individual liability will follow, we will very likely see fewer unauthorized strikes, for union authority will be enhanced and greater industrial harmony will likely result.

647 F.2d 692 (6th Cir.), May 4, 1981—243 NLRB 280

On petition to review Board Order

Before ENGEL and BOYCE F. MARTIN, JR., Circuit Judges and MANOS, District Judge*

This labor dispute is before the court upon cross-petitions for review and enforcement of the order of the National Labor Relations Board[1] directing the petitioner Motor Inn of Perrysburg, d/b/a Holiday Inn of Perrysburg, Ohio, (Motor Inn) to bargain collectively with the Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local 868, AFL–CIO, and to refrain from certain practices which the Board found to have been in violation of the National Labor Relations Act, § 8(a)(2), (3) and (5), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(2), (3) and (5) (1976).

Although the union had lost in two certification elections held in December, 1974 and September, 1975, the Board ordered the company to recognize and to bargain with the union on the authority of NLRB v. Gissell Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547, reh. denied, 396 U.S. 869, 90 S.Ct. 35, 24 L.Ed.2d 123 (1969). The Board found that the conduct of the company in imposing more onerous working conditions on certain of its employees had amounted to a constructive discharge of those employees because of their union activities or to discourage union support. Therefore, according to the Board, a third certification election could not be fairly conducted and the bargaining order was issued.

While other conduct of the employer also was claimed to be violative of the Act, counsel for the Board and for Motor Inn agreed that the propriety cers in some instances may reject discipline in the hope of appeasing "wildcat" members and bringing them back under union control. As JUSTICE BRENNAN, writing for the Court in NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., 388 U.S. 175, 183 (1967), aptly noted:

> "Where the union is weak, * * * the union faced with further depletion of its ranks may have no real choice except to condone the member's disobedience."

of the bargaining order had to be determined upon whether there was substantial evidence in the record as a whole to support the Board's finding that the employees were constructively discharged by the imposition of the so-called "Captain System" and "Revised Captain System." These systems changed the working conditions and method of compensation of the waiters and waitresses employed in the restaurant by Motor Inn during the time in question.

It should be noted at the outset that petitioner's motion to file the affidavit of Chip C. Dennison is denied. After an examination of the record as a whole, as it stood before the Board, however, the court concludes that substantial evidence does not support the Board's finding that the captain systems were instituted to induce the union adherents to voluntarily terminate their employment, and thus defeat the upcoming campaign to certify the union. In making this conclusion, the court is reminded of the words of Justice Frankfurter in Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951), where he said: "The substantiality of evidence must take into account whatever in the record failury detracts from its weight." In this respect, there was no collective bargaining agreement in effect at the time, yet the Board in its order sought to impose conditions of employment as if one had been. Although the new systems were perhaps unpopular with at least some employees, they were imposed equally upon all employees, not only those who were in sympathy with the union. This lack of discriminatory treatment of or impact upon union adherents obviously detracted from the evidence which might show Motor Inn's antiunion animus.

In addition, the record shows that the Revised Captain System continued in operation until at least early 1977, when the hearing before the Administrative Law Judge was held. If the purpose of the system was to constructively discharge employees who were sympathetic to the union, as the Administrative Law Judge and the Board found, there would be no reason for continuing the system beyond April 1, 1976, when those employees terminated their employment. To the contrary, the record contains sufficient evidence of Motor Inn's economic motivation for implementation of the captain systems to convince the court that Motor Inn's claim in this regard was not merely pretextual. Exhibit 49 shows that the system was profitable. While the total number of dinners served during 1976 declined from prior years, the price of the average check increased due in large part to the increase in sales of desserts and appetizers. This evidence shows that the captain systems had the intended effect: to increase the sale of food. For these reasons, enforcement of the Board's orders in respect to implementation and retention of the captain systems is denied. Also, enforcement of the Board's order requiring Motor to offer reemployment to the employees it found to have been constructively discharged is denied.

Since substantial evidence does not support the Board's finding that the employees were constructively discharged by the imposition of the captain systems, enforcement of the bargaining order also is denied. Furthermore, the long delay between the filing of the complaint and the action of the Board in ordering the Gissell remedy made its imposition in this case an abuse of discretion within the meaning of Clark's Gamble Corp. v. NLRB, 422 F.2d 845 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 868, 981 S.Ct. 100, 27 L.Ed.2d 108 (1970).

Certain other findings of the Board also appear, upon our consideration, to lack supporting substantial evidence in the record. Specifically, the Board concluded that Motor Inn violated section 8(a)(1) by threatening to terminate its restaurant operation rather than bargain with the union. A review of the evidence, however, discloses that any such threat was made only to former employees. The evidence does not suggest that this threat was communicated to the former employees with the intention that it be recommunicated to then current employees. This conduct is clearly not a violation of the Act.

Next, the Board found that Motor Inn promulgated an overly broad no-solicitation and non-distribution rule. This action, according to the Board, violated section 8(a)(1). The Administrative Law Judge's decision itself, however, found that this rule was never enforced. Nor does the evidence even suggest that the employees were chilled in the exercise of their solicitation and distribution rights. On the contrary, the evidence shows that the employees excercised these rights freely, openly, and frequently. Under these facts the court concludes that the mere enactment of the overly broad rules was not a violation of the Act. For this reason, enforcement of the Board's cease and desist order prohibiting Motor Inn from promulgating, maintaining, giving effect to or enforcing these overly broad rules is denied.

Finally, the Board found that Motor Inn's photographic surveillance of employees engaged in picketing on behalf of the union violated section 8(a)(1). There is evidence in the record suggesting that the surveillance was undertaken to support an attempt to obtain an injunction against unlawful employee picketing. The Administrative Law Judge also found that this surveillance was mainly directed against two employees whose later terminations were upheld. This evidence severely detracts from the weight of the little evidence substantiating the Board's decision on this issue. Therefore, the Board's finding in this regard will not be upheld on this appeal and enforcement of the Board's cease and desist order prohibiting Motor Inn from engaging in the surveillance of employees engaged in lawful picketing on behalf of the union is denied.

Two violations found by the Board were substantially conceded by Motor Inn. The first violation was the employer's threat to discharge employees who signed union registration cards. The second involved interrogation of employees regarding union activities and sympathies. There is substantial evidence on the record, as well as the concession by Motor Inn, to uphold these findings on appeal. Therefore, those parts of the Board's order requiring Motor Inn to cease and desist from interrogating employees concerning their membership, sentiment toward, and activities on behalf of the union and from threatening employees with discharge because of their support for the union is enforced.

Accordingly,

IT IS ORDERED that the Board's order is enforced in part and enforcement is denied in part.

Coating Products, Inc. v. NLRB

648 F.2d 108 (2d Cir.), May 4 1981—251 NLRB 1271

On petition to review Board Order

Before Feinberg, Chief Judge, Van Graafeiland, Circuit Judge, and Maletz, Judge, United States Court of International Trade*

Feinberg, Chief Judge: Coating Products, Inc., a Connecticut corporation, petitions for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board, which requires that petitioner (a) cease and desist from enumerated violations of section 8(a) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a); (b) reinstate one employee and make him and another employee whole for losses attributable to petitioner's illegal conduct; and (c) recognize and bargain with a designated union local (the union) as the representative of petitioner's production and maintenance employees. The Board cross-applies for enforcement of its order. For the reasons stated below, we deny the petition for review and grant the application for enforcement.

Affirming the findings and conclusions of an administrative law judge (the ALJ), the Board found that petitioner had violated section 8(a)(1) of the Act by, inter alia, coercive questioning of employees, statements giving the impression of illegal surveillance of union activity, threats of lost benefits and layoffs, and the presentation and implementation of a "company plan" of pay raises and other benefits. The Board also found that the promotion of an "employee committee" by petitioner's management constituted a violation of section 8(a)(2) of the Act and that the constructive discharge of a union activist violated section 8(a)(3). Finally, the Board found that petitioner violated section 8(a)(5) by refusing to bargain with the union after it obtained signed authorization cards from a majority of employees in the unit.

Petitioner argues that in a number of respects these findings are not supported by substantial evidence in the record, and that the ALJ was biased against it. We conclude, however, that the violations found by the Board do rest on substantial evidence, and that the ALJ's conduct does not justify denial of enforcement of the order.

The only issue requiring discussion is the propriety of the Board's issuance of a bargaining order under the circumstances of this case. In NLRB v. Jamaica Towing, Inc., 632 F.2d 208 (2d Cir. 1980), this court undertook a thorough canvass of the problems involved in the issuance of such orders. Among other things, that decision identified a number of "hallmark" violations of the federal labor laws that are "regularly regarded * * * as highly coercive" and that "support the issuance of a bargaining order unless some significant mitigating circumstance exists." Id. at 212. The Board found that at least two such violations occurred here: the reassignment and constructive discharge of the union activist and the grant of substantial pay and fringe benefits under the "company program" at a time when the union drive was under way. These findings alone "justif[y] a finding without extensive explication that [the employer's conduct] is likely to have a lasting inhibitive effect on a substantial percentage of the work force." Id. at 213. Under Jamaica Towing, therefore, the Board's issuance of the bargaining order on the basis of the union authorization cards signed by a majority of the employees, was not an abuse of its "wide, though not unfettered, discretion" in remedying an employer's unfair labor practices. See NLRB v. Hendel Manufacturing Co., 483 F.2d 350, 353 (2d Cir. 1973; cf. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 612 n.32, 614–15, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1939 n.32, 1940–41, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).

We note, nevertheless, that the bargaining order would rest on more secure ground if the Board had taken more care to explain why traditional remedies, such as a cease and desist order, would not have been sufficient in this case to dispel the effects of the employer's past misconduct. Instead, the Board offered little more than a conclusory justification for the order.[1] We believe it important for the Board to give some indication of the reasoning behind its recourse to the extraordinary remedy of a bargaining order, with all its attendant risks. Failure to do so may tend to make routine a remedy that should remain exceptional. We think this should be avoided, and take this occasion to register our concern.

In this particular instance, however, we conclude that the Board's action was proper, and accordingly grant the application for enforcement of its order.

NLRB v. St. Anne's Hospital

648 F.2d 67 (1st Cir.), May 5, 1981—245 NLRB 1009

On petition to enforce Board Order

BOWNES, Circuit Judge: This case is before us by application of the National Labor Relations Board pursuant to § 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), for enforcement of its order issued against St. Anne's Hospital (the Hospital) on September 28, 1979, and reported at 224 N.L.R.B. 130. The issue is whether there is substantial evidence to support the Board's finding that the hospital violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act by interfering with the rights of employees to engage in protected, concerted activity and by retaliating against three employees by discharging two of them and disciplining and changing the job assignment of the third.

The Facts

The record shows that most of the testimony adduced during the four-day hearing was uncontradicted. The case concerns the operating room staff at the hospital which, at the pertinent times, consisted of approximately seventeen full-time and part-time employees, including registered nurses, licensed practical nurses and operating room technicians. An outline of how the staff functioned is necessary to understand the issues. There are two types of nurses in the operating room during a surgical procedure, scrub nurses and circulating nurses. Scrub nurses are either registered nurses or operating room technicians. Circulating nurses are mostly registered nurses. Scrub nurses are part of the operating team; they pass instruments and other needed material to the surgeon and may directly assist him by holding clamps and sponging the patient

[1] We are aware that the ALJ offered an extended explanation of his conclusion that a bargaining order was warranted in this case. The Board, however, made clear that it did not adopt the ALJ's principal rationale, precluding any inference that the Board intended to adopt the bulk of the ALJ's reasoning as its own.

if this is not done by another doctor. The number of scrubs assigned to a given operation depends on its complexity and length. Scrubs must, or course, be completely sterile. Scrubbing is a highly technical and skilled job that requires an intimate knowledge of the instruments and supplies that will be used in a particular operation. For this reason, scrubs, regardless of whether they are registered nurses, receive specialized training.

Circulating nurses, on the other hand, do not participate directly in the operation. They prepare patients for surgery, make sure that all laboratory reports are on hand, assist the anesthesiologist, and take the patient to the recovery room after the operation is over. Circulating nurses also are on hand during the operation to see to it that the scrubs are performing properly. Unlike the scrubs, however, they are not sterile and function outside the sterile field of the operation.

Until the differences between the operating room staff and the hospital surfaced, it had not been the practice to use circulating nurses as scrubs and several of the circulating nurses had not assisted in major surgery as scrubs for a number of years.

The regular work week for the operating room staff was forty hours with time and one-half for overtime. The staff personnel are regularly scheduled for on-call duty which require that they be within telephone reach of the hospital. Until March of 1978, circulating nurses were on call one night a week and scrubs were on call two to three nights a week. In January of 1978, the operating room staff received $1.00 per hour for on-call duty.

The disagreement leading to this case started on January 25, 1978, when some of the operating room nurses were receiving $3.00 per hour for on-call duty. This was confirmed the next day by the operating room supervisor, Hilda Paruch. A series of meetings then ensued during which a group representing most of the operating room personnel was formed. A number of letters were sent to the hospital administration, one of which threatened a strike if the short-term goals of the group were not met. There was no strike, but the group and hospital administration, despite a number of joint meetings could not agree on an overall on-call policy, although agreement was reached on compensation. The group retained private counsel.

On February 23 the group elected Madeline Souza as spokesperson and Joy Cawley as secretary-treasury; both were registered nurses and worked as circulating nurses. Other members of the group included registered nurses Helen Loos, Rose Mary Almeida, and Leslie Rocha, all of whom worked as circulating nurses, and operating room technician, Patricia Danis. The group discussed a rumor that the hospital was planning to resolve the on-call policy dispute by no longer distinguishing between scrub and circulating nurses. Several nurses expressed the feeling that they were not qualified to scrub for major surgery without additional training.

On the same day, the first of the alleged unfair labor practices occurred. According to the testimony of Cawley, the operating room supervisor Paruch went into a supply room where Cawley and Loos were talking during their afternoon break and told them they were not to have any more meetings of that sort on hospital time. Paruch denied this; the administrative law judge (A.L.J.) specifically credited Cawley's testimony.

Souza told Paruch on February 24 that the group had retained counsel. Paruch responded by saying that such action was almost like a threat. A few days later she assembled the operating room personnel, and told them that, although she had been sympathetic to them at first, she was now on the side of the administration because they had hired a lawyer. At about the same time, Paruch told her niece, Leslie Rocha, not to be seen coming to work with Souza as she had been doing.

On February 27 the group met with the director of hospital personnel, Robert Seeley, and the assistant director of nursing services, Theresa Nientimp. They were told that the on-call policy from then on would be to schedule circulating nurses, as well as scrubs, for call duty as scrub nurses. Almeida, Rocha, and Cawley stated that they were not qualified to work as scrubs without further training. Nientimp told them that if they did not feel qualified to assist at an operation, they should not do it.

The group was upset by the new on-call policy. They met on February 28 and a letter was drafted and delivered to the hospital administrator telling him the on-call policy was unacceptable and asking for a meeting with their spokesperson within a week. Another letter was sent on March 1 stating that members of the operating room staff "have expressed a grave concern for the welfare of the patients regarding that aspects of the Call Policy which would require Nurses inexperienced in the art of Scrubbing to assume the responsibilities of Scrub Personnel." The letter requested a delay in instituting the new policy until a reasonable training period be given those inexperienced in scrubbing; a four-month period was recommended.

The operating room staff was assembled by the Director of Nursing Services, Margaret Goslin, and her assistant, Nientimp, on March 3. The new on-call operating room policy was read; Goslin said she would speak to the nurses on an individual basis, but would not meet with them as a group. The new policy of assigning circulating nurses to scrub was discussed with Goslin and Nientimp a few days later. Goslin said that if a nurse did not feel qualified to accept a scrub assignment, she should inform her supervisor and other arrangements would be made.

Souza testified that early in March, Paruch told Souza and Loos, when they were eating lunch in a hospital kitchen, that they were not to have any meetings on hospital property. When Souza protested that it was their lunch time, Paruch said it made no difference. Paruch denied ever telling any of the nurses that they couldn't talk on hospital property. The A.L.J. specifically credited the testimony of Souza.

The last meeting between the operating room group and the hospital administration took place on March 15. Personnel Director Seeley read the hospital's grievance policy and a statement relative to employee conduct. Seeley then stated that some of them had poor attitudes, and he had received complaints about this, and that he wanted them to know that the hospital could suspend or fire employees who were uncooperative.

For a number of years prior to 1978, Souza or Almeida had taken over as operating room supervisor for Paruch when she was not there. For handling this additional responsibility, which entailed assigning nurses to operations, rescheduling of operations and calling in additional staff, they received additional pay of twenty-five cents per hour. In late February of 1978, Paruch arranged for a leave of absence in March because her mother was terminally ill. Almeida agreed to act as supervisor during the time Paruch would be away. Paruch subsequently informed Almeida, after attending a meeting with members of the administration, that "they" did not want her to take charge because of her "involvement." Paruch was away from March 11 to March 18; neither Almeida nor Souza were made acting supervisor of the operating room, nor were they ever again given this responsibility.

On March 17 Rocha was given a warning by Nientimp for behaving in an "unprofessional and unacceptable manner relative to the needs of the Operating Room." The facts culminating in this warning were as follows: Rocha was sitting in the operating room lounge at about 7:30 A.M. with other nurses when Dr. Shulman was informed by telephone that Dr. Shea's case was at the operating room door. Dr. Shulman told the nurses in the lounge that the patient was waiting. Rocha, who had not been assigned to the case, called Nientimp and told her that the operating room was not fully staffed, that there was no one in charge and some nurses had not yet reported for duty. Rocha then went to the operating room to receive the patient. Dr. Shea asked who was going to circulate and said, seemingly in jest, that he would circulate himself. This upset Dr. Shulman, who said that he would circulate while giving anesthesia. Rocha then said she would be the circulating nurse and remarked, "I am doing this out of a sense of duty." After the operation, which was completely routinely, Dr. Shea said to Dr. Shulman, "Thanks a lot." Dr. Shulman took this as sarcasm. He then saw Nientimp and told her that "things aren't going too well in the OR, and gave his version of what happened. Dr. Shulman did not request or suggest that Rocha be disciplined. Nientimp did not inquire of Dr. Shea or Rocha as to what had happened before issuing the warning. This was the only warning Rocha had received in her ten years of service at the hospital.

On the same day, March 17, Almeida received a suspension. She was scheduled to work from 8:00 A.M. to 4:30 P.M. and to be on call the rest of the day. There was a bad snow storm early that day and Almeida called to say that she could not get in because of road conditions. Under hospital policy, she was therefore, excused both from working her scheduled shift and from call duty that night. Nientimp called Almeida about 11:00 A.M. explained that she was short of call nurses and asked whether she would take call duty for the evening. Almeida asked if she would be paid time and a half if she were called to work; Nientimp said no, and Almeida then said no. After discussing the situation with her husband, Almedia called Nientimp back and suggested that she would report to work between 12:00 and 1:00 P.M. if Nientimp would sign her in for a full day, thus qualifying her for time and one-half if called to work while on call. Nientimp said she could not approve such an arrangement. Within a short time, Nientimp called Almeida again and told her that she was suspended and, if she had any questions, to see Seeley, the personnel director. Almeida met with Seeley that afternoon who told her the reasons for her suspension were extortion, bribery, bad attitude, and lack of cooperation with the hospital. The suspension was for ten days, March 17 to March 27.

Madeline Souza, the spokesperson for the operating staff group, was discharged on March 27. The reason given in her termination letter was:

> On Friday, March 24, 1978, while acting as a scrub nurse on an emergency assignment and in the presence of a patient, you walked out of the operating room refusing to follow through with your assignment.

The letter also described her attitute as "[u]sually cooperative, bitter and agitative for past 2 months." Souza had worked at the hospital for sixteen years. Her latest job evaluation, made on September 3, 1977, gave her the highest rating for job knowledge, job responsibility, quality and quantity of work performance, initiative and interest, and rate of progress versus education and training. Her supervisors stated that she was very reliable and competent.

As the facts show, this was not a simple case of refusing to carry out an assignment. Souza was told on March 24, while working her regular 7:30 A.M. to 3:00 P.M. shift, that she would be needed to circulate at operations which were scheduled for 3:00 to 4:00 P.M. The operation scheduled for 3:00 o'clock was an exploratory laparotomy, a major surgical procedure. The start of the operation was delayed; at 3:20 P.M. Paruch told Souza that Souza and Jeanniene Labreche would be the scrub nurses and that she, herself, would be the circulating nurse. Labreche was an operating room technician, not a registered nurse, and always worked as a scrub. Souza had not acted as a scrub for two years and had never done so for major surgery. Over 90% of Souza's working time was spent in the recovery room. The sudden change of assignment upset Souza, especially because she knew that the patient had been through two other recent operations and was not in good physical condition. Because no other doctor was listed for the operation, Souza assumed that Labreche would assist the surgeon and she would be first scrub. Despite her misgivings about her ability to perform properly, Souza prepared to go ahead. She asked Labreche to go over the special instruments with her; this was done while they waited for the patient to be brought to the operating room. At about 3:45 P.M. Paruch returned to the operating room and Souza said, "I am sorry Hilda, I can't do it." Paruch told her to circulate instead of scrubbing. Souza, overcome by stress and upset at having to refuse an assignment, began to cry. She left the operating room to get control of herself, which took about ten minutes. The operation had not begun when she returned, and she acted as circulating nurse throughout the operation, which was completed without incident. On the following Monday, March 27, Souza was discharged.

On March 25 Rocha learned on her arrival at the hospital that she had been assigned to scrub for an aortic aneurysm operation. The only others listed on the schedule were the surgeon and an operating room technician. Rocha immediately went to the charge nurse and told her that she did not feel qualified to assist or be first scrub at this type of operation. She was told to take it up with Paruch, who had not yet arrived. When Paruch got there, Rocha repeated what she had told the charge nurse. Paruch told her to return to the operating room and scrub. After Rocha reiterated that she did not feel qualified, Paruch said, "If I tell you to assist, you will assist and if I tell you to first scrub, you will first scrub." Rocha replied, "I am not refusing to scrub but I just do not feel qualified to assist or to first scrub." Paruch then ordered Rocha to follow her into the nurse's locker room where she said, "[Y]ou get into that room and scrub." Rocha left the locker room and sat down in the corridor to calm herself. Paruch then ordered her to go to the nursing service office. At the office Rocha told Nientimp about her inability to assist or act as first scrub at the operation. Nientimp responded by saying that Rocha was only assuming that she would be first scrub or assisting. Rocha then said that she would act as second scrub or "back table" for the operation. Nientimp replied to this by telling Rocha that, because she already had a warning, this was serious and would result in at least a suspension. She also said that she was going to discuss it with Paruch. Rocha was instructed to go to the personnel office. Nientimp and Paruch then discussed the matter with Seeley. After a two-hour wait in Seeley's office, Rocha was handed a termination notice which contained the following:

> On Tuesday, March 28, 1978, when assigned as a scrub nurse on an assignment in the Operating Room, and in the presence of your supervisor and other nurses, you refused to follow through with your assignment.

The termination notice had essentially the same description of attitude as did Souza's, "[u]sually cooperative, most recently bitter and agitative." Rocha's latest job evaluation report, made on September 1, 1977, on a scale of 1 to 5 (5 being the highest), rated her 4 for job knowledge, job responsibility, quality and quantity of work performance, initiative and interest, cooperation with others, attitude towards hospital and department, and rate of progress versus education and training. Her supervisor's comment was, "Will do whatever she can to meet the needs of the OR schedule." Rocha had worked at the hospital for more than ten years.

Patricia Danis went back to work at the hospital as an operating room technician in January of 1978 after an absence of almost four years. She joined the operating room group and attended meetings with hospital officials. Paruch warned Danis at the end of January that, as a new employee, she ought to be "low-key" at the meetings. On April 3 Paruch called her to her desk and showed her an evaluation form that had the word probation at the top. Danis asked Paruch the significance of this and was told that every new employee at the hospital was on probation for three months. Paruch then went on to say that at the end of the three months she could end the probation, extend it, or recommend dismissal. Paruch then pointed to the attitude section of the evaluation form, said she had spoken to Danis about this before and that those in the operating room were a team and could not stick to groups.

In March Almeida told Paruch that she wanted to work through her eighth month of pregnancy, but did not want to be on call during that month. This was in accord with past hospital practice. Paruch said she would check on it; she later informed Almeida that, despite the past practice, she would have to remain on the call roster if she wanted to work the eighth month. Almeida appealed to Nientimp who said, "with the new women's lib and equal rights," if she wanted to work, she would have to be on call. Almeida felt that on call duty during her eighth month would be too tiring, so she took maternity leave one month earlier than planned.

When Almeida returned from maternity leave in September, she requested assignment to the operating room where she had worked for ten years and had been charge nurse for five. This request was denied by Nientimp who said that the operating room hours were filled. Almeida was assigned duties as a staff nurse. There was uncontradicted testimony that during the preceding six years every full-time operating room nurse had been allowed to return to the operating room after maternity leave.

The Board's Decision and Order

Except in one respect,[1] the Board affirmed the rulings, findings and conclusions of the A.L.J. It found that the hospital had violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act in the following particulars: by discharging Madeline Souza and Leslie Rocha; by issuing a warning to Rocha; by threatening Patricia Danis with extension of her probationary period or dismissal if she continued her association with the operating staff group; by suspending Rose Mary Almeida; by refusing to allow Almeida to work her eighth month of pregnancy without also being on call; by not assigning Almeida to the operating room when she returned from maternity leave; by warning Rocha not to be seen coming to work with Souza; and by prohibiting Souza, Loos and Cawley from talking together on the hospital premises during nonworking hours.

[1] The A.L.J. found as a fact that the hospital had refused to assign Souza or Almeida to act as charge nurse of the operating room in Paruch's absence because they participated in protected, concerted activities. He ruled, however, as a matter of law that the appointment of temporary supervisors is outside the protection of the Act and, therefore, there was no violation. The Board reversed and found an 8(a)(1) violation.

The hospital has not raised this issue on appeal and we, therefore, do not reach it.

The Board agreed with the A.L.J. that the hospital took these actions because the nurses involved had engaged in protected, concerted activity.

Our review of the record convinces us that the evidence of the § 8(a)(1) violations was not only substantial; in most respects, it was overwhelming. The two nurses who were discharged were very active in the group protesting the hospital's call policy. Their records at the hospital over a period of sixteen years (Souza) and ten years (Rocha) were exemplary. The hospital stresses the seriousness of a nurse walking out of an operation, but ignores the fact that in both instances, the nurses acted out of concern for the patients. This is in contrast to Hubbard Regional Hospital v. NLRB, 579 F.2d 1251, 1253 (1st Cir. 1978), relied on by the hospital; the nurses in Hubbard made sport of the patient as they took him to the operating room. Moreover, the operating room group had been told explicitly by Nientimp and Goslin that if a circulating nurse did not feel competent to scrub, she did not have to and other arrangements would be made.

The treatment of Almeida was also clearly retaliatory. Although she may have been trying to take advantage of the snowstorm to get time and one-half if she was called to work, she was not asking to get paid for hours that she did not work. She made a straightforward request, which was denied. The ridiculous accusation of bribery and extortion by the hospital personnel director was a reflection of his hostility against any member of the group. The refusal of the hospital, contrary to its past policy, to allow Almeida to return to work in the operating room after her maternity leave can only be interpreted as retaliatory. Again, we have a nurse with a spotless ten-year record whose only fault was that she was an active member of the operating room group.

The facts as to prohibiting talking at work and the veiled threats to the probationary operating room technician are not as stark, but easily meet the substantial evidence requirements.

We find no merit in the hospital's contention that the Board did not meet the test set forth in NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666 (1st Cir. 1979). The only serious question here is not whether the hospital had "good" reasons for the discharges, but whether the hospital deliberately put Souza and Rocha in a position where their lack of special training and their concern for the patient's welfare forced them to do what they did.

The order of the Board shall be enforced. Costs are awarded to the Board.

Peavey Company v. NLRB

NLRB v. Peavey Company

648 F.2d 460 (7th Cir.), May 6, 1981—249 NLRB 853

On petition to review Board Order

Before SWYGERT, SPRECHER and BAUER, Circuit Judges

461

BAUER, Circuit Judge: Petitioner, Peavey Company, seeks review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB"). The NLRB cross-petitions for enforcement. We grant enforcement in part and deny it in part.

I

The Board found that Peavey violated section 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3), when it discharged Mellinda Snider. The Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") found that Snider's discharge "was motivated at least in substantial part by her protected activities." While affirming the ALJ's conclusions of law, the Board labeled Peavey's reasons for the discharge a "pretext." The Board then found that "Snider was discharged solely because of her concerted and union activities." Peavey claims that legitimate business reasons justified Snider's discharge.

Since its decision in this case, the National Labor Relations Board issued its Wright Line decision, 251 N.L.R.B. No. 150, 105 L.R.R.M. 1169 (1980). Wright Line set forth definitive rules for resolving cases in which a "dual motive" discharge is alleged. The Board expressly rejected the "in part" test relied upon by the ALJ here. Instead, it applied the Supreme Court's test in Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 97 S.Ct. 568, 50 L.Ed.2d 471 (1977), to dual motive discharge cases. Under the new test, the General Counsel must first make a prima facie showing that the employee's protected conduct was a motivating factor in the employer's decision to discharge the employee. Once this is established, the burden shifts to the employer to demonstrate that he would have discharged the employee even in the absence of the protected conduct. Wright Line, 105 L.R.R.M. at 1175. The Board ruled that the Mt. Healthy test aimed to determine the causal relationship between the employee's protected activities and the employer's action. Once found, a causal relationship justifies liability under section 8(a)(3), without any quantitative label such as "in part" or "dominant motive." Id.

This is the first "dual motive" case to reach us for decision since Wright Line.[1] At least one other circuit has adopted the Mt. Healthy approach. See Statler Industries, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 644 F.2d 902 (1st Cir. 1981); N.L.R.B. v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666 (1st Cir. 1979). We have reviewed the decisions and have decided to follow the Mt. Healthy/Wright Line test in "dual motive" cases in this circuit.

Our review of the record as a whole convinces us that Peavey Company met its burden under the Wright Line decision. The evidence showed that, although a good typist, Snider was a sloppy worker and had a history of disputes with her supervisors. Peavey disciplined her in writing and advised her of possible discharge unless her work record and attitude improved. A few days before her discharge, she refused to insert notices of new pay scales into paycheck envelopes she was told to prepare. Snider's discharge was ultimately prompted by her refusal to retype some poorly-typed letters.

The Board backed away from the ALJ's determination that Snider's discharge was motivated "in part" by her union activity. In labeling Peavey's reasons as "pretextual," however, the Board relied on the same rationale as did the ALJ. It agreed that Peavey had "tolerated Snider's poor job performance for over eighteen months" until she began concerted activities. The Board also relied on Peavey's demonstrated "animus" towards the union and the timing of Snider's discharge.

Peavey's reasons here cannot be labeled pretextual. As Wright Line held, a pretext can be found to exist when "the purported rule or circumstances advanced by the employer did not exist, or was not, in fact, relied upon [sic]." 105 L.R.R.M. at 1170. Here, however, it is undisputed that Snider had been disciplined, for cause, prior to her contact with the union. Snider testified, in fact, that she went to the union as a result of her discipline. Her prior discipline also undermines the Board's claim that Peavey had tolerated Snider's poor preformance without complaint for eighteen months. Unlike in St. Luke's Memorial Hospital, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 623 F.2d 1173, 1179 (7th Cir. 1980), there were independent acts of misconduct at the time of Snider's discharge which justified Peavey's action. Moreover, an employer's silence does not extinguish its right to discipline an employee whose conduct continues to worsen. See N.L.R.B. v. Wilson Freight Co., 604 F.2d 712, 723 (1st Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 962, 100 S.Ct. 1277, 64 L.Ed.2d 238 (1980).

Once Peavey's reasons for discharge are stripped of the label "pretext," it is apparent that Peavey met its burden under the Wright Line decision. Even though Snider engaged in some protected activity, Peavey showed that she would have been discharged even in the absence of the protected conduct. See Pelton Casteel, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 627 F.2d 23, 30 (7th Cir. 1980). The substantial evidence on the record as a whole does not support the Board's finding of an 8(a)(3) violation. We therefore deny enforcement of that portion of the Board's order calling for reinstatement of and back pay for Snider.

II

The Board also found five violations of section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). The Board found that Peavey violated the Act when (1) its General Manager told Snider that she was a confidential employee and thus not entitled to participate in union activities; (2) Supervisor Sandy Noe followed employees and eavesdropped on their conversations; (3) it announced, after the union began organizing, that employees could see their personnel files; (4) its General Manager told an employee that persons who joined the union would be considered disloyal, thus decreasing their promotional chances; (5) its General Manager promised the employees at a meeting that "he was going to see that things" got better.

[1] A recent decision, Sullair P.T.V., Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 641 F.2d 500, 504 (7th Cir. 1981), cited but did not rely on Mt. Healthy and Wright Line, because there was no evidence of any illegal motive for the discharge.

After a review of the record as a whole, we conclude that substantal evidence supports the Board's finding of section 8(a)(1) violations. Peavey's contentions to the contrary are without merit. Accordingly, we enforce the rest of the Board's order.

Enforced in Part, Enforcement Denied in Part.

Soule Glass and Glazing Co. v. NLRB

652 F.2d 1055 (1st Cir.), May 7, 1981—246 NLRB 792

On petition to review and set aside Board Order

KEETON, District Judge: In this appeal, Soule Glass and Glazing Company and three related Soule firms [1] ("the company") petition this court to review and set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board ("the Board") finding the Company guilty of a number of unfair labor practices. The Board cross-applies for enforcement of its order. The case presents, in the words of petitioners' brief, "a virtual compendium" of the labor law issues implicated by an employer's operation during a strike.

I.

A summary of the history of the company and the labor dispute at issue provides the necessary context for our review of the Board's decision.

Soule Glass and Glazing Co. is one of several corporations owned by the Soule family, all of which are engaged in various facets of the glass and related businesses in the state of Maine. The present corporate structure evolved, under the direction of Charles Soule, from the original Soule Glass and Paint Company ("SGP"). Following several acquisitions and a reorganization in 1975, the parent company was renamed Soule Glass Industries ("SGI"), and the business was organized into two operating divisions, King & Dexter (hardware, glass cutting and fabrication, and metal fabrication) and SOAGCO (auto glass), and a wholly owned subsidiary, Soule Glass and Glazing ("SGG").[2] Charles Soule became president of SGI, Edward Churchill became president of SGG, and Andrew Soule, Charles Soule's cousin, was named SGG's treasurer. SGG took over the business of installing glass and framing on new construction projects ("contract work") as well as the replacement of broken glass in existing buildings ("replacement work").[3] SGG operated from various facilities in Portland, Lewiston, Waterville, and Bangor.

Petitioners' relationship with Glaziers Local 1516, International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL-CIO ("the union") has been long, if not harmonious. SGP's Portland employees have been represented by the Union since 1945. In 1969, following a strike, SGP entered into a three-year collective bargaining agreement for a unit of "all glaziers, apprentice glaziers, inside glass workers, metal fabricators, and truckdrivers, excluding all office clerical employees, salesmen, professional employees, guards and supervisors" at SGP's various locations. Following another strike in 1973, petitioners and the Union negotiated three separate three-year contracts for three separate units: SGP (succeeded by SGG), King & Dexter, and SOAGCO. Each of these contracts was to expire March 31, 1976. However, the employees of King & Dexter and SOAGCO voted to oust the Union, resulting in the decertification of the union in these units on March 24, 1976.

*Of the District Court of Massachusetts, sitting by designation.

[1] The Board's decision describes the employer as "Soule Glass and Glazing Co.; Soule Glass Industries; Soule Replacement Co. and/or Presque Isle Glass d/b/a Soule Glass and Glazing." The functions and relationship of the various Soule companies are discussed infra.

[2] Charles Soule in 1975 also formed another wholly-owned SGI-subsidiary, Presque Isle Glass, to perform glass work in the city of Presque Isle.

[3] The contract glass installation and glass replacement work performed by SGG employees is referred to as "outside" work; glass cutting and fabrication and metal fabrication constitutes "inside" work. "Outside glaziers" were generally higher paid than "inside glass workers."

On February 21, 1976, the union began bargaining with SGG for a contract to replace their 1973 agreement, covering bargaining unit employees engaged in outside glazing on new construction and replacement jobs. In all, 17 bargaining sessions were held. By the fifth session, on April 9, the parties had reached at least tentative agreement on all issues except wages and the duration of the contract, with the union demanding a $1.10 per hour raise in the minimum glaziers' pay rate for a one-year contract, and the company offering a two-year contract with increases at six month intervals of 15 cents, 10 cents, 15 cents, and 10 cents per hour. The Union rejected this offer, and on the morning of April 12, 1976, the bargaining unit employees of SGG went on strike. That afternoon, Charles Soule approved a flat 25 cents-per-hour pay raise, retroactive to April 1, for all the (non-striking, non-unit) employees of the King & Dexter and SOAGCO divisions of SGI.

For about the first month of the strike, SGG operated on an ad hoc basis, with supervisors and borrowed SGI personnel working long hours to fulfill the company's contractual glass installation obligations. Replacement work was initially neglected, and the company subcontracted certain work. Starting in mid-May, 1976, SGG began to hire permanent replacement employees to do outside glazing work formerly done by the striking bargaining unit employees.

On May 6, 1976, at the first post-strike bargaining session, the company announced its intention to close SGG's Lewiston and Waterville shops for economic reasons, and to have the employees on each of the affected crews report directly to jobs from their homes. Because of the closings, the Company proposed to divide the state into two wage zones instead of the three previously agreed to.[4] The Union rejected the two-zone proposal. At the May 6 meeting and thereafter, there was considerable discussion as to the effects of the Lewiston and Waterville closings on the employees at those locations.

At negotiating sessions on May 7, 1976, the union made a wage proposal for a three year contract with 26 cent increases very 6 months the first year, 29 cents every six months the second year, and one 54 cent increase in the third year. The company rejected this proposal, and offered a two year contract with six months increments of 20 cents, 15 cents, 21 cents, and 15 cents, which the union rejected. Thereafter, the company never increased this offer. Subsequently, at sessions on June 18, August 27, and October 18, the union reduced its wage demands to 90 cents for a one year contract, then to 80 cents for a one year contract, and finally 80 cents per year for a two year contract, respectively. The company rejected each of these offers, and no further progress was made toward resolving the wage issue.

In addition to the wage increase and the Lewiston-Waterville closing, several incidents during the strike and concomitant negotiations gave rise to unfair labor practice charges against the company. Early in the strike, pursuant to a "marketing concept" he had envolved for the Soule Companies,[5] Charles Soule formed Soule Glass Replacement Company ("SGR"), a wholly-owned subsidiary of SGI combining the former King & Dexter and SOAGCO divisons. "Replacement centers" were set up as early as April 1976, and the transfer of a majority of the replacement work formerly done by SGG employees took place in May and June. Whether this transfer of bargining unit work was implemented as a permanent change (and if so, at what point it became so) or was instead a temporary response to the exigencies of the strike is disputed. The existence of SGR and the company's "proposal" to transfer permanently the majority of SGG's replacement work was first disclosed to the union in an "agenda" distributed by the company's attorney at the August 6 bargaining session. The agenda proposed changes in a number of noneconomic areas on which agreement had previously been reached, including work jurisdiction, elimination of the apprenticeship plan, company discretion as to new employees' wages (above contractual minimum), modification of the grievance and arbitration clauses, and addition of a non-retaliation clause. The union made no immediate response to the specifics of the agenda.

[4] As reflected in previous contracts, SGG glaziers at the company's four locations historically had three different wage scales; with the highest wages in Portland, the lowest in Bangor, and an intermediate wage at Lewiston-Waterville. Glaziers were paid on the basis of which shop they came from rather than where the particular job on which they were working was located. In negotiations prior to the strike, the parties had agreed to divide the state into three "wage zones," whereby glaziers would be paid on the basis of which zone they were working in, not where they came from.

[5] Charles Soule's objective was to effect a division of labor whereby SGI became a wholesaler of glass, metal framing and related products, SGG did exclusively contract work on new construction projects, and the newly-formed SGR combined all auto glass installation and broken window replacement work.

On June 25, 1976, SGG president Edward Churchill and manager Edward Tribou were involved in two incidents involving confrontations with picketing strikers. Following lunch at a Bangor restaurant, Churchill and Tribou drove to SGG's Bangor facility, where a striker's vehicle was allegedly parked on company property. Following some discussion with strikers Carleton French and Harold Douglas, Tribou seized a picket sign that was leaning against a truck windshield and threw it into the street. Churchill then attempted to persuade the two strikers to return to work, allegedly offering raises of first ten cents and then one dollar, and inviting both to discuss the matter later over drinks. After both pickets refused, Tribou directed insults at the two and he and Churchill departed. Churchill and Tribou then drove to SGG's nearby Hampden facility, where Tribou again seized the strikers' picket signs and threw them on the ground. Churchill allegedly grabbed picket Nick Botzko, a robust 60 year old man, around the neck and held Botzko's head down as if preparing to punch him. Striker Michael Nadeau at that point jumped from a concealed position behind an air compressor and Churchill released Botzko. Tribou made various abusive and threatening remarks to Nadeau, and departed with Churchill. These incidents were reported to the union membership at a meeting held shortly thereafter.

During the November 22, 1976 bargaining session, the union's attorney (Cohen) requested that the company provide certain wage and hour information to permit the union to evaluate the company's wage position. The company's attorney (Levenson) told the union to put its request in writing. On November 23 Cohen wrote Levenson requesting wage and hour data for all nonstriking employees of SGI, SGR, and SGG. At the December 9 bargaining session, Levenson gave the union a written reply, stating that the company was furnishing the wage rates (without names) and aggregate weekly overtime hours of all SGG employees, but declining to furnish any information regarding the nonunion SGI and SGR employees. December 9, 1976 was the final bargaining session.[6]

On March 8, 1977, attorney Cohen wrote to attorney Levenson on behalf of the strikers, unconditionally applying for the immediate reinstatement of 22 named individuals, and proposing to resume negotiations. Levenson responded on March 10 with a letter stating that the request "must be studied carefully before making a definitive reply," that Andrew Soule would like to interview individually each of the strikers applying for reinstatement, and suggesting possible dates for a bargaining session. On March 11, Cohen wrote Levenson emphasizing that the request was for reinstatement of the named strikers "as a group" to their former or equivalent jobs and asserting that as unfair labor practice strikers they were entitled to reinstatement as of right and that conditioning reinstatement on individual interviews was unlawful. Cohen agreed to meet on March 28, 1977 for further negotiations. Levenson by letter of March 21 notified the union that striker David Bates, whose name was among the 22 reinstatement applicants, was being terminated for strike misconduct and would not be reinstated.

On March 25, 1977, Levenson again wrote Cohen, this time informing him that the scheduled meeting would be "without purpose," in that, because of the company's "doubts that Local 1516 continues to represent the bargaining unit at Soule Glass and Glazing Company," the company was withdrawing its recognition of the union as bargaining representative. The company stated it would, "upon proper application," reinstate strikers when openings occurred.

On June 27, 1977, the Board's Regional Director issued a consolidated complaint, consolidating five sets of unfair labor practice charges brought by the union against the company during the negotiations and strike.[7] Specifically, the complaint, as later

[6] On March 18, 1977, pursuant to a settlement agreement approved by the Board's Regional Office, the company supplied the union with wage information on SGG's employees before the strike, and the names and hours worked by week of each striker replacement and other company employees who had performed some glass replacement work during the strike.

[7] As noted in the complaint, the cases arising from three of the union's charges were settled and the settlement agreements were approved by the Regional Director. However, on June 14, 1977, the Regional Direcamended, charged the company with violating § 8(a)(1) of the act by increasing wages of nonstrikers, assaulting a picketing striker, and offering wage inducements to picketing strikers; violating § 8(a)(1) and (5) by unilaterally combining wage zones, refusing to supply relevant requested information, withdrawing recognition of the union, and unilaterally permanently reassigning bargaining unit work to nonunit employees; and violating section 8(a)(3) and (1) by refusing to reinstate the strikers. The complaint makes no mention of the Lewiston-Waterville shop closings, and does not charge bad faith bargaining as an independent violation.

The case was heard before an Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") at a ten day hearing in November and December, 1977. On July 9, 1979, the ALJ issued his decision and remedial order finding the company guilty of a number of unfair labor practices. On December 5, 1979, a three member panel of the Board summarily affirmed, in a brief order without opinion, and with one minor modification, the AFJ's findings, conclusions, and order.

II.

Standard of Review

Section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act ("the Act"), 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), provides that "The findings of the Board with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole shall be conclusive." As interpreted by the Supreme Court in Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951), " '[s]ubstantial evidence is more than a mere scintilla. It means such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support a conclusion,' " Id. at 477, 71 S.Ct. at 459. In searching "the whole record" for substantial evidence, a reviewing court "must take into account whatever in the record fairly detracts" from the Board's fact finding as well as evidence that supports it. Id. at 487–88, 71 S.Ct. at 464-465. The court may not substitute its judgment for that of the Board when the choice is "between two fairly conflicting views, even though the court would justifiably have made a different choice had the matter been before it de novo," and must defer to the Board's inferences in the Board's areas of specialized experience and expertise. Id. at 488, 71 S.Ct. at 465. However, it is appropriate to set aside the Board's decision when the court "cannot conscientiously find that the evidence supporting that decision is substantial, when viewed in the light that the record in its entirety furnishes, including the body of evidence opposed to the Board's view." Id. at 488, 71 S.Ct. at 465. As to mixed questions of law and fact, such as the inferences drawn by the board from the evidence (e.g., motive) or the application of a statutory standard to particular factfindings (e.g., bargaining in good faith), the court must sustain the board's conclusions if reasonable. See, e.g., Famet, Inc. v. NLRB, 490 F.2d 293, 295 (9th cir. 1973); NLRB v. Marcus Trucking Co., 286 F.2d 583, 592 (2d Cir. 1961).

In light of these criteria we review the Board's findings of fact and conclusions of law.

III.

Procedural Due Process

Petitioners challenge several of the Board's unfair labor practice findings against them as violative of due process, in that these violations were not charged in the General Counsel's amended complaint. In particular petitioners attack on due process grounds the "course of conduct" violation, held to violate § 8(a)(5) and (1); the additional finding of a § 8(a)(5) violation with respect to the wage increase when only § 8(a)(1) was charged; and the § 8(a)(5) and (1) violations found regarding "reneging" on the three wage zone agreement and the Lewiston-Waterville closing. Although we deal with each of these claims individually in later sections of this opinion, it is useful to set forth initially the analytic framework common to all such claims.

Due process requires that persons charged with unlawful conduct be given prior notice of the charges and an opportunity to be heard in defense before the government can take enforcement action. For federal agency adjudications, the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 554(b)(3), provides that "[p]ersons entitled to notice of an agency hearing shall be timely informed of * * * the matters of fact and law asserted." The NLRB's tor revoked his approval, set aside the the settlement agreements, and reopened the cases, following the regional office's investigation of subsequent charges filed by the union.

own rule, 29 C.F.R. § 102.15, requires that "[t]he complaint shall contain * * * a clear and concise 1074 description of the acts which are claimed to constitute unfair labor practices, including, where known, the approximate dates and places of such acts and the names of the respondent's agents or other representatives by whom committed." The General Counsel's complaint, which may be liberally amended, is designed to notify the adverse party of claims to be adjudicated so he may prepare his case, and sets the standard of relevance at the hearing before the ALJ. Douds v. International Longshoremen's Ass'n. 241 F 2d 278, 283 (2d Cir. 1957).

Due process prohibits the enforcement of a finding by the Board of a violation "neither charged in the complaint nor litigated at the hearing." NLRB v. H.E. Fletcher Co., 298 F.2d 594, 600 (1st Cir. 1962); Boyle's Famous Corned Beef Co. v. NLRB, 400 F.2d 154, 162 (8th Cir. 1968). Stated in the strongest terms, "[f]ailure to clearly define the issues and advise an employer chared with a violation * * * of the specific complaint he must meet and provide a full hearing upon the issue presented is * * * to deny procedural due process of law." J.C. Penney Co. v. NLRB, 384 F.2d 479, 483 (10th Cir. 1967). The adversary process employed in NLRB adjudication is premised on having a neutral, impartial trier of fact, with the General Counsel serving as prosecutor. The ALJ may not, in effect, become a litigant by "prosecuting" uncharged violations. Although the ALJ may, in his discretion, "call attention to an uncharged violation or decide an uncharged violation which has been fully litigated by the parties, * * * he should [not] undertake to decide an issue which he alone has injected into the hearing, especially where, as here, the parties were never advised to litigate the issue." NLRB v. Tamper, Inc., 522 F.2d 781, 789–90 (4th Cir. 1975) (emphasis in original) (denying enforcement because ALJ's action "so inherently prejudicial").

However, courts have recognized "the Board's power to decide an issue that has been fairly and fully tried by the parties, despite the fact that the issue was not specifically pleaded," Drug Package, Inc. v. NLRB, 570 F.2d 1340, 1345 (8th Cir. 1978); and have gone so far as to state that the Board "has an obligation to decide material issues" which were fully litigated although not specifically pleaded. American Boiler Manufacturers Ass'n v. NLRB, 404 F.2d 547, 556 (8th Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 960, 90 S.Ct. 2162, 26 L.Ed.2d 546 (1970). See NLRB v. Puerto Rico Rayon Mills Inc., 293 F.2d 941, 947 (1st Cir. 1961) (issue obvious, fully litigated, no prejudice shown). Inconsequential or technical variances between the phraseology or characterization of the violation charged and the violation found are not a valid defense where it is clear the respondent "understood the issue and was afforded full opportunity to justify [its actions]," NLRB v. Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., 304 U.S. 333, 350, 58 S.Ct. 904, 913, 82 L.Ed. 1381 (1938); REA Trucking Co. v. NLRB, 439 F.2d 1065, 1066 (9th Cir. 1971).

Thus, the test is one of fairness under the circumstances of each case—whether the employer knew what conduct was in issue and had a fair opportunity to present his defense. For example, if the identical employer conduct gave rise to two violations, the legal elements of which overlap substantially, and only one was charged, under some circumstances it may be fair to say that both were "fully litigated." However, in Drug Package, 570 F.2d at 1345, the court held that an issue was "not fairly litigated" because > [a]lthough the underlying facts were litigated, the Company at the time of the hearing, was aware only of the possibility that the Board would find an 8(a)(1) violation * * *. Had the Company been given notice of the possibility of an 8(a)(5) violation and the resulting additional penalties, it might have litigated the matter differently.

In this regard, the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit recently noted:

> Many labor dispute cases involve multiple charges based on a variety of occurrences. This case was complex and confusing—there were not only a number of charges but a change of ownership, * * *. Simply because violations could have been 1075 alleged in addition to those in the complaint does not obligate the employer to defend against all possibilities.

NLRB v. Pepsi-Cola Bottling Co. of Topeka, 613 F.2d 267, 274 (10th Cir. 1980). This observation is particularly pertinent to the instant case, in which eight instances of employer conduct were charged as violating some or all of three provisions of the statute, and where the hearing consumed ten trial days.

In light of these standards, we find it necessary to reverse several of the unfair labor practice charges found by the ALJ. See Parts V(B), VI(A), and IX(A), infra.

IV.

Single Employer

The Board held that SGI and its subsidiaries, SGG and SGR, constituted a "single employer" for the purposes of the Act. There is apparently no dispute as to the criteria upon which the single employer issue is to be determined.

"[T]he Board considers several nominally separate business entities to be a single employer where they comprise an integrated enterprise * * *. The controlling criteria, * * * are [1] interrelation of operations, [2] common management, [3] centralized control of labor relations and [4] common ownership." Radio & Television Broadcast Union v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc., 380 U.S. 255, 256, 85 S.Ct. 876, 877, 13 L.Ed.2d 789 (1965) (per curiam). This court has noted that the Board's "single employer" conclusion "is 'essentially a factual one' and not to be disturbed provided substantial evidence in the record supports the Board's findings." NLRB v. C.K. Smith & Co., 569 F.2d 162, 164 (1st Cir. 1977) (noting that "the sale of essentially similar products via similar distribution methods is also probative of integration"), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 957, 98 S.Ct. 3070, 57 L.Ed.2d 1122 (1978). The "single employer" finding depends on "all the circumstances of the case," and none of the above factors is controlling. NLRB v. Don Burgess Construction Corp., 596 F.2d 378, 384 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 940, 100 S.Ct. 293, 62 L.Ed.2d 306 (1979).[8]

Perhaps the most important of the above criteria, in the Board's eyes, is the degree of centralized control over labor relations policies, although this alone is not determinative. Local 627, Operating Engineers v. NLRB, 518 F.2d 1040, 1046 (D.C. Cir. 1975), aff'd in part and vacated in part, 425 U.S. 800, 96 S.Ct. 1842, 48 L.Ed.2d 382 (1976). In Local 627, the Court of Appeals reversed the Board's finding of separate employers, relying on the facts that the two companies were wholly owned operating subsidiaries of the same parent, in related businesses, with an "interchange of key personnel" and some "instances of interchange of employees," and "a substantial qualitative degree of interrelation of operations and common management—one that we are satisfied would not be found in the arm's length relationship existing among unintegrated companies." Id. at 1047. The Supreme Court affirmed the single employer holding. 425 U.S. at 802–03, 96 S. Ct. at 1843–1844. See Royal Typewriter Co. v. NLRB, 533 F.2d 1030, 1043 (8th Cir. 1976) ("A more critical test is whether the controlling company possessed the present and apparent means to exercise its clout in matters of labor negotiations by its divisions or subsidiaries * * *."); Sakrete of Northern California, Inc. v. NLRB, 332 F.2d 902, 907 (9th Cir. 1964) ("If there is overall control of critical matters at the policy level, the fact that there are variances in local management decisions will not defeat application of the 'single employer' principle"), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 961, 85 S.Ct. 649, 13 L.Ed.2d 556 (1965).

The ALJ found, in support of his conclusion that the Soule companies were a single employer, (1) that the 1976 corporate structure had evolved from a common ancestor, Soule Glass and Paint; (2) that the corporations had an "interlocking relationship," by virtue of "the interrelation of operations and common flow of management personnel from one corporation to another"; (3) that "the ownership and financial control of the various Soule enterprises rests solidly in the hands of the Soule family, and that the majority stockholder of the SGI [which owns all of the stock of SGG and SGR] is Charles Soule"; (4) that "on limited occasions there was employee interchange" and "interchange of equipment, particularly trucks"; (5) that in certain instances SGG shared premises with another Soule enterprise; and finally (6) as to "the critical factor of centralized control of labor relations," that "Charles Soule is the person who has and exercises the power to make the major decisions, including labor relations decisions, for the entire Soule complex, including SGG."

[8] It is important to distinguish between the concepts of single employer and single bargaining unit. Under § 9(a) of the Act, a bargaining unit means a group of jobs constituting an election constituency; it is comprised of jobs and job classifications, not people, and the Board ascertains what is an "appropriate" bargaining unit under a "community of interest" standard. R. Gorman, Labor Law 66–69 (1976). A bargaining unit may, for example, constitute some subgroup of jobs in a particular plant. "The fact that two companies have been designated a single employer for purposes of the act is not determinative as to whether both * * * constitute a single bargaining unit." Don Burgess Construction, 596 F.2d at 386.

Each of these findings is supported by substantial evidence in the record. In each instance the ALJ based his finding on specific testimony, which he reasonably credited. Since the Board's findings satisfy each of the criteria set forth in Broadcast Union, supra, we affirm the ALJ's holding that SGG, SGR, and SGI may be considered a single employer.

The ALJ did not make clear his view of the significance of this holding to the other issues in the case. We note, however, that the single employer finding enhances the relevance, to the labor dispute between SGG and the union, of certain corporate actions whose primary impact occurred beyond the corporate boundaries of SGG (e.g., the wage increase and the creation of SGR), and may provide the basis for corporationwide relief.

V.

The Wage Increase

The ALJ found, on the basis of Charles Soule's testimony and the timing and amount of the wage increase, that the granting of 25 cent-per-hour pay increases to non-striking SGI employees on the first day of the strike violated § 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Charles Soule stated that

> April 12 arrived, and I became very aware of the fact that because * * * certain picket lines were in front of our locations, that maybe it was time to act upon granting a wage increase. So I gathered the information and consulted with my payroll clerk * * * [and] decided that a flat ten dollar, or 25 cent raise per hour was appropriate at that particular time.

Charles Soule also testified that annual pay increases for these employees historically had been granted around April 1, that an across-the-board 25 cent-per-hour raise was on the average just under a five percent increase, consistent with the company's wage policy, and that he was aware of the general status of the negotiations between the SCG and the union on the wage issue.

From these facts the ALJ concluded: Under these circumstances there can be little doubt that Respondent's intention was to emphasize to the strikers at the outset of the strike that it did not pay to support their Union. Alba-Waldensian, Inc., 167 NLRB 695, 696; Chanticleer, Inc., 161 NLRB 241, 252. I find that the Respondent violated Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act on April 12 by granting this unilateral wage increase for nonstriking employees, greater than what was offered to employees in the bargaining unit.

A. The § 8(a)(1) Violation

Under § 8(a) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a), it is an unfair labor practice for an employer "(1) to interfere with, restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title [basically to organize, join unions, bargain collectively, and strike]," and "(5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees * * *."

The elements of a section 8(a)(1) violation are to be determined by reference to an objective test. It is not necessary to show that particular employees actually felt coerced, etc., or that the employer intended to produce the impermissible effect. E. g., Russell Stover Candies, Inc. v. NLRB, 551 F.2d 204, 207–08 (8th Cir. 1977) (reasonable tendency, not actual effect); Crown Central Petroleum Corp. v. NLRB, 430 F.2d 724, 729 (5th Cir. 1970) (employer motive not an element); cf., Peerless of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 484 F.2d 1108, 1114–15 (7th Cir. 1973). Rather, "it is sufficient if the General Counsel can show that the employer's actions would tend to coerce a reasonable employee." R. Gorman, Labor law 132 (1976). In addition, § 8(a)(1) requires a weighing of employer and employee interests. Employer conduct that otherwise tends to interfere, restrain or coerce employees "may be held lawful if it advances a substantial and legitimate company interest in plant safety, efficiency or discipline," or is "in accordance with plant custom or business necessity." Id. at 133. "[I]t is only when the interference with § 7 rights outweighs the business justification for the employer's action that § 8(a)(1) is violated." Textile Workers Union v. Darlington Manufacturing Co., 380 U.S. 263, 269, 85 S.Ct. 994, 999, 13 L.Ed.2d 827 (1965).

It is settled that the grant or withholding of wage increases and other benefits, either discriminatorily or across-the-board to all employees, may violate § 8(a)(1). E. g., NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 409–10, 84 S.Ct. 457, 459–460, 11 L.Ed.2d 435 (1964) (grant of additional benefits to all employees before representation election for purpose of discouraging unionization). NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 233–36, 83 S.Ct. 1139, 1148–1150, 10 L.Ed.2d 308 (1963) (post-strike award of super-seniority to striker replacements and nonstrikers); NLRB v. Rubatex Corp., 601 F.2d 147, 149–50 (4th Cir.) (post-strike bonus to union and nonunion strikers), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 928, 100 S.Ct. 269, 62 L.Ed.2d 185 (1979); Aero-Motive Manufacturing Co., 195 NLRB 790 (1972), enf'd, 475 F.2d 27 (6th Cir. 1973) (post-strike bonus to non-striking union employees). The timing of such wage increases is a relevant factor in determining whether an employer's action violates § 8(a)(1). See Russell-Newman Manufacturing Co. v. NLRB, 407 F.2d 247, 251–52 (5th Cir. 1969) (wage increase at nonunion plant just after union won elelction at company's other plant violated § 8(a)(1)); NLRB v. Fitzgerald Mills Corp., 313 F.2d 260, 268 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 834, 84 S.Ct. 47, 11 L.Ed.2d 64 (1963) (unilateral wage increase to all (unionized) employees, announced contemporaneously with strike decision, violated § 8(a)(1) and (5)); NLRB v. Otis Hospital, 545 F.2d 252, 256 (1st Cir. 1976) (withholding promised wage increase from all employees during union organizing compaign violated § 8(a)(1)). The relevant inquiry is whether the wage increase impermissibly discriminated against the union by "demonstrat[ing] for the future the special rewards which lie in store for employees who choose to refrain from protected strike activity," Aero-Motive, supra, 195 NLRB at 792, and "[bringing] home in concrete fashion to those employees who were aware of it that it did not pay to become associated with the union," Chanticleer, Inc. 161 NLRB 241, 252 (1966).[9]

On the other hand, an employer may lawfully treat differently union and nonunion employees or employees in different bargaining units, where a legitimate business justification is shown for such action, and absent evidence of bad faith or antiunion motive. In Chevron Oil Co. v. NLRB, 442 F.2d 1067 (5th Cir. 1971), during the course of negotiations with the union the company granted nonunion employees wage increases and improved benefits and denied the same to union employees. The court denied enforcement of the Board's findings of § 8(a)(1) and (3) violations, stating, "* * * in a context of good-faith bargaining, and absent other proof of unlawful motive, an employer is privileged to withhold from organized employees wage increases granted to unorganized employees or condition their grant upon final contract settlement." Id. at 1074. Similarly, in Omaha Typographical Union v. NLRB, 545 F.2d 1138 (8th Cir. 1976), the court upheld the Board's dismissal of an 8(a)(1) charge regarding the employer's grant of selective bonuses to those who had worked long hours during a strike by the union. The court reasoned that "[d]isparate treatment of workers of different units provides no inference of discrimination * * *. [T]he bonuses were paid for a legitimate business purpose [i.e., rewarding the extraordinary effort necessary to continue operations] which did not interfere with the exercise * * * of the employees' § 7 rights to engage in strikes." Id. at 1144 (emphasis added).

Although the issue is a close one, we hold that the Board's conclusion that the wage increase violated § 8(a)(1) is supported by substantial evidence. The timing of the increase (granted on the first day of the strike), its amount (an immediate, retroactive 25 cents-per-hour as compared to the six-month increments of 15 cents, 10 cents, 15 cents and 10 cents offered the union), and the evidence of causation (Charles Soule's testimony that the pickets prompted the wage increase) all support the conclusion that the employer's action would tend to interfere with and undermine a reasonable employee's exercise of the right to strike, and that this effect was at least clearly foreseeable, if not in fact intended.

To be sure, there are a number of countervailing factors which might have produced a reasonable conclusion to the contrary. Among these are the fact that the increase was granted only to non-bargaining unit employees of a different corporation[10] who had recently voted to decertify the union, the proffered business justification regarding the consistency of the timing of the increase with past practice, and the fact that the increase was not announced to the union (which could cut both ways). Also, we are troubled by the conclusory manner in which the ALJ asserts his certainty as to the employer's antiunion intention, and his reliance on a patently distinguishable case.[11] Notwithstanding these concerns, our review is a limited one, and we may not substitute our judgment for that of the Board. There is substantial evidence in the record supporting the ALJ's findings, and, giving due deference to the Board's experience and expertise in such matters, we conclude that the ALJ's inferences as to causation, the probable effect of the wage increase upon the striking employees, and the employer's motivation are reasonable. Therefore, we affirm the ALJ's holding that the wage increase violated § 8(a)(1).

[9] In this respect there is considerable overlap between § 8(a)(1) and § 8(a)(3), which prohibits "discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization," 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3), except that § 8(a)(3) typically requires a showing of antiunion motivation. See R. Gorman, supra, at 137–38. No § 8(a)(3) violation was charged regarding the wage increase.

B. The § 8(a)(5) Violation

To the extent that the additional § 8(a)(5) finding has independent force, however, we reverse on due process grounds the ALJ's holding that the wage increase also violated § 8(a)(5). No § 8(a)(5) violation was charged in the amended complaint with respect to the wage increase. The ALJ, acknowledging this fact, stated as justification that > the facts upon which this additional finding of a Section 8(a)(5) violation is based are the same and were fully litigated. It is well established that an employer may violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act during negotiations by the conduct of its supervisors and agents away from the bargaining table. Chatham Manufacturing Company, 172 NLRB 1948, 1978.

Accepting the validity of the latter proposition, we are unable to sustain the § 8(a)(5) finding. Because no explanation is given of how or why the wage increase additionally violated § 8(a)(5), we are unable to determine that this issue was in fact "fully litigated," notwithstanding the ALJ's conclusory assertion that it was. There is nothing in the record suggesting that the employer had notice at the hearing that its good faith in dealing with the union on and before April 12, 1976 was at issue. To the contrary, there are affirmative indications that the company's counsel believed and acted on the justifiable assumption that it was not. See part IX infra. Due process forbids the ALJ from gratuitously injecting new issues into the case and deciding them sua sponte. NLRB v. Tamper, Inc., supra, 522 F.2d at 789–90. Moreover, on substantive grounds, it is not immediately apparent, in light of Chevron, supra, how granting a wage increase to non-unit non-union employees—with respect to whom there was no duty to bargain with the union—can of itself constitute a refusal to bargain in good faith, absent some other evidence of bad faith not present here.

C. Conversion of the Strike

It is apparently undisputed, and the ALJ found, that "the strike was called because the wage issue was not settled and therefore was an economic strike at the outset." However, the ALJ found that the strike was "converted" to an unfair labor practice strike on its first day, April 12, 1976, by the company's unfair labor practice of granting the wage increase.[12] The ALJ notes that the wage in-

[10] The significance of the fact that SGI and SGG were distinct corporate entities is vitiated by our conclusion, in part II, supra, that the two were properly found to be a "single employer" for the purposes of the Act. Also, the evidence shows that the replacements for striking SGG bargaining unit members, when hired, also received wages 25 cents-per-hour higher than union members had previously received for the same job classification.

[11] As is discussed in greater detail in part IX infra, Alba-Waldensian, Inc., 167 NLRB 695 (1967), was a case in which the employer's grant of additional wages and benefits to employees in its unorganized plants while denying the same to the union was just one of many elements supporting a finding of overall course of bad faith bargaining. The wage increase was merely cited as additional evidence of bad faith and was not treated as an independent violation. In this context the Board concluded that the company "utilized the pay raise to demonstrate to the [unionized] employees . . . the impotence of the [union]." Id. at 696–97. Alba-Waldensian presents a pattern of employer behavior far more egregious in degree and kind than is disclosed by the record here. Here we find no evidence, independent of the fact that the wage increase was granted, to support the inference that the company's intention was to disparage and undermine support for the union, or that this action was part of an overall scheme of bad faith bargaining (see part IX infra).

Nevertheless, given that intent or motive is not an element of a § 8(a)(1) violation, cases like Rubatex and Aero-Motive, supra, do at least by analogy provide support for the Board's ultimate § 8(a)(1) conclusion.

[12] The exact basis of the ALJ's finding of conversion is somewhat clouded. The relevant passage from the ALJ's decision reads as follows:

> Beginning with the April 12 wage increase the respondent engaged in a course of conduct designed to disparage the Union in the eyes of its members, erode its strength, undermine its bargaining position, and ulti-crease was promptly reported to the union pickets by the nonstrikers, and was shortly thereafter discussed at a union membership meeting.

A strike begun in support of economic objectives becomes an unfair labor practice strike when the employer commits an intervening unfair labor practice which is found to make the strike last longer than it otherwise would have. E. g., NLRB v. Moore Business Forms, Inc., 574 F.2d 835, 840 (5th Cir. 1978); R. Gorman, supra, at 339. It must be found not only that the employer committed an unfair labor practice after the commencement of the strike, but that as a result the strike was "expanded to include a protest over [the] unfair labor practice[ ]," NLRB v. Top Manufacturing Co., 594 F.2d 223, 225 (9th Cir. 1979), and that settlement of the strike was thereby delayed and the strike prolonged. Moore Business Forms, supra, at 840. The central, and most problematic, element is causation—the effect of the employer's unlawful conduct on the union and its strike. Was the unfair labor practice a proximate cause of the lengthening of the strike? The burden of proof is on the General Counsel to demonstrate prolongation, and the Board's determination of conversion is reviewed under the usual substantial evidence standard. R. Gorman, supra, at 340. However, it need not be shown that the employer's unfair practice was "the sole or even the major cause or aggravating factor of the strike," but only that it was "a contributing factor." Moore Business Forms, supra, at 840 (emphasis added). The new issue injected into the bargaining process by the employer's violation "need not be the sole cause for failure to agree." Rogers Manufacturing Co. v. NLRB, 486 F.2d 644, 649 (6th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 937, 94 S.Ct. 1937, 40 L.Ed.2d 288 (1974).

Both objective and subjective factors may be probative of conversion. Applying objective criteria, the Board and reviewing court may properly consider the probable impact of the type of unfair labor practice in question on reasonable strikers in the relevant context. Applying subjective criteria, the Board and court may give substantial weight to the strikers' own characterization of their motive for continuing to strike after the unfair labor practice. Did they continue to view the strike as economic or did their focus shift to protesting the employer's unlawful conduct? See NLRB v. Broadmoor Lumber Co., 578 F.2d 238, 242 (9th Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Colonial Haven Nursing Home, Inc., 542 F.2d 691, 703 (7th Cir. 1976). However, in examining the union's characterization of the purpose of the strike, the Board and court must be wary of self-serving rhetoric of sophisticated union officials and members inconsistent with the true factual context. See Colonial Haven, supra, at 705; Winter Garden Citrus Products Corp. v. NLRB, 238 F.2d 128, 130 (5th Cir. 1956).

On the record before us, we are unable to sustain the Board's finding that the strike was converted by the April 12, 1976 wage increase. Although we have held that the wage increase was an unfair labor practice, our review does not disclose substantial evidence that this violation prolonged the strike. The ALJ's finding of conversion is both ambiguous and conclusory, see note 12 supra, and contains no finding as to causation or any discussion at all of evidence as to the effect of learning of the wage increase upon the strikers.

The only direct evidence bearing on the issue is the uncorroborated [13] testimony of union business agent Walter Dolbow, whom the ALJ credited generally, that the wage increase was discussed "at length" at the union membership meeting held about a week after April 12 and that the membership "agreed that they would not go back at the wage package that the company had presented. They felt that if they could give the non-striking employees this kind of an increase, we should have been at least offered the same thing" (emphasis added). Dolbow also testified that the membership was "all steamed up" at the meeting over the fact that management and SGI employees "were doing our > mately destroy its majority. This course of action was highlighted by specific incidents of bad faith which have been discussed in detail [above] * * *. Consequently, I find that the strike was converted to an unfair labor practice strike on April 12 by Respondent's unlawful conduct, and was thereafter prolonged by the Respondent's unfair labor practices both at and away from the bargaining table.

(Emphasis added.) It is thus unclear whether the ALJ found that the wage increase alone converted the strike or instead that it was the first of a sequence of events the combined force of which converted the strike as of the time of the first event, April 12. If the ALJ's finding is interpreted in the latter way, it is like a finding that the camel's back broke when the first straw was loaded. See note 14 infra.

[13] The General Counsel offered no other testimony as to the events at the union's post-strike meeting and the members' reaction to the wage increase.

work." Thus, it appears that the wage increase was only one of the things about which the members were upset in the first week of the strike. Fully crediting Dolbow's testimony and taking it at face value establishes that (1) the union would not accept the company's wage proposal (the unacceptability of which was the undisputed cause of the strike) and would remain on strike until the company increased its offer by some unspecified amount, and (2) that the 25 cent increase to the nonstrikers effectively set a "floor" below which the union, it can be inferred, would not settle. Cf. NLRB v. Brazos Electric Power Coop., 615 F.2d 1100, 1101 (5th Cir. 1980). The first proposition merely reaffirms the economic nature of the strike. The most that could be inferred from the second, standing alone, is that the wage increase may have "aggravated [the company's] differences with the Union" on the crucial wage issue, Kohler Co., 128 NLRB 1062, 1083–84 (1960), and thereby caused the union to hold out for a higher offer or to persist with higher demands than it otherwise would have. In context and without some further corroboration in the record, however, the latter inference is an unduly tenuous and speculative basis on which to hinge the Board's determination of the fundamental nature of the strike and the harsh remedial consequences that flow from such a determination.

Given the scant and equivocal evidence of the union's contemporaneous reaction to the wage increase, it is appropriate to look to subsequent events and the overall context of the strike for indications as to whether the wage increase in fact prolonged the strike.[14] The record of the bargaining sessions after April 12 belies the claim that the 25 cent-per-hour wage increase prolonged the strike. The union's final pre-strike wage demand was an immediate $1.10-per-hour increase for a one year contract, a demand company attorney Levenson testified the union was "very serious about," because the SGG glazies "felt themselves low men on the totem pole, in comparison with the whole country's glaziers." Thus, it appears that the union's relatively high wage demand, as compared to previous increases,[15] was not mere window dressing, but was a sincere position based on the strikers' preception that they were substantially underpaid.

That the union's predominant, if not sole, concern after April 12 remained improving substantially its members' wages, rather than protesting or redressing the company's favorable treatment of the nonstrikers, is indicated by Walter Dolbow's testimony regarding the first post-strike bargaining session on May 6, 1976. Dolbow stated that "[w]e were determined to increase our wages * * *. We wanted a decent increase"; and that "Jim [Holcroft, the Union's chief negotiator] stated that the main problem was money and our members were adamant to the point that we were not going to stay at the low point that we had been put by the company." Other union negotiators subsequently reiterated that wages were the critical issue, and for some time refused to discuss other issues. However, there is no indication in the record that the wage increase to nonstrikers was a major source of dispute or topic of discussion at any bargaining session, that it was used as a point of reference by the Union's negotiators for their demands, or that the wage increase was ever even discussed at the bargaining table. Indeed, it was not until July 27, 1976 that the union filed an unfair labor practice charge which included the wage increase.[16] Moreover, Dolbow tes-

[14] The ALJ may have meant to apply a theory that later events contributed retroactively to converting the strike as of April 12. However, that theory cannot be sustained. As a factfinding it would be plainly erroneous. See note 12 supra. Nor can it be sustained as a legal proposition—that a conversion effectuated by later events should be treated in law as retroactively effective as of the date of the first event. Evidence of later events may be relevant to other issues, but it does not prove conversion at an earlier date. Conversion of a strike is a legal concept focused on the effect on strikers, which in turn leads them to prolong their strike. See. p. 1080, supra. Thus, only when the essential effect has been accomplished does the conversion occur.

[15] Under the previous (1973) contract, between 10/3/73 and 10/1/75 SGG employees received raises at six-month intervals of 20 cents, 10 cents, 10 cents, 10 cents, and 10 cents. At the time of the 1976 negotiations, the minimum SGG journeyman glazier's rates were: $5.40/hour (Portland), $5.20/hour (Lewiston-Waterville), and $5.15/hour (Bangor).

[16] In the interim, on June 8 the union filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging the company's refusal to bargain in good faith, unilateral closing of the Lewiston-Waterville shops, and transfer of unit work to SGR; and on July 6 the union filed a charge regarding the alleged assault by supervisors Churchhill and Tribou. The July 27 charge additionally charged that the company had "unilaterally consolidated" unit glass replacement work and unilaterally placed into effect new [wage?] zones, and that the strike was "caused or prolonged by the above-named unfair labor practices."

tified that in February, 1977 (after 10 months of striking and 4 sets of unfair labor practice charges) he appeared on television news and told the reporter "something to the effect that the men on that job (being picketed) were working for substandard wages and that we were on strike or more money."

Although the union eventually modified and reduced its wage demands, with the exception of its short-lived proposal on May 7 (for a three year contract with annual increments of 26¢ and 26¢, 29¢ and 29¢, and 54¢), the union persisted in demanding a wage increase of the order of magnitude originally demanded and a one-year contract. After reducing its wage demands to 90 cents/one-year June 18 and to 80 cents/one-year on August 27, the union's final proposal, made on October 18, was 80 cents-per-year over a two-year contract. The company consistently insisted on a two-year contract, and increased its 15¢/10¢/15¢/10¢ prestrike offer only once, on May 7, to 20¢/15¢/21¢/15¢.

Thus, it is fair to say that the parties never got close to agreement on the wage issue, and that the two sides' proposals were not even in the same ballpark. The union's final annual raise demand was 2.3 times the company's final annual offer, and that is only when the six month increments are aggregated. There is no indication whatsoever that the union would have settled for anything like the one-shot 25 cent increase granted to the nonstrikers. Nor is there any evidence that but for the April 12 wage increase the union would have lowered its demands or that the strike otherwise would have been settled sooner. Rather, the record taken as a whole supports the conclusion that what caused and prolonged this protracted strike was the company's lawful adherence to a relatively low wage offer and the union's lawful adherence to a relatively high wage demand. As discussed below, § 8(d) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(d), explicitly states that the duty to bargain in good faith "does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession." Adamant insistence on a bargaining position * * * is not in itself a refusal to bargain in good faith." Chevron Oil Co. v. NLRB, supra, 442 F.2d at 1072.

For these reasons we hold that the wage increase did not convert the union's economic strike to an infair labor practice strike on April 12, 1976. Whether subsequent unlawful conduct by the company might have converted the strike at a later date will be considered below.

VI.

Unilateral Action: Reneging, Plant Closings, and Replacement Work Transfer

The ALJ found that the company violated § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by:

> [1] reneging on its agreement with the Union concerning the three wage zone clause, [2] by unilaterally closing its Lewiston-Waterville operations without fully revealing and discussing all the effects of the closure on the employees, and [3] by unilaterally and permanently assigning bargaining unit work to [SGR] without advance notice and bargaining with the Union prior to the time this change was placed in effect.

The ALJ found that each of these actions was "related" and was part of Charles Soule's overall plan to restructure the Soule companies' operations. We consider each of these findings sequentially.

A. "Reneging" on Bargaining Commitments

In appropriate circumstances, a party's "reneging on commitments already made in ongoing negotiations" may be held to violate § 8(a)(5). R. Gorman, supra, at 408. As Professor Gorman explains,

> If, for example, a tentative agreement is reached on a number of bargaining items, a refusal to honor that agreement at a later date without good reason may be > viewed as an indicator of bad faith. Thus, if the employer * * * repudiates understandings already arrived at, abruptly changes its positions without any announced reason, or interposes new demands not raised earlier, this conduct will destory not only amicability at the bargaining table but also the premises on which bargaining had progressed, and will protract the negotiations and delay settlement.

Id. (emphasis added). See, e. g., San Antonio Machine & Supply Corp. v. NLRB, 363 F.2d 633, 641 (5th Cir. 1966) (significant "reversal of position" on seniority clause "indicative of a lack of good faith").

However, "by showing that the earlier negotiations had not clearly resulted in agreement, or that an earler understanding was intended to be conditioned on the resolution of other disputed issues, or that there were other good reasons to modify one's bargaining position" a party may negate a finding of bad faith bargaining. R. Gorman, supra, at 409. See Food Service Co., 202 NLRB 790, 803 (1973). Cf. NLRB v. Randle-Eastern Ambulance Service, Inc., 584 F.2d 720, 726 (5th Cir. 1978) (context of shifting balance of bargaining strength justified company's withdrawal of previously agreed-to proposals; Board's § 8(a)(5) finding reversed); NLRB v. Tomco Communications, Inc., 567 F.2d 871, 883 (9th Cir. 1978) (distinguishing "offers" from concessions; "Absent abuse not present here, it is perfectly legitimate for a party to retract a proposal before the other side has accepted it.").

Both on due process grounds and because it is not supported by substantial evidence, we reverse the ALJ's finding that the company's alleged "reneging" violated § 8(a)(5). First of all, there was no such charge in the amended complaint.[17] The reason for this omission becomes clear upon a careful examination of certain exhibits in the record. In a charge filed on June 8, 1976, the union alleged that the company had engaged in an unlawful "course of conduct, including but not limited to its announcement of a change of position with respect to items previously agreed on." The Regional Director refused to issue a complaint on this charge. By letter of February 23, 1977, in affirming the Regional Director's refusal to issue a complaint on this charge, the Board's General Counsel stated, "absent bad faith, which we do not find here, an Employer, following a strike, may lawfully repudiate previously-made bargaining concessions" (emphasis added). Secondly, there was testimony by negotiators for both the company and the union, not discredited, contradicted, or even mentioned by the ALJ, that the parties were negotiating subject to a mutual initial understanding that all agreements on noneconomic issues were tentative until a final agreement had been reached on all issues. Finally, a withdrawal of a previous agreement is indicative of bad faith bargaining only where such action is arbitrary and not supported by a reasonable justification. Here, the company's change of position with respect to the number of wage zones was based on its plan, also announced at the May 6 negotiating session, to close SGG's Lewiston and Waterville warehouses for economic reasons, leaving only two bases of operations (Portland and Bangor) for SGG. Thus, it cannot be said that the company modified its position "without good reason." [18]

B. Unilateral Action Generally

In general, an employer's "unilateral action" with respect to mandatory subjects of collective bargaining under a collective bargaining agreement is considered an unlawful refusal to bargain. "[A]n employer's unilateral change in conditions of employment under negotiation is * * * a violation of § 8(a)(5), for it is a circumvention of the duty to negotiate which frustrates the objectives of § 8(a)(5) much as does a flat refusal." NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 743, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 1111, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962) (unilateral changes regarding automatic wage increases, sick leave benefits, and merit pay increases during contract negotiations). Perhaps the leading case on unilateral action is Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 85 S.Ct. 398, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964), which held that a company's "contracting out" of all plant maintenance work previously done by bargaining unit employees, without bargaining, violated § 8(a)(5), where unit employees were replaced by those of an independent contractor doing the same work. The Court reasoned that since the Company's decision "did not alter [its] basic operation, * * * to require the employer to bargain about the matter would not significantly abridge his freedom to manage the business," 379 U.S. at 213, 85 S.Ct. at 404; and that national labor policy required "that the union be afforded an opportunity to meet management's legitimate complaints that its maintenance was unduly costly." Id. at 214, 85 S.Ct. at 405.

[17] The only potentially relevant allegation in the complaint, paragraph 19(a), involves "unilaterally combining certain work zones." However, this cannot fairly be read to give notice of a charge of reneging on an agreement concerning the number of wage zones.

[18] Nor do we find that attorney Levenson's distribution at the August 6 meeting of an "agenda" of topices for discussion, which were either new or proposed modifications on subjects of previous tentative agreement, of itself violated § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Although the ALJ made no explicit finding on this subject, he implies that this action also was somehow indicative of bad faith. For the above reasons, and in recognition of the significant changes in circumstances occurring over four months of a strike, we cannot sustain this finding.

In NLRB v. W.R. Grace & Co., 571 F.2d 279, 282 (5th Cir. 1978), the court stated:

> It is well-settled that an employer violates its duty to bargain collectively when it institutes changes in employment conditions without first consulting the union * * *. [However,] [t]he employer's power to alter working conditions in his plant is not contingent upon union agreement with his proposed change. The company has only to notify the union before effecting the change so as to give the union a meaningful chance to offer counter-proposals and counter-agruments.

(emphasis added; citations omitted) In Grace, which involved the company's decision to discontinue a product for economic reasons, with layoffs and elimination of a shift, the court held: "The failure to notify or refusal to bargain with the union over the effects of management decisions to limit production or otherwise alter operations violates Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act." Id. at 283.

Good faith bargaining requires timely notice and a meaningful opportunity to bargain regarding the employer's proposed changes in working conditions, since " '[n]o genuine bargaining * * * can be conducted where [the] decision has already been made and implemented.' " International Ladies Garment Workers Union v. NLRB, 463 F.2d 907, 919 (D.C.Cir.1972). Thus, "[n]otice of a fait accompli," regarding a matter as to which the employer is obligated to bargain to impasse, violates § 8(a)(5). Id.; see Metromedia, Inc., KMBC-TV v. NLRB, 586 F.2d 1182, 1189 (8th Cir. 1978).

As is clear from the above discussion, in some contexts an employer's "unilateral" action ordinarily will not violate § 8(a)(5). These situations include unilateral actions where: (1) they relate to matters outside the manadatory bargaining subjects, such as the wages of non-unit, non-union employees, Allied Chemical Workers v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 171–78, 92 S.Ct. 383, 393–397, 30 L.Ed.2d 341 (1971) (collective baragaining obligation under § 8(d) extends only to "terms and conditions of employment" of employees in appropriate bargaining unit); (2) the employer has bargained in good faith to impasse on the issue, e. g., NLRB v. U.S. Sonics Corp., 312 F.2d 610, 615 (1st Cir. 1963); (3) the changes merely preserve the "dynamic status quo," consistently with past policies and practices, see R. Gorman, supra, at 450–54; (4) the union has made a "clear and unmistakable waiver" of its right to bargain on the issue, e. g., Metromedia, supra, 586 F.2d at 1189; R. Gorman, supra, at 466–69; and (5) the actions concern certain major business decisions involving fundamental changes in the scope, nature, or mode of operation of the business, or the commitment of investment capital, see Machinists and Aerospace Workers v. Northeast Airline, Inc., 473 F.2d 549, 557 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 845, 93 S.Ct. 48, 34 L.Ed2d 85 (1972) (no duty to bargain regarding merger); Textile Workers Union v. Darlington Mfg. Co., 380 U.S. 263, 268–69, 85 S.Ct. 994, 998–999, 13 L.Ed2d 827 (1965) (closing entire business not unfair labor practice; "some employer decisions are so peculiarly matters of management prerogative that they would never constitute violations of § 8(a)(1)"). See generally R. Gorman, supra, at 443–45. The applicability of these exceptions is discussed below.

C. The Warehouse Closing

As quoted above, the ALJ found that the company violated § 8(a)(5) and (1) "by unilaterally closing its Lewiston-Waterville operations without fully revealing and discussing all the effects of this closure on the employees." The ALJ found, in support of this conclusion, that by the May 6, 1976 bargaining session, "[t]he Respondent had already decided to close its Lewiston-Waterville facility and work the crews from their homes," and that at the May 6 session the company "presented the Union with a fait accompli, Lewiston-Waterville was closing, and the crews were going to work out of their homes." With regard to bargaining on the subject, the ALJ found that > [a]though it then "discussed" with the Union some of the effects of the closing * * * on the employees, there was no meaningful bargaining since Respondent had unilaterally decided upon the effects as well. Furthermore, Respondent did not discuss all of those effects, which included its planned (SGR) operations. Thus, the Respondent unilaterally changed important working conditions of its bargaining unit employees at Lewiston-Waterville without advance notice and bargaining about all of the important effects of this decision on its employees.

A subcategory of the law of "unilateral actions" involves the special problem of plant closings. As summarized by Professor Gorman.

> [R]egardless of whether the employer is obligated to bargain about such major decisions as going out of business, closing down one of several plants, or subcontracting work currently done by its employees, it must bargain about the effects or impact of those decisions, such as severance pay or transfer to other company jobs or locations.

R. Gorman, supra, at 499 (emphasis added). Thus, there is an important distinction between the duty to bargain about a particular business decision affecting unit employees and the duty to bargain about the decision's effects on the unit employees; a distinction which at times is difficult to draw. In the case, however, it is only bargaining with respect to the decision's effects, not the underlying decision,[19] that is at issue.

In a number of cases involving business changes such as the termination of a particular product line or the closing of one of several plants, courts have held that the employer is required to give the union notice and the opportunity to bargain with respect to the effects of the decision on unit employees before implementing the change. E. g., NLRB v. W.R Grace & Co., supra, 571 F.2d 279 (product discontinuation with layoffs and shift changes); International Union, UAW v. NLRB, 470 F.2d 422 (D.C.Cir.1972) (sale of factory-owned truck dealership with terminations of all employees; no violation where company official discussed and attempted to mitigate effects with union on and after date of transfer); Ladies Garment Workers v. NLRB, supra, 463 F.2d 907 (plant relocation; under circumstances notice and bargaining regarding both decision and effects required); NLRB v. Acme Industrial Products, Inc., 439 F.2d 40 (6th Cir. 1971) (relocation of part of manufacturing operations from old to new plant for economic reasons; no violations where "employer stands ready to negotiate with the Union in respect to any and all (effects) of its move"); Weltronic Co. v. NLRB, 419 F.2d 1120 (6th Cir. 1969) (transfer of electronic assembly work from union to nonunion plant, with no layoffs), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 938, 90 S.Ct 1841, 26 L.Ed.2d 270 (1970). Nevertheless, as this court observed in Northeast Airlines, supra "[t]o allow the Union to force a company to bargain about the effects of its management decisions to the extent of forcing it to forego the proposed change in operations would be in effect to take away from it the freedom to make the decision in the first place." 473 F2d at 558.

A threshold issue is whether petitioners had sufficient notice that the plant closing was in issue, and whether this issue was "fully litigated" so as to comport with due process. As noted above, there is no mention of the Lewiston-Waterville plant closing as an § 8(a)(5) violation in the amended complaint.[20] However, in this instance we hold that the plant closing issue was fully and fairly litigated. Several witnesses were questioned by both counsel as to the reasons for, and timing, announcement implementation, permanency, and bargaining table discussion of the Lewiston-Waterville closing. There is no merit to the company's argument that due process was not afforded with respect to this issue.

The above-quoted passages from the ALJ's opinion, p. 1085 supra, make clear that the § 8(a)(5) violation found was a matter of degree rather than a per se refusal to bargain. There is no finding that the company completely failed or refused to discuss the effects of the closing decision upon the affected employees. Indeed there appears to be no dispute that the subject of the treatment of the employees was discussed by both sides of some length at the May 6 and 7 sessions (including discussions of combining seniority lists, superseniority, and travel pay), and that no agreement was ever reached on the subject.[21] What the ALJ found was [19] The Board did not hold that the company violated the Act by failing to bargain with respect to its decision to close the SGG Lewiston and Waterville warehouses. It is undisputed that this business decision was based on economic considerations of unprofitability and the need to reduce overhead, and that unit jobs were not to eliminated. There is nothing in the record to suggest antiunion motivation. Apparently the unlawful fait accompli found by the Board was therefore not the announcement of the final decision to close Lewiston-Waterville (which we may assume, without deciding, that the company had the right to do), but rather the fact that before the announcement the company "had unilaterally decided upon the effects as well," precluding any meaningful bargaining as to the treatment of the affected unit employees.

[20] The only potentially relevant allegations are:

"unilaterally combining certain work zones," ¶ 19(a), and unilaterally reassigning bargaining unit work to nonunit employees, ¶ 19(d). Although arguably related, these allegations cannot fairly be said to give notice of a refusal-to-bargain issue regarding a plant closing.

[21] Of particular note is the credited testimony of union negotiator Walter Dolbow concerning the May 6 meeting of the parties:

that the company announced the closing "without fully revealing and discussing all the effects of this closure on the employees," and that although the company " 'discussed' with the Union some of the effects" after the announcement, "there was no meaningful bargaining" since the company had already "unilaterally decided upon the effects as well" (emphasis added). Among the "effects" omitted from discussion by the company was "its planned [SGR] operations."[22]

Thus, the sense of the Board's finding seems to be that the company merely went through the motions of bargaining regarding the effects of the Lewiston-Waterville closing while in fact having made up its corporate mind what it would do with the affected employees—in essence a finding of "surface bargaining." It is not the company's refusal to bargain regarding effects, but rather its state of mind while ostensibly doing so—subjective bad faith—that apparently was found to be an unfair labor practice.

Our careful examination of the record discloses no support for the ALJ's inference of bad faith bargaining with respect to the Lewiston-Waterville plant closings. The company manifestly offered to discuss the effects of this operational chance on unit employees, offered three proposals on the subject, and bargaining in fact did occur. The fact that no agreement was ever reached is indicative, in this context, not of the company's refusal to bargain in good faith on the issue, but of bona fide bargaining to impasse. The union was given "a meaningful change to offer counter-proposals and counter-arguments" to the company's "effects" proposals. NLRB v. W. R. Grace & Co., supra, supra, 571 F.2d at 282. That is all the Act requires. We find no evidence that the company merely "engag[ed] the union in sham discussion," Ladies Garment Workers, supra, 463 F.2d at 917.

An argument of somewhat more substance is that the company implemented the plant closing decision before it had bargained to impasse with the union on the effects issue—that when announced the closing decision, its implementation, and its effects on employees were already accomplished. The testimony of the various company witnesses establishes that the closing decision was made and became final in early May, prior to May 6; was announced to Kenwood Kimball, the SGG Lewiston branch manager, during the first week in May by SGG president Edward Churchill; and that the actual closing took place between May 12 and May 15. In the interim the lengthy May 6 and May 7 bargaining sessions were held, with no agreement as to the treatment of the Lewiston and Waterville crews. Thereafter, the union adhered to the position that the company could not close the warehouses, and at the next session on May 25 took the position that everything was settled except wages. Although the ALJ discredited testimony that union negotiator Holcroft stated at the close of negotiations on May 7 that the parties were at an impasse, one could reasonably conclude that an impasse had been reached at least as to the closing/effects issue.

In any event, irrespective of the precise dates of impasse and implementation of the closings, it is clear that the company could not have implemented its proposed effects of the closings—i. e., having the men report to jobs directly from their homes—until June 1976 or later, because at the time of all these events SGG had no active employees. All were on strike, and no replacements were hired for the Lewiston-Waterville operation until late

> DOLBOW: The company announced that they had closed the plants in Lewiston and Waterville and that they now wanted to go to two (wage) zones and they informed us that then we would have to negotiate what to do with the employees.

[22] The ALJ elaborated on the relationship he saw between the plant closing and the advent of SGR thus: "Respondent had already decided [as of May 6] to close the Lewiston-Waterville facility and work the screws from their homes, in order to set the stage for the day when [SGR] would become fully operational and would be in a position to take over SGG's replacement work.

> ATTY. LEVENSON: Was there any discussion about any of the employees right then and there?
> DOLBOW: Right then and there, yes, sir, there was.

(Emphasis added.) Attorney Levenson later testified to the same effect:

> At the May 6th meeting, I indicated that the Company wanted to close the Lewiston and the Waterville warehouses. And then I wanted to discuss, and asked to discuss the effects of that closing. I had these three proposals * * *

(Emphasis added.)

We cannot sustain the ALJ's conclusory assertion of the relationship between the plant closing and the creation of SGR. The two have no necessary logical or functional relationship, and each was justified by the company, in undisputed testimony, as serving distinct business purposes. Since we find no substantial evidence in the record of any such relationship (except perhaps a rough temporal coincidence and an allegation by the union that SGR commenced operations at SGG's former Lewiston location), we conclude that SGR was not an undisclosed effect of the Lewiston-Waterville closing. Whether nondisclosure and failure to bargain regarding SGR was in independent violation we consider infra.

May.[23] Hence, it is somewhat illusory to talk of the effects of the plant closing upon members of the bargaining unit, who while on strike were not concretely affected at all. Under these circumstances, where the company did offer to bargain in good faith about the effects of the operational change upon bargaining unit employees before any changes were actually implemented, we hold that no violation of § 8(a)(5) or (1) occurred.

D. Diversion of Bargaining Unit Work

The ALJ found that the company also violated § 8(a)(5) and (1) "by unilaterally and permanently assigning bargaining unit [glass] replacement work to [SGR] * * *." In support of this conclusion the ALJ found that > the corporate reorganization and its effect on the bargaining unit remained concealed until completed and sprung upon the Union's negotiators also as a fait accompli at the August 6 bargaining session. It was then the Union learned for the first time * * * that these changes were in force and that all of SGG's bargaining unit replacement work had been permanently lost to the nonunion [SGR].

It is clear that "[t]he preservation or diversion of unit work" constitutes a "term [or] condition of employment" subject to mandatory bargaining under § 8(d) of the Act. NLRB v. Rockwell-Standard Corp., 410 F.2d 953, 957 (6th Cir. 1969). The employer must bargain with respect to the decision to remove work from bargaining unit employees, not merely its effects on the employees. The leading case is Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 209, 85 S.Ct. 398, 402, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964), which held that the employer is required to bargain about "contracting out" work previously performed by members of the bargaining unit. As discussed above, the Fibreboard Court reasoned that where the operational change would merely reassign work done by existing employees to others (an independent contractor) who would "do the same work under similar conditions of employment," it would not unduly impair management prerogative to require bargaining, and that national labor relations policy required that the union be given an opportunity to negotiate a mutually acceptable alternative. Id. at 213–14, 85 S.Ct. at 404–405. In American Cyanamid Co. v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 356 (7th Cir. 1979), the court applied Fibreboard to hold that the employer's decision, during a strike, permanently to contract out maintenance and service work, terminating half of the bargaining unit employees, violated § 8(a) (5) and (1) and converted the strike. The court distinguished permanent contracting out, where bargaining is required, from temporary contracting out "to enable the employer to continue operating in an emergency situation thrust upon it by a strike," where it has been held that bargaining was not required. Id. at 360. See Puerto Rico Telephone Co. v. NLRB, 359 F.2d 983, 987 (1st Cir. 1966) (need not bargain about subcontracting "to meet some temporary or transient need, * * * unless the subcontracting adversely affects the unit's present employees").

The record makes clear that some significant portion (but not all) of the "outside" glass replacement work formerly done exclusively by SGG employees was assigned to the newly-created, nonunion SGR "replacement centers" at some point during the strike, as part of Charles Soule's corporate reorganization plan, and that at some point this transfer became "permanent." Charles Soule testified that he began to set up "replacement centers" consolidating the former King & Dexter and SOAGCO divisions of SGI in late April, 1976; that "technically * * * from an accounting standpoint" SGR did not begin to exist "until June of '76"; and that SGR signs first appeared in July or August. Walter Dolbow testified that he first became aware of SGR in mid-May, 1976 when "the signs first started being noticed by the strikers."[24] Kenwood Kimball, SGG's Lewiston manager, testified that in mid-May the SGG supervisors stopped doing emergency replacement work, which was taken over by SGR, that SGG started doing exclusively contract work at this time, and that the reason for the transfer was that due to the strike SGG had no men to do the replacement work. Several witnesses testified that once permanent replacements were hired, SGG resumed doing some outside replacement work, but less than before the strike. Charles Soule testified, somewhat equivocally, that the decision to transfer SGG glass replacement work to SGR is and was a permanent decision, and was made in June or July of 1976. The existence of SGR and the company's intention to transfer permanently to SGR SGG's replacement work was first disclosed to the union at the August 6 bargaining session, when attorney Levenson presented an "agenda" including these and other "proposals." The union reacted with what the ALJ characterized as a "stunned" silence.

[23] The first Lewiston replacement, Daniel Moreau, began work on May 24, 1976. The other three Lewiston replacements started in mid-June or later.

[24] We note that in its first set of unfair labor practices charged, filed on June 8, 1976, the union charged, inter alia, that "the company continues to do business at its Lewiston location under the changed name of Soule Glass Replacement"; and that the union's June 27 charge included the allegation that the company had "unilaterally consolidated glass replacement work formerly performed by bargaining unit employees."

The issue is whether the company had made a permanent transfer of some portion of SGG's outside glass replacement work to SGR before August, 6, with the result that Levenson's purported " proposals" were really the announcement of a fait accompli. The company argues, inter alia, that the change was not made permanent until some unspecified later date, and that until that time the changes were a temporary response to the exigencies of the strike. The ALJ found otherwise. On this issue the ALJ is on much firmer ground. Substantial evidence supports his inference that the company had already made and implemented its decision by August 6.

One indication that the shift of replacement work effectively became permanent prior to August 6 is that only a portion of the replacement work was shifted back to SGG when the hiring of striker replacements during June and July eased SGG's strike-caused labor shortage. Also, apart from the metaphysical question of when a change becomes "permanent," there is no evidence that Charles Soule ever intended that his reorganization plan and concomitant new division of labor be instituted on a trial basis, or merely as a temporary response to the strike. Neither the fact that SGG (striker replacement) employees resumed or continued doing some replacement work nor the fact that there was no ultimate decline in the SGG workforce vitiates the conclusion that substantial work was diverted from the bargaining unit.

The ALJ's findings, amply supported by the record, thus compel the conclusion that the company failed to give the union notice of its intended action with respect to SGR "sufficiently in advance of actual implementation * * * to allow reasonable scope for bargaining," Ladies Garment Workers v. NLRB, supra, 463 F.2d at 919. Such unilateral action, without prior bargaining to impasse, violates § 8(a)(5). The company's argument that the union waived bargaining on this issue, either by its silence on August 6 or by virtue of the contractual management rights clause, is without merit. We therefore affirm the ALJ's finding that the diversion of bargaining unit work to SGR, without prior disclosure or bargaining, violated § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

In light of the ALJ's finding that the strike was "prolonged by the [company's] unfair labor practices both at and away from the bargaining table" subsequent to April 12, it becomes necessary to consider whether the record supports the inference that the company's failure to bargain regarding the transfer of replacement work to SGR converted the strike. We find no evidence that the company's actions with respect to SGR aggravated, changed the focus of, or in any way prolonged the strike. To the extent that the ALJ found to the contrary, such a finding was necessarily based on impermissible speculation and surmise. The only pertinent testimony as to the union's reaction is Walter Dolbow's exaggerated statement that, based on the SGR "proposal" in the August 6 agenda, "they've taken about 90 percent of the work that we did and gave it away. And if we had bought this proposal, we would have been out of work." By contrast, SGG officers Edward Churchill and Andrew Soule testified that before the strike replacement work constituted only ten percent of SGG's workload, and Andrew Soule estimated that it would be about four percent in 1977, a decline attributable in part to the strike, corporate priorities, and a declining overall trend in glazing sales. All that the record shows is that the SGR "proposal" was unacceptable to the union, that the union made little or no immediate response to Levenson's August 6 presentation, and that in the union's eyes wages continued to be the critical issue at subsequent negotiations. Evidence of prolongation and causation is wholly lacking. Thus, we hold that the record does not support the inference that the company's SGR unfair labor practice converted the strike.

VII.

Supervisor Strike Misconduct

The Board found that the actions of SGG president Edward Churchill and SGG Hampden branch manager Edward Tribou on June 25, 1976 violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act. The ALJ found that the supervisors' unlawful conduct included Tribou's throwing picket signs into the street at SGG's Bangor and Hampden facilities, Tribou's and Churchill's solicitation of strikers Carleton French and Harold Douglas, to return to work with promises of increased wages, Churchill's assault on striker Nick Botzko at the Hampden site, and Tribou's threats and attempts to incite a fight at both locations. The ALJ noted that prior to these incidents Churchill and Tribou had "had drinks and lunch at a nearby restaurant." He also found that Nadeau responded to Tribou's threats and taunts that the strikers "were getting to them and that the company officials had been working 7 days a week, 12 to 14 hours a day." In so finding, the ALJ credited the testimony of pickets French, Douglas, and Nadeau, and discredited the accounts of the incidents of Churchill and Tribou, except to the extent that the latter corroborated the strikers' testimony. The ALJ further found that French, Douglas, and Nadeau "reported the respective incidents which they observed in detail to the assembled union membership at the monthly membership meeting a day or two later."

It is clear that a supervisor's physical violence or threats of assault against employees engaged in protected conduct, attributable to the supervisor's employer under agency principles, violates § 8(a)(1). NLRB v. Fry Foods, Inc., 241 NLRB No. 42 (1979), enf'd, 609 F.2d 267 (6th Cir. 1979) (per curiam) (threats of violence to union supporters, assault by automobile); NLRB v. Gibbs Corp., 297 F.2d 649 (5th Cir. 1962) (beating of union organizers); NLRB v. H. R. McBride, 274 F.2d 124 (10th Cir. 1960) (nonunion company president's violence against union pickets held to coerce nonunion employees); Heights Thrift-Way, Inc., 155 NLRB 52 (1965) (nonunion company president's threats and violence against peaceful union pickets); R. Gorman, supra, at 326. Similarly, soliciting striking employees individually and offering financial inducements to return to work has been held to violate § 8(a)(1). E.g., NLRB v. Easton Packing Co., 416 F.2d 256, 258 (3d Cir. 1969); NLRB v. Neiderman, 334 F.2d 601, 603 (2d Cir. 1964). Such overtly antiunion conduct, likely to intimidate or under mine employees' free exercise of their § 7 rights, is typically held to be a per se violation of § 8(a)(1). Under the objective test, the "ineffectiveness of the supervisors' activities * * * will not vitiate a Section 8(a)(1) finding if the conduct itself, viewed in context, may reasonably induce fear of reprisal or anticipation of reward." Peerless of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 484 F.2d 1108, 1115 (7th Cir. 1973).

Under basic § 8(a)(1) objective test principles, however, it is possible that under limited circumstances such objectionable employer conduct might be found to be de minimis. As discussed supra, the appropriate inquiry is whether, under the circumstances, reasonable union pickets would feel "interfere[d] with, restrain[ed] or coerce[d]" in the exercise of their statutorily protected rights by the incident in question. Cf. Associated Grocers of New England Inc. v. NLRB, 562 F.2d 1333, 1335–36 (1st Cir. 1977) (dismissing certain striker picket line misconduct as "slight," within allowable "leeway for impulsive behavior," noting objective test is "whether the misconduct is such that, under the circumstances existing, it may reasonably tend to coerce or intimidate employees in the exercise of rights protected under the Act"); Peerless, supra, 484 F.2d at 1115, 1120 (record shows employees "resolute and unintimidated," supervisor threats and solicitations ineffective, "marginal indiscretions," but § 8(a)(1) finding affirmed as having "reasonale basis in law")

Although the objective impact of Churchill's and Tribou's misconduct is questionable, we affirm the Board's finding of § 8(a)(1) violations as "having a reasonable basis in law." Peerless, supra. We find no basis for disturbing the ALJ's reasoned credibility determinations, and the record supports his findings as to the factual details of the two incidents. Strike violence and attempts to subvert or circumvent the bargaining process cannot be condoned. We conclude, however, that viewed in context these were clearly isolated violations of the Act and must be treated as such for remedial purposes. The supervisors' misconduct consisted of two incidents occurring on one Friday afternoon of a long strike. There is no evidence whatsoever that the supervisors' actions were part of any larger scheme by the company to intimidate the strikers or had any relationship to the company's conduct at the bargaining table.[25] More likely, the supervisors' irrational (and inexcusable) behavior resulted from a combination of too much drink,[26] overwork, and frustration caused by the protracted strike and its effect on the business. Not only were the assault and solicitation predictably ineffective in intimidating or enticing the strikers, but they were apparently counterproductive, strengthening the strikers' resolve by showing they were finally "getting to" the company. Cf. Peerless, supra, 484 F.2d at 1120. Walter Dolbow testified that the report of the incidents at the union meeting "sort of pulled everybody together at that time. We had almost started to fall apart at that time and the actions of the company did more to unite us than I could have ever done with a big speech." Dolbow said the members "were pretty angry" and reaffirmed that "we would continue to strike to the end."

Since the ALJ found that the strike was converted to an unfair lablr practice strike on April 12, he made no explicit finding as to whether the supervisor misconduct itself would have converted the strike.[27] We hold that the record would not support such a finding. The only relevant testimony is that the Dolbow, just quoted. Apart from our doubts whether Dolbow's conclusory characterizations of the union's collective reaction would if taken at face value support the inference that these incidents prolonged the strike, we agree with petitioners that the incidents' effect on the union was "the exact opposite of what the conversion theory is supposed to prove." As discussed above, pp. 1079-1080 supra, the rationale of conversion doctrine is that the strike is "expanded to include a protest over [the] unfair labor practice," NLRB v. Top Manufacturing Co., supra, 594 F.2d at 225, and that the strikers remain on strike longer than they otherwise would have "in protest against employer conduct which is found * * * to be in violation of the Labor Act." R. Gorman, supra, at 339 (emphasis added). Here, by contrast, marginal violation of the Act encouraged the strikers to maintain the strike (although there is no basis for concluding that they otherwise would not have) because the supervisors' irrational behavior convinced them that, in Dolbow's words, "we're getting to them when they have to resort to this stuff with our pickets." In other words, the supervisors' impotent acts of frustration gave the strikers new hope that their strike was succeeding. Section 8(a)(1) declares to be an unfair labor practice employer conduct which "interfere[s] with, restrain[s], or coerce[s] employees" in the exercise of their § 7 rights, not conduct which encourages, strengthens, or aids protected conduct. Therefore, the supervisor strike misconduct violations at most support the issuance of a cease-and-desist order.

Refusal to provide Requested Information

The ALJ held that petitioners violated § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act "by failing and refusing to promptly furnish the Union with adequate relevant information concerning wages necessary to the performance of the Union's functions as collective-bargaining agent during negotiations." The ALJ found that the information requested by the union at the November 22, 1976 bargaining session was requested "in order to justify the Company's wage position," was relevant to the negotiations on "the crucial unresolved issue * * * [of] wages," that the relevance of the requested data was increased by reports that nonstriking employees and replacements had received raises, and that in this context the company's reason for declining to furnish more detailed information—fears for the safety of the replacements in light of alleged union strike misconduct—was inadequate. Finally, the ALJ found that the company's furnishing of additional information, pursuant to settlement agreement, on March 18, 1977, as "too late to be meaningful or legally significant." The ALJ did not distinguish in his findings between the information requested regarding bargaining unit (SGG) employees and non-unit (SGI and SGR) employees.

[26] There is substantial evidence to support the conclusion that Churchill and Tribou were under the influence of alcohol, if not fully intoxicated, at the time of the incidents. both testified that they had been several drinks with lunch at the Pilot's Grill, Bangor. Nadeau and Douglas testified that the supervisors had apparently been drinking, and that one or both had "swizzle sticks" in their pockets, but that Churchill and Tribou were not "drunk.

[27] The ALJ did find that the strike "was thereafter prolonged by the Respondent's unfair labor practices both at and away from the bargining table (emphasis added). Since the supervisor misconduct was the only subsequent unfair labor practice, besides the diversion of work to SGR, supra, occurring away from the bargaining table, it could be reasonably inferred that the ALJ found that the supervisor misconduct prolonged (and thereby would independently have converted) the strike.

A. The Legal Standards

The general rule is that an employer must supply, on request, "relevant information" "in the employer's possession" "needed by a labor union for the proper performance of its duties as the employees' bargaining representative," Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301, 303, 99 S.Ct. 1123, 1125, 59 L.Ed.2d 333 (1979); i.e., "to enable the [union] to understand and intelligently discuss the issues raised in bargaining * * *." San Diego Newspaper Guild v. NLRB, 548 F.2d 863, 866 (9th Cir. 1977). See R. Gorman, supra, at 409. Absent special circumstances, see Western Massachusetts Electric Co. v. NLRB, 589 F.2d 42, 47 (1st Cir. 1978), "relevance" is determinative of the duty to disclose.[28] Relevance is to be determined by a liberal "discovery-type standard." NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 437, 87 S.Ct. 565, 568, 17 L.Ed.2d 495 (1967). As the Supreme Court noted in the leading case of NLRB v. Truitt Manufacturing Co., 351 U.S. 149, 153–54, 76 S.Ct. 753, 756–757, 100 L.Ed. 1027 (1956), "[e]ach case must turn on its particular facts. The inquiry must always be whether or not under the circumstances of the particular case the statutory obligation to bargain in good faith has been met."

Where the requested information concerns wages and related information for employees in the bargaining unit, the information is presumptively relevant to bargainable issues." NLRB v. Rockwell Standard Corp., 410 F.2d 953, 957 (6th Cir. 1969). Unless the employer comes forward with an effective rebuttal as to lack of relevance or "provide[s] adequate reasons why he cannot, in good faith, supply the information," NLRB v. Borden, Inc., 600 F.2d 313, 317 (1st Cir. 1979), the union need make no showing of relevance. Curtiss Wright Corp. v. NLRB, 347 F.2d 61, 69 (3d Cir. 1965). See Boston Herald-Traveler Corp. v. NLRB, 223 F.2d 38, 63 (1st Cir. 1955) (disclosure required "without regard to its immediate relationship to the negotiation or administration of the collective bargaining agreement"). Futhermore, the company is obligated to make a "reasonably diligent effort" to obtain such relevant information, and absent some valid justification must provide all of the relevant data requested. Borden, supra, at 318.

"[W]here the request is for information concerning employees outside the bargaining unit, the Union must show that the requested information is relevant to bargainable issues." Rockwell-Standard, supra, 410 F.2d at 957 (emphasis added). Information in the latter category also includes profits, production figures, wage surveys of competitors and other information that "is not ordinarily pertinent to [the Union's] performance as a bargaining representative, but is a alleged to have become so because of peculiar circumstances." San Diego Newspaper Guild, 548 F.2d at 867.[29] To meet its burden regarding such information, the Union must show more than "an abstract, potential relevance" or "mere suspicion or surmise." Id. at 868. It must show, "by reference to the circumstances of the case * * * more precisely the relevance of the data it desires." Curtiss-Wright, supra, 347 F.2d at 69.[30]

[28] In Puerto Rico Telephone Co. v. NLRB. 359 F.2d 983, 986 (1st Cir 1966), we held that "an employer violates Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing during the term of a collective bargaining agreement, to furnish information requested by the union if such information is relevant to a grievance, or to the administration or policing of the agreement." (emphasis in original), and, quoting Curtiss Wright Corp. v. NLRB, 347 F.2d 61, 69 (3rd Cir. 1965), we declared that an employer's refusal to honor such a request is a "per se violation of the Act." In Puerto Rico Telephone, however, we did not focus on any claim or privilege. We do not consider that decision inconsistent with the position we take here, that under certain circumstances the duty to disclose relevant information may be qualified. Cf. Emeryville Research Center v. NLRB, 441 F.2d 880, 886–87 (9th Cir 1971)—(per se language in Puerto Rico Telephone and other cases "gratuitous" dicts; holdings "considerably narrower").

[29] Cases requiring disclosure of nonunit employee data include NLRB v. Brazos Electric Power Coop., 615 F.2d 1100, 1101 (5th Cir. 1980) (non-unit employee wage data, where company had maintained "a degree of wage parity between non-unit and unit employees of similar working skills," to prepare for upcoming negotiations); Western Mass. Electric Co. v. NLRB, 573 F.2d 101, 107–08 (1st Cir. 1978) (first case) (costs of subcontracting work capable of being done by unit members, where employer claimed use of union employees uneconomical); NLRB v. Rockwell-Standard Corp., 410 F.2d 953, 957 (6th Cir. 1969) (names, job classifications and descriptions for nonunit employees assigned to new facility, where erosion of bargaining unit through work transfer was at issue); NLRB v. Goodyear Aerospace Corp., 388 F.2d 673, 674 (6th Cir. 1968) (per curiam) (job titles, descriptions, wages, benefits, etc. for nonunit R & D employees, where company assignment of employees in dispute; Board summarily affirmed); Curtiss-Wright Corp. v. NLRB, 347 F.2d 61, 69 (3d Cir. 1965) (job titles, classifications, descriptions, duties, and pay scales for nonunit "confidential and administrative" employees where shrinkage of unit and misclassification of employees were at issue).

However, where the employer, during bargaining, puts in issue information not presumptively relevant, the employer must produce data to substantiate its claims. As the Court stated in Truitt Manufacturing, supra, "[g]ood-faith bargaining necessarily requires that claims made by either bargainer should be honest claims * * * If such an argument [inability to afford wage increases] is important enough to present, in the give and take of bargaining, it is important enough to require some sort of proof of its accuracy." 351 U.S. at 152–53, 76 S.Ct. at 755–756. In Teleprompter Corp. v. NLRB, 570 F.2d 4, 9 (1st Cir. 1977), this court held, "[w]hen the employer itself puts profitability in contention—as by asserting an inability to pay an increase in wages—information to substantiate the employer's position has to be disclosed." We further stated that "[t]he employer may not limit the relevant information disclosed to just those fragments which satisfy its own view of the issue," and rejected a mootness argument against enforcement of the Board's order. Id. at 11. See Western Massachusetts Electric Co. v. NLRB, 573 F.2d 101, 106–07 (1st Cir. 1978) (where company cited economics as reason for using subcontractor rather than unit employees, company put subcontractor costs in contention and must substantiate its cost assertions).

Under certain narrow circumstances, an employer may be excused from providing requested information presumed or shown to be relevant. When the employer has a good faith claim of undue burden, legitimate business need for confidentiality or justifiable fear of violence or harassment of employees, disclosure generally will not be required. Western Massachusetts Electric Co., 589 F.2d at 47. R. Gorman, supra, at 415–18. In such cases, the court will weigh the competing interests of the employer and the union in the requested information, and the type and extent of disclosure required will depend on "the circumstances of the particular case." Detroit Edison, supra, 440 U.S. at 314–15, 99 S.Ct. at 1130–1131 (refusing to require unconditional disclosure to union of employee psychological aptitude test where employer had reasonable confidentiality concern). For example, a union is not entitled to even clearly relevent information "in the precise form demanded," where this would entail undue burden. Emeryville Research Center v. NLRB, 441 F.2d 880, 887 (9th Cir. 1971).

In Emeryville, the union requested salary grade curves, individual salaries, and merit ratings for 430 unit professional employees to enable the union "to bargain intelligently." The court held that > [W]here, as here, the Company raises bona fide objections [i.e., burdensomeness and confidentiality of competitors' salary data] to the form in which information is requested and offers to provide information sufficient to meet the Union's needs in a mutually satisfactory form, the Union must do more than rely on general avowals of relevance in order to establish its right to the information. It must state the uses to which the information is to be put so that the company is afforded an opportunity to provide it on mutually satisfactory terms * * *. Once the Union has done so, a Company refusal to provide information adequate to meet the Union's needs within a reasonable time would support an unfair labor practice charge * * *.

441 F.2d at 885. The court held that "resort to the Board is premature" where the company has offered to accommodate the union's needs and the union refused to cooperate in the above manner. Id. at 886; see Shell Oil Co. v. NLRB, 457 F.2d 615, 619–20 (9th Cir. 1972) (citing Emeryville, supra). In addition, "[t]he employer may also defend against disclosure by demonstrating that there is a clear and present danger that the union will use the information to incite violence or harassment of employees." R. Gorman, supra, at 416. The leading case regarding this defense is Shell Oil Co. v.

[30] Cases upholding the employer's refusal to disclose nonunit information include NLRB v. Temple-Eastex, Incl, 579 F.2d. 932, 936–37 (5th Cir. 1978) (nonunit employee identity, job classification, wage, and benefit data; now showing of relevance to union grievance or otherwise, plus lack of timely notice of theory of relevance); Western Mass. Electric, supra, 573 F.2d at 108–10 (second case) (costs of subcontracting work not of concern to the union, where Western Electric, Inc., 559 F.2d 1131, 1134 (8th Cir. 1977) (names, grades, wages, ratings, seniority status of nonunit employees who might be transferred to unit; no showing of need or relevance to bargainable issues); San Diego Newspaper Guild v. NLRB, 548 F.2d 863, 868 (9th Cir. 1977) (identity and compensation of contractor's employees being trained as contigency striker replacements, where union failed to show probable contract violations or other relevance).

NLRB, supra, in which following a violence-marred strike the union requested the names and addresses of all unit employees (40% of whom were not union members). The company expressed fears of misuse of the list for harassment of employees, proposed alternatives to the requested mode of disclosure, and offered to work toward a "mutually agreeable" compromise, while the union could give no assurance that the list would be kept confidential. The Shell court, finding a "likelihood of a clear and present danger" to the employees involved, sustained the company's refusal to disclose under the circumstances: "Presentation of bona fide concerns by the Company, coupled with reasonable proposals designed to satisfy the needs of the Union and to achieve a mutually satisfactory resolution of the Union request, is simply not a refusal to bargain." 457 F.2d at 620.[31] Another leading case is Sign & Pictorial Union v. NLRB, 419 F.2d 726 (D.C.Cir.1969), where during a strike the union requested payroll records to verify allegations that strikebreakers were getting higher wages and bonuses than had union members. The company declined to turn over the records, in the context of harassment, threats and assaults to strikebreakers, "without some assurance that the information was necessary and * * * would not be used " 'to further facilitate harassment of replacements.' " Id. at 730. The court upheld the Board's finding of no violation by the company. But see NLRB v. Pearl Bookbinding Co., 517 F.2d 1108, 1113 (1st Cir. 1975), (where, after strike, union requested current employees' names, addresses and classifications, and company had no good faith fear of harassment or violence, disclosure required).[32]

In general, then, the "clear and present danger" defense is likely to be sustained where the company articulates a reasonable good faith fear of harm to striker replacements, offers to explore alternative forms of disclosure acceptable to both parties, and the union refuses to consider any such alternatives. However, in any information request case where the company's objections are frivolous, made for the purpose of delay, or part of an overall context of bad faith bargaining, the Board and courts are properly unsympathetic. See Pearl Bookbinding, supra, 517 F.2d at 1113–14; Emeryville, supra, 441 F.2d at 886; NLRB v. Fitzgerald Mills Corp., 313 F.2d 260, 264–65 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 834, 84 S.Ct. 47, 11 L.Ed.2d 64 (1963).

B. The Request and the Company's Response

By letter of November 23, 1976, attorney Cohen described the information requested at the previous day's bargaining session as follows. For "all auto glass workers, inside glass workers, helpers and glaziers" of SGI, SGG, SGR, and Presque Isle Glass d/b/a Soule Glass and Glazing:

> (1) the employee's name, (2) classification, job description, title or the like, (3) his or her hourly wage and average number of hours worked weekly as of February 21, 1976 and April 22, 1976, (4) any change in hourly wage or average number of hours worked weekly at any time since April 12, 1976 specifying the date(s) of such change(s), the amount(s) of change(s) in hourly wage and/or average hours worked weekly, and (5) any changes since April 12, 1976 in any and all benefits specifying all particulars of and relating to such changes.

As to the reason for the request and the relevance of the requested information, the letter stated:

> The purpose of this information request and the need for such information is to permit the Union to bargain intelligently with the Company as to wages and benefits and, with respect to same, to understand, evaluate and discuss with the Company at * * * further negotiations its wage and benefit position as explained by you at yesterday's negotiating session.

Attorney Levenson delivered the company's written response at the bargaining session on December 9. Levenson's letter first recounted that the information requested was "prompted" by his statement that SGG

[31] The court in Shell, noting that "the Company has behaved in a reasonable and conciliatory manner throughout, while the Union has been demanding, arrogant and intransigent," said it would be "most anomalous" to hold that the company rather than the union had refused to bargain 457 F.2d at 618.

[32] In Pearl Bookbinding, this court also rejected the company's argument that its eventual release of the requested data made the information disclosure issue moot, since the company did not concede the illegality of its past conduct and "present compliance [does not] deprive this court of the power to decide the disputed issues." 517 F.2d at 1114.

during the strike had been able to hire better men for less money and that, from a strictly economic point of view * * *, it did not make sense to pay more than our last offer when, in fact, we had found that it was possible to acquire a better labor force for even less than the current rate * * * in regard to spirit and productivity if not necessarily glazing expertise.

As noted above, the company on December 9 furnished two lists: a weekly listing of the aggregate overtime hours worked by nonsupervisory SGG employees and the number of men working each week, without any names; and another list, without names, of the then-current wage rates of SGG employees, numbered one through thirty-four. In addition, Levenson's December 9 letter stated that during the strike the company had not classified any new employees, except as "strike replacements," and had made no changes in benefits.

Levenson's letter characterized this disclosure as "a preliminary step" which "at this stage of the proceedings * * * should be sufficient for you to bargain intelligently," and offered to submit the employees' names and substantiating material to a third party for verification. Levenson gave the following reasons for the company's refusal to provide further requested information: (1) the company's doubts as to the union's motivation for making the request at the sixteenth bargaining session, eight months into the strike, given the numerous unfair labor practice charges the union had filed against the company, and the company's desire to avoid giving the union "ammunition for indeed another unfair labor charge"; (2) the company's "great obligation to protect the new men hired from coercive conduct and harassing tactics such as the union agreed not to further continue in its posting notice in case number 1-CB-3412;" (3) the hour information requested would require an individual analysis for each employee and "involve a great deal of difficulty in time and effort in preparing such a list"; and (4) regarding non-SGG employees "we do not understand that the law requires any disclosure of information concerning these companies * * *," since the SGI employees had voted to decertify the union prior to the strike.

The record contains no evidence of any response by the union, at the final bargaining session on December 9 or otherwise. Attorney Cohen did not testify. On December 17, 1976, the union filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging the company's "failure and refusal" to supply sufficient requested information.

The validity of the ALJ's conclusions with respect to the information disclosure issue, in this factual context, presents a close and complex question. The company's positions regarding the bargaining unit and non-unit information require separate analysis, and the ALJ's failure to distinguish legally and factually between these distinct types of information complicates our task.

C. Bargaining Unit Wage and Hour Information

The law is clear that the wage, hour, and benefit information requested regarding bargaining unit SGG employees (including the striker replacements, given that the bargaining unit is defined by jobs, not people, see note 8 supra) is presumptively relevant and must be disclosed on request, Rockwell Standard, supra, unless the company advanced a sufficient, good faith reason why full disclosure could not be made in the form or manner requested. San Diego Newspaper Guild, supra; Borden, supra.

The company offered two potentially adequate justifications for its limited disclosure: (1) with regard to the omission of names, its fear of harassment of the striker replacements if their identities were known; and (2) with regard to the incompleteness of the wage and hour data, the burdensomeness of producing weekly hours-worked data for each employee.

The record shows that the company's fear of harassment of replacements by strikers was a reasonable and bona fide one, in light of previous events during the strike.[33] There was, not surprisingly, considerable animosity between the two groups. One replacement, Raymond Irish, was assaulted, unprovoked, in a bar by

[33] That the company had a good faith concern about the safety of the replacements is substantiated by the following passage in a January 27, 1977 letter from Levenson to the Board's regional office (in which the company offered to disclose replacements' names and other information in settlement of the information charge):

> I would like to emphasize, however, that I am very much concerned that the disclosure of the names will result in harassment to the newly hired men * * *. I would very much appreciate some sort of assurance by the union to you that there will be no retaliatory harassment against these men.

union president David Bates. Others were threatened by picketing strikers on several occasions or followed home. Replacements' car windows were broken and their tires slashed. In another instance, a striker attempted to run off the road a company truck driven by a replacement. On other occasions vandalism was directed against the company, with several glass and window smashing incidents reported. Under these circumstances, it could reasonably be found that there was a "clear and present danger" that union members would use the replacements' names to facilitate further harassment. Shell, supra. The union offered no assurances that the names would not be misused. Moreover, other than for verification purposes, the union's need for the replacements' names is not obvious. The company's offer of third party verification satisfies this concern and is indicative of the company's good faith concern regarding employee harassment. Compare Pearl Bookbinding, supra. The union's failure to pursue the matter except by filing unfair labor practice charges substantially weakens its position. Cf. Emeryville, supra. We hold that withholding employee names under these circumstances did not violate § 8(a) (5) or (1).

However, the company's justifiable failure to disclose employee names makes even more unjustifiable its unexplained failure to provide the requested job descriptions corresponding to the wage rates it furnished. In the absence of job descriptions, the union could not substantiate its allegation that the SGG striker replacements had received the 25 cent-per-hour wage increase granted to SGI employees, a fact which the company had never admitted during the negotiations, and which was proved by the company's subsequent wage and hour disclosure pursuant to settlement agreement. The wage increases were also concealed by the company's unjustified failure to respond to the union's request for the amount(s) and date(s) of any change in hourly wages.[34] Nor could the union verify on the basis of the information it received whether or not the company was in fact getting its work done for "less money" than union employees had been paid, or whether the replacements were indeed more productive. The company's statement that the new employees had not been "classified" expect as "strike replacements" is at best unresponsive. The relevant question, to which the union was entitled to a prompt answer, is replacements for which strikers, in terms of job description. In these respects, the company's response was legally insufficient and violated § 8(a) (5) and (1).

The sufficiency of the SGG wage and hour information provided presents a different, closer question. Again, such information is presumptively relevant, and was made more so by both the union's allegation that SGG replacements had received the disputed wage increase and the company's "better men for less money" claim. However, there is no evidence that the company's partial disclosure was designed to frustrate the union's bargaining effort or was merely a delaying tactic. The union asked for several types of detailed wage and hour data, and asked that the company supply it within a period, exclusive of weekends and the Thanksgiving holiday, of less than two weeks. The company supplied some of what was requested, describing that disclosure as "a preliminary step," stated that compiling the detailed hour information requested would be burdensome and time-consuming, and suggested an approximate method by which the average weekly hours per man could be calculated. The company did not refuse to provide further wage and hour data or contest the union's right to the data concerning SGG employees. The clear implication was that the company was willing to supply the same at a later date, given time to prepare it, if the initial disclosure did not satisfy the union's needs. There is nothing in the record either to support or rebut the company's assertion of burdensomeness. At this point we merely note, taking into account the extent of the data involved,[35] that this claim is not facially frivolous, and we find nothing either in the company's remarkably candid letter of December 9 or elsewhere to suggest that it was not made in good faith.

"A union's bare assertion that it needs information * * * does not automatically oblige the employer to supply all the information in the manner requested." Detroit Edison, supra, 440 U.S. at 314, 99 S.Ct. at 1130. The union is not necessarily entitled to the information "in the precise form demanded." Emeryville, supra, 441 F.2d at 887. When the employer presents a legitimate, good faith objection on grounds of burdensomeness or otherwise, and offers to cooperate with the union in reaching a mutually acceptable accommodation, it is incumbent on the union to attempt to reach some type of compromise with the employer as to the form, extent, or timing of disclosure. In these circumstances, immediate "resort to the Board is premature." Emeryville, supra. To be sure, the union need not indulge the company in protracted negotiations over the terms, content, and form of disclosure. Id. at 885. Cf. Borden, supra, 600 F.2d at 318 ("a company may not play dog-in-the-manger just to put the Union through the hoops"). Nor, however, can the union instantly put the company to the election of either immediately supplying everything demanded or having to defend yet another unfair labor practice charge. Good faith is required on both sides.

[34] The testimony of various striker replacements shows that they not only started at a wage 25¢/hour higher than had previously been paid to (union) employees starting at the same job and skill level, but that some subsequently had received an additional 25¢/hour raise.

Here, the record contains no evidence that the union made any effort whatsoever to pursue the information request with the company, but immediately filed unfair labor practice charges (which were ultimately settled when the company agreed to disclose the additional SGG wage and hour data, inter alia, on March, 1977). This all-or-nothing approach casts doubt on the union's good faith need or desire for the information,[36] and made a "federal case" out of a minor dispute which manifestly should and could have been informally resolved without invoking the Board's burdensome remedial mechanism.

We hold, following Emeryville and Shell, supra, that "where, as here, the Company raises bona fide objections to the form in which information is requested" and indicates its willingness "to provide information sufficient to meet the Union's needs in a mutually satisfactory form," the Union must afford the company an opportunity to provide the data on mutually satisfactory terms. Emeryville, 441 F.2d at 885. Once the union has done so, but not before, the company's "refusal to provide adequately to meet the Union's needs within a reasonable time would support an unfair labor practice charge." Id. It is only where such problems cannot be worked out, after some further minimal effort at the bargaining table, that the problem is properly presented to the Board and courts. Thus, we find no violation with respect to the SGG wage and hour information, and need not consider the relevancy and sufficiency of the subsequent disclosure of such information on March 8, 1977.

D. Non-unit Wage and Hour Information

The non-unit information regarding SGI and SGR employees presents a different question. With respect to such non-bargaining unit information, the Union must demonstrate the relevance, under the circumstances, of the requested information to bargainable issues in the case. Rockwell-Standard, supra; Curtiss-Wright, supra. When the union fails to advance reasons why the information is relevant or necessary to its performance as bargaining representative (and where the company does not itself put such information in issue), it is not for the Board or courts to supply potential justifications. Moreover, the union's theory of relevance must be reasonably specific; "general avowals of relevance" such as "to bargain intelligently" and similar boilerplate are insufficient. Cf. Emeryville, supra. However, where the relevance of the requested non-unit information is obvious in the context of the negotiations, the company cannot resist disclosure simply because the union has failed to make a formal presentation of its theory of relevance.

As to the information requested for SGI employees, the company plainly had no obligation to disclose such information to the union. The company in its December 9 letter explicity declined to make disclosure "unless [the union] can demonstrate either a legal precedent or a rational motivation for [the] information." The union made no effort to do so, and was not entitled to the SGI information.

However, the opposite result is required with respect to the information regarding the SGR employees. We held, in part VII, supra, that substantial evidence supports the Board's determination that bargaining unit glass replacement work was removed from SGG and given to SGR, and that the company's failure to disclose and bargain with respect to this action violated the Act. Thus, the erosion or diversion of bargaining unit work to SGR was clearly an issue in the case, having been made so by the company's covert reorganization and its presentation in Levenson's August 6 "agenda." Compare Rockwell-Standard, supra (disclosure required where erosion of unit work at issue) with Western Mass. Electric, supra (disclosure not required where diversion of unit work not at issue). See notes 29-30 supra. Furthermore, the company assigned returned striker Roland Ray to SGR early in the strike and concealed this fact from the union. In this context, where the company's own actions and bargaining "proposals" regarding SGR made the amount and type of work of SGR employees an issue of singular relevance to the union, the union was not obligated to demonstrate further the relevance of such information. The union's stated concern at the November 22 meeting was the wages and hours of "those employees the [company] had hired after the strike to do bargaining unit work," which at least potentially included some employees of SGR. The job descriptions, hours, and wages of SGR employees would have enabled the union to estimate the amount of SGG outside glass replacement work being done by SGR.[37] Although a more specifically-framed request might have gotten at such information more directly (e. g., "the percentage of outside glass replacement work done by SGR, in terms of hours worked, by week") and would have made [36] The urgency of the union's need for the information is even more questionable in light of the timing of the request. Despite the fact that wages had been the crucial issue from the outset, that replacements had been hired starting in June, 1976, that Levenson had praised the work of the replacements as early as the August 6 session and explicity made the "better men for less money" claim on October 22, the union made no request for wage and hour information until the end of the 16th bargaining session, over seven months into the strike. Yet when the company failed to respond to its satisfaction within two weeks, the union one week later filed its fourth of nine sets of unfair labor practice charges against the company.

the union's need and theory of relevance clearer to the company, in light of the company's unlawful conduct with respect to SGR we think these omissions do not vitiate the union's right to the requested information. Thus, we affirm the ALJ's holding that the company's refusal to supply such information violated § 8(a)(5) and (1), and agree that the March 18 disclosure, to the extent it pertained to SGR (which is ambiguous), was too late to be of legal or practical significance.

However, the union's complete failure to respond to the company's explicit invitation to articulate its theory of relevance has a bearing on appropriate remedial measures.[38] Also, we note the absence of any evidence that the company's failure promptly to provide all the information to which the union was legally entitled in any way contributed to prolonging the strike. To the extent the ALJ's conversion finding can be interpreted as finding to the contrary, we hold that it is not supported by substantial evidence.

IX.

Course-of-Conduct and Overall Bad Faith Bargaining

The ALJ held that the company "engag[ed] in a course of conduct beginning April 12, 1976 designed to disparage the Union's leadership, undermine its effectiveness as bargaining agent during the negotiations, and destroy its majority," in violation of § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. The ALJ stated that "this course of action was highlighted by specific incidents of bad faith which have been discussed in detail," reasoning as follows:

> This conclusion is supported not only by the specific unfair labor practices which I have found to have occurred in the negotiations themselves, but also by the unlawful conduct of Respondent's supervisors away from the bargaining table. These acts served to highlight a pattern of conduct in which the Union was placed in a position of constantly having to reduce its wage proposals while the Respondent made no movement at all, and constantly renegotiate, at times in the dark, items which had already been agreed to. Some of these items, as discussed herein, involved major corporate changes with adverse effects to bargaining unit employees. The Respondent argues that only economics and its corporate survival dictated its actions, and that the changes it made were simply for the purpose of getting the > work done, but these important factors give the Respondent no right to run roughshod over the bargaining rights of its employees. Moreover, all this occurred in an atmosphere where the Union was constantly being chided with remarks about how well the strike replacements were getting along in their jobs and that the Company had found better men for less pay. In sum, Respondent's total conduct placed the Union in a position which no self respecting representative would tolerate. I find that such conduct at the bargaining table amounts to a total rejection of the principles expressed in Section 8(d).

[38] We note that the company, in declining to disclose the SGR information, was acting in reliance on a legal theory that, but for its actions with respect to SGR, would have been valid—i. e., that the burden is ordinarily on the unnion to show the relevance of nonunit information. Our holding is merely that under the circumstances disclosure is required, not that the company's failure to disclosure was in bad faith.

We reverse the Board's course of conduct finding, holding that it is inconsistent with the requirements of due process, is not supported by substantial evidence, and is based on erroneous legal reasoning.

A. Due Process

The ALJ acknowledges that a course-of-conduct or overall bad faith bargaining violation "is not specifically alleged in the complaint." Nor, we add, was anything similar alleged, "specifically" or generally. Nevertheless, the ALJ found that during the lengthy hearing "the totality of the Respondent's conduct during the 1976 negotiations was fully litigated," and that the course of conduct issue "is implicit in the arguments made in the General Counsel's brief." First of all, even if such an argument appeared explicitly in the General Counsel's post-hearing brief, such post-hoc characterization of the case would not be relevant in determining whether the employer had notice of the issue and a meaningful opportunity to defend against it at the hearing. It is revealing that the company's detailed 80-page post-hearing brief—which left no stone unturned in arguing the facts and law regarding both the allegations in the complaint and additional points stressed at the hearing—devotes no attention to the purported course of conduct issue, except to state on its penultimate page:

1101

> Much has been said in this brief about the contents of this record. However, it is also important to point out what is missing. There is nowhere present the large tinge of discrimination that most of these type cases have had and there is no bad faith bargaining.

Thus, if the employer had notice of the course-of-conduct issue, it was both unduly subtle and untimely.

Second, our painstaking review of the 1308 page record leaves us firmly convinced that (a) the company made clear that it was not litigating overall bad faith bargaining, and (b) the "totality" of the company's conduct at the bargaining table was not fully litigated in the sense relevant to a course-of-conduct violation. In his opening statement, company attorney Levenson noted that the union's several charges of bad faith bargaining had been refused by the Board's Regional Director and again by the Appeals Section, and that no such charge appeared in the amended complaint. Levenson then stated,

> * * * I would conduct the case a lot differently if I had a charge of bargaining in bad faith, which I don't have * * *. Now the point I'm making is although I'm here to defend against what the complaint, and the amendment to the complaint, and the amendments to the amendment say, I'm not here defending the charges of bargaining in bad faith because that isn't before us with regard to the bargaining session[s].

Although there was some discussion on the point, neither the General Counsel nor the ALJ asserted the contrary.[39]

Much later in the hearing, another revealing colloquy took place:

> Mr. DiCIERC (for the General Counsel): I thought Mr. Levenson, at the beginning of this hearing, said that he didn't think [sic] that we had dismissed the case with regard to a course of conduct 8(a)(5), and so therefore he wanted to make sure that we were not going to have to go through each bargaining session piece by piece.

[39] Levenson's statement was apparently prompted by the following remarks in the General Counsel's opening statement: "Respondent * * * embarked on a course of conduct which essentially converted the strike from an economic strike to an unfair labor practice strike"; and "* * * I think your Honor will have to evaluate [the purported negotiations regarding the effects of the transfer of work to SGR] as to whether there were actual negotiations or were * * * undertaken in what was essentially an atmosphere of bad faith." However, the reference to the company's "course of conduct," in context is reasonably interpretable as simply a convenient means of referring to the aggregate of the alleged discrete violations, which were enumerated immediately thereafter, rather than as alleging an independent violation of the Act.

> And now he brought in attorney Mayo Levenson to testify as to certain bargaining sessions. And now Mr. Levenson is talking about this issue to sustain various issues which I'm not aware of with regard to the wages at the bargaining table. I don't know what he's talking about.
> JUDGE DENISON (ALJ): * * * I want to litigate the issues in the complaint. That's all I want to litigate * * *. We'll take the negotiations when they come up if they come up * * *.

These excerpts from the record indicate that during the hearing both the parties and the ALJ were operating under the premise that neither the company's course of conduct, nor overall bad faith bargaining, were being tried, independently, implicitly, or otherwise. The record does not support the contention that the company had notice of this issue and an opportunity to meet it, or that the issue was in any sense "fully and fairly litigated" as due process requires. See NLRB v. H.E. Fletcher Co., supra, 298 F.2d at 600; Boyle's Famous Corned Beef Co. v.' NLRB, supra 400 F.2d at 162; J.C. Penny Co v. NLRB, supra, 384 F.2d at 483. Had the company known that its entire course of conduct or overall good faith was in issue, it is likely, as Levenson stated, that it would have litigated the case "a lot differently," see Drug Package, Inc. v. NLRB, supra, 570 F.2d at 1345; in particular by presenting detailed evidence of the conduct of the parties at each of the 17 bargaining sessions. Especially in a case as complex as this one, "[s]imply because violations could have been alleged in addition to those in the complaint does not obligate the employer to defend against all possibilities." NLRB v. Pepsi Cola Bottling Co. of Topeka, supra, 613 F.2d at 274. Here, the ALJ improperly assumed the prosecutorial role, deciding an issue which he alone belatedly injected into the case. NLRB v. Tamper, Inc., supra, 522 F.2d at 789-90. We refuse to enforce a finding so at odds with fundamental fairness.

At oral argument, the Board suggested that the company's failure to request post-hearing reopening of the record to receive additional evidence on the course of conduct issue foreclosed it from now arguing that thius issue was not fairly litigated.[40] This contention is without merit. The company amply preserved its appellate rights on the issue in its exceptions to the ALJ's decision timely filed on August 27, 1979, in which it strenuously objected to the ALJ's course-of-conduct finding on both procedural due process and substantive grounds.[41] It would impose an unfair and intolerable burden on a party to require the further step of attempting to reopen the evidence to litigate new matters not in issue at the hearing. Requiring the company to come forward after trial to rebut a violation neither charged, litigated nor proved by the General Counsel is to stand the adversary process on its head. Moreover, as a practical matter, reopening the record on the course-of-conduct issue here would likely require extensive testimony as to each of the 17 bargaining sessions, necessitating the recall of witnesses who had appeared at the original hearing; a wasteful and burdensome procedure that is without justification.

B. The Merits

Although the above holding disposes of the issue, we note that even if due process had been satisfied, we would nevertheless be compelled to reverse the course-of-conduct finding for want of substantial evidence, and because the ALJ's analysis is apparently based on faulty legal premises. The precise basis of the ALJ's substantive holding is unclear, but he apparently relied on (a) the various specific unfair labor practices found, and (b) the company's alleged unreasonable, unyielding, or antiunion positions and conduct at the bargaining table. We treat these sequentially.

[40] On October 16, 1979, the company filed a post-hearing motion to reopen the evidence in order to offer a further letter from the union, dated October 4, 1979, reiterating the union's demand for "reinstatement of all of the men as a group," which motion the union and General Counsel opposed. The Board in a footnote to its order affirming the ALJ denied the motion to reopen on grounds of irrelevance. The company's (unsuccessful) attempt to supplement the record on one issue does not make its failure to do the same on other issues a waiver of its objections on such other issues.

[41] Section 10(e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), provides in pertinent part that "[n]o objection that has not been urged before the Board * * * shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances." Here, petitioners' exceptions were plainly "urged before the Board" and summarily rejected. Section 10(e) also empowers the court to order that additional evidence be taken before the Board where the movant shows "* * * there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing * * *." No such motion is before the court.

Of the numerous violations found by the ALJ, we have sustained only four—the wage increase, supervisor misconduct, failure to bargain regarding SGR, and nondisclosure of certain information. Each of these violations either presented close questions or had insubstantial practical consequences; even in combination they were insufficient to convert the nature of the strike. Each was essentially an isolated event, separate in time from the others in the context of a long and bitter strike marred by unfortunate incidents of misconduct on both sides. As this court has noted, "[i]ndividual acts or statements of a negotiating party which appear contrary to the required attitude cannot be drawn upon to dilute a finding of good faith where the totality of the party's conduct conforms to the dictates of the statute." NLRB v. Almeida Bus Lines, Inc., 333 F.2d 729, 731 (1st Cir. 1964). Unless a "course-of-conduct violation" means nothing more than the sum of several discrete violations, and thereby has no independent significance, further evidence of bad faith is required.[42]

The ALJ found that the company's course of conduct was "designed to disparage, * * * undermine, * * * and destroy * * *" the union. Thus, he found that the company was guilty of antiunion animus and implies that there was an overall company scheme, plan, or conscious pattern of behavior, manifested by the various unfair labor practices and bargaining positions, aimed at destroying the union. However, absent some articulable objective basis in the record, such conclusory assertions about the employer's state of mind cannot be sustained.

Section 8(d) of the Act requires the parties to "confer in good faith" in an effort to reach agreement, but explicitly states that neither agreement nor concessions are required. 29 U.S.C. § 158(d). In what has become a leading case on the subject, this court framed the inquiry regarding good faith bargaining thus:

> [T]he question is whether it is to be inferred from the totality of the employer's conduct that he went through the motions of negotiation as an elaborate pretense with no sincere desire to reach an agreement if possible, or that it bargained in good faith but was unable to arrive at an acceptable agreement with the union.

NLRB v. Reed & Prince Mfg. Co., 205 F.2d 131, 134 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 346 U.S. 887, 74 S.Ct. 139, 93 L.Ed. 391 (1953). Since the intent to frustrate agreement or to undermine the union are rarely articulated for obvious reasons, bad faith is typically inferred from the unreasonableness of the employer's substantive positions at the bargaining table. Id. at 135; R. Gorman, supra, at 481. This, adamant employer adherence to proposals predictably unacceptable to the union, refusal to make meaningful concessions, and unprincipled insistence on substantive positions unreasonable under the circumstances may justify a finding of bad faith bargaining. See R. Gorman, supra, at 485–95. However, hard bargaining and the use of a company's relative economic strength to exert pressure on the union "is of itself not at all inconsistent with the duty of bargaining in good faith." NLRB v. Insurance Agents' Union, 361 U.S. 477, 490–91, 80 S.Ct. 419, 428, 4 L.Ed.2d 454 (1960). See H. K. Porter Co. v. NLRB, 397 U.S. 99, 109, 90 S.Ct. 821, 826, 25 L.Ed.2d 146 (1970); South Shore Hospital v. NLRB, 630 F.2d 40, 44 (1st Cir. 1980); Chevron Oil Co. v. NLRB, 442 F.2d 1067, 1073 (5th Cir. 1971). "Adamant insistence on a bargaining position * * * is not in itself a refusal to bargain in good faith." Id. at 1072; see NLRB v. Herman Sausage Co., 275 F.2d 229, 231 (5th Cir. 1960). "The right to union representation under the Act does not imply the right to a better deal. The proper role of the Board is to watch over the process, not guarantee the results." NLRB v. Tomco Communications, Inc., 567 F.2d 877 (9th Cir. 1978).

Our review of the record compels the conclusion that this was simply a case of hard bargaining between an employer and union with a history of contentious, strike-plagued relations. The failure of the parties to reach agreement was due to the adamant, but lawful, adherence by both sides to positions close to their original proposals, especially on the wage issue. The fact that the union made more concessions on the wage issue than the company is itself of little significance.[43] As another court has noted in a smiliar context where the lack of company concessions on wages was alleged as evidence of overall bad faith bargaining, "[t]he Company was not obliged to increase its wage offer merely because the Union lowered its demand, particularly where the Union's reduced demand still amounted to a very substantial increase." Sign & Pictorial Union v. NLRB, 419 F.2d 726, 739 (D.C.Cir.1969). As Levenson stated, as the strike wore on the company's economic position apparently improved, strengthening its bargaining position and making it less rational or necessary to make further concessions. The company's eventual hiring of a full complement of replacements and its satisfaction with their performance further reduced its incentive to concede. This is in no way inconsistent with the Act. Where the union cannot by the use of the substantial economic weapons protected by the Act convince the employer to agree to terms acceptable to its members, the Board may not invervene to "equalize or neutralize pressures in the name of lack of good faith," M. R. & R. Trucking Co. v. NLRB, 434 F.2d 689, 695 (5th Cir. 1970), or to compel the employer to grant the union a better or "fairer" deal than the union was itself able to obtain. See Tomco Communications, supra.

[42] The ALJ cited no authority for his course-of-conduct finding. The Board, in its brief, attempts to distinguish the "unlawful course of conduct" found from "bad faith bargaining" or "surface bargaining," but cites no authority either for the distinction or for what a "course-of-conduct" violation entails. The company argues that what was found was a garden variety § 8(a)(5) refusal-to-bargain in good faith, unsupported by either the complaint or the evidence.

The record shows that this simply was not the case of egregious employer behavior and flagrant violation of the Act which the ALJ's strong and indignant rhetoric attempts to convey. This case does not fit the procrustean bed of classic bad faith bargaining cases such as Reed & Prince, supra (evidence of overall bad faith included employer's delay of initial bargaining session, refusal to allow union to post routine notices to its members, unjustified delay in providing requested information, adamant refusal to consider key terms without a principled reason, and presenting an egregiously deficient and one-sided "proposed contract") or Alba-Waldensian, Inc., 167 NLRB 695 (1967) (adamant insistence on maintaining existing wages and company's right to cut wages unilaterally, absolute refusal to consider checkoff of union dues or arbitration clause, refusal or delay in supplying wage data, insistence on a no-strike clause, refusal to adopt a formal grievance procedure, and wage and benefit increases to employees in nonunion plants).[44] See note 11 supra.

Another factor which militates against the ALJ's course-of-conduct finding and supports our conclusion that the issue was not fairly litigated is the relatively cursory evidence in the record as to the details of each bargaining session—the positions, proposals, statements, allegations, responses, and actions of the parties crucial to support inferences of good or bad faith.[45] Virtually 1105 no evidence was produced and nothing appears in the ALJ's decision as to the first four (pre-strike) of the 17 bargining sessions. Although the April 9, May 6, May 7, August 6 and October 22 sessions are summarized in moderate detail, six of the remaining sessions (i.e., May 25, June 18, August 27, October 18, November 22, and December 9) are relegated to brief, two or three sentence descriptions, typically devoted mostly to the parties' positions on the wage issue; and the ALJ notes that regarding the September 14 and 15 meetings "[t]here is almost no evidence." By contrast, in Alba-Waldensian, the Trial Examiner's decision on which the Board's opinion was based included a painstakingly detailed review of all 22 negotiating sessions; a review which fills 34 double-coluimn, small-print pages in the NLRB Reports.

For all the above reasons, we reverse the Board's finding that petitioners were guilty of an unlawful course of conduct in violation of § 8(a)(5) and (1).

X.

Denial of Immediate Reinstatement

Pursuant to his finding that the company's unfair labor practices had prolonged and converted the strike, the ALJ found that the * * * persons named in paragraph 20 of the complaint for whom the Union unconditionally applied for reinstatement, and to whom the Respondent on March 25, 1977, refused reinstatement, are unfair labor practice strikers, and that by refusing reinstatement to them the respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

[43] Although we are aware of the mischievous uses to which such statistics can be put, we note that one view of the wage negotiations is that the company increased its annual wage offer by 40 percent (from an aggregate 25¢ to 35¢ per hour), while the union reduced its annual wage demand by only 27 percent (from $1.10 to 80¢ per hour).

[44] Although he does not cite Reed & Prince or Alba-Waldensian in connection with the course-of-conduct violation, the ALJ's conclusion that "the company's conduct placed the union in a position which no self respecting representative would tolerate" is nearly identical to the language used in these cases to support a finding of bad faith bargaining. See 205 F.2d at 139; 167 NLRB at 696, 697.

[45] In Reed & Prince, supra, this court affirmed the Board's finding of refusal to bargain in good faith only "[a]fter an attentive review of the entire record of the bargaining negotiations." 205 F.2d at 135.

The basic issue is whether the strike was an "economic" strike or an "unfair labor practice" strike at the time the permanent striker replacements were hired. There is no dispute that the strike began as an economic strike in support of the union's wage and other contract demands. Therefore the question is whether the strike was converted to an unfair labor practice strike by the employer's subsequent conduct, and if so, when.

A. The Nature of the Strike

The distinction between economic and unfair labor strikers determines reinstatement rights:

> It is settled that an employer may refuse to reinstate economic striker if in the interim he has taken on permanent replacements. NLRB v. Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., 304 U.S. 333, 345–46, [58 S.Ct 904, 910–911, 82 L.Ed. 1381]. It is equally settled that employees striking in protest of an employer's unfair labor practices are entitled, absent some contractual or statutory provisions to the contrary to unconditional reinstatement, with back pay, "even if replacements for them have been made." Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 278 [76 S. 93 Ct. 349, 355, 100 L.Ed. 309].

NLRB v. International Van Lines, 409 U.S. 48, 50–51, S.Ct. 74, 76–77, 34 L.Ed.2d 201 (1972). Economic strikers, upon unconditional request, are entitled to reinstatement to their former or substantially equivalent positions unless the employer has "legitimate and substantial business justifications" for denying the request, and having hired permanent replacements is a legally sufficient justification. NLRB v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., 389 U.S. 375, 378–79, 88 S.Ct 543, 545–546, 19 L.Ed.2d 614 (1967). However, such economic strikers do have right to preferential rehiring when the departure of permanent replacements creates vacancies. Laidlaw Corp. v NLRB, 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969), Cert. denied, 397 U.S. 920, 90 S.Ct 928, 25 L.Ed.2d 100 (1970). See NLRB v. Crimptex, Inc., 517 F.2d 501, 504 (1St Cir. 1975); American Machinery Corp. v. NLRB, 424 F.2d 1321, 1328 (5th Cir. 1970).

We have already held, in part V, supra, that the strike was not converted on April 12 by the wage increase. In addition, in light of the ALJ's finding that the stike "was thereafter prolonged by the Responden's unfair labor practices both at and away from the bargaining table," we have examined the record for evidence bearing on the question whether any of the three subsequent unfair labor practives which we have sustained might have prolonged and thereby converted the strike at a later date. Our review of the record with respect to the failure to bargain with respect to SGR, the supervisor misconduct, and the failure to disclose all of the required information, as noted in parts VI, VII, and VIII, supra, discloses no basis for an inference that any of these violations of the Act had any material effect on the nature, motivation, or length of the strike.

The fundamental stumbling block, from the prestrike negotiations in March 1976 to the reinstatement request in late March, 1977, was wages and to lesser extent the duration of the agreement. The parties never came close to agreement on the wage issue, and there is no indication that either party's adherence to its economic demands was caused by anythng other than "[d]eep conviction, firmly held," that their position was valid under the circumstances. NLRB v. Herman Sausage Co., supra, 275 F.2d at 231. Walter Dolbow's television statement in February 1977 that "we [are] on strike for more money" is one indication that is was the union's strong belief that its members were underpaid that kept the strikers on the picket lines for nearly a full year. To be sure, the union was bitterly unhappy with the company's bargaining positions and proposals, as reflected both by heated exchanges at certain bargaining sessions and the union's filing nine unfair labor practice charges over the course of the strike. It would be to disregard the realities of modern-day collective bargaining, however, not to recognize that in some instances an unfair labor practice charge may be more of a bargaining strategem than a credible indication that the Act has in fact been violated. Moreover, as discussed above, it is simply not the case that whenever in the course of a strike an employer commits an act that if found to constitute an unfair labor practice the strike is thereby transformed into an unfair labor practice strike. Some showing of prolongation and causation is required to support a finding of conversion.

It might be argued that in light of our holding regarding the effect of the wage increase and our reversal of certain unfair labor practice findings, the appropriate course would be for us to remand this case to the Board for a determination whether any of the three surviving unfair labor practice converted the strike. However, for several reasons we conclude that a remand is inappropriate. First, as noted above, we find the record to devoid of any evidence to support a finding of conversion that a remand would likely be pointless. Our holding that the ALJ's finding that the strike was "prolonged [after April 12] by Respondent's unfair labor practices * * *" is not supported by substantial evidence disposes of the matter. Second, the parties, the court, and the public have a strong interest in the prompt, accurate, fair and final disposition of labor cases. The events in question took place over four years, ago. A remand and the inevitable return to this court for another review would prolong the controversy still longer, without any indication that a more appropriate adjudication would be achieved. Rather, under these circumstances, we agree with the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit that remand "would merely give the Board another bite at the proverbial cherry, and * * * piecemeal litigation would result." NLRB v. Colonial Haven Nursing Home, Inc., 542 F.2d 691, 711 (7th Cir. 1976) (on petition for rehearing). Therefore, in the interests of finality, we decline to remand for further findings on the conversion issue and deny enforcement of those portions of the Board's remedial order which depend on the finding of conversion.

A. Reinstatement Rights of Economic Strikers

Because we hold that the strikers were economic strikers throughout the duration of the strike, we must consider their rights as economic strikers upon the request for reinstatement made on March 25, 1977. Since the ALJ proceeded under the assumption that the strikers were at all relevant times unfair labor practice strikers, he did not reach this issue. However, because the law is clear on the issue and because the company appears to have acted consistently with the law applicable to economic strikers, we find no need to remand on this issue. See Colonial Haven, supra, 542 F.2d at 707–11 (declining in equitable discretion to remand on the same issue under similar circumstances).

A threshold issue is whether, as the company contends, the reinstatement request was in fact conditional. The company bases this contention on the union's March 8 letter "unconditional[ly]" applying for "immediate reinstatement" of 22 named strikers, including David Bates, and the Union's March 11 letter clarifying that "unconditional reinstatement, as a group" was requested. By letter of March 21, the company informed the union that by reason of Bates' strike misconduct, it was terminating him, and that "Mr. Bates is the only one of the twenty-two that the company takes the position that it will refuse reinstatement because of strike misconduct." [46] The company now argues that the inclusion of Bates, in a "group" request, makes the request conditional. Rejecting this contention, the ALJ explained in a footnote:

> The Respondent has argued that the Union's offer of reinstatement is conditional because the list of strikers' names includes that of David Bates. I find no merit to this contention. At no time did the Union ever state that none of the strikers would return to work unless all of those listed in it March 8 offer were returned. Furthermore, no such implication can be drawn from the Union's letter protesting the Company's desire to conduct individual interviews of the strikers before deciding whether or not to reinstate them.

For substantially the reasons stated, we agree with the ALJ that the request was intended by the union to be, and was as a matter of law, unconditional. "The employer has the burden of showing that the offer to return was not unconditional." NLRB v. Okla. Inn, 488 F.2d 498, 505 (10th Cir.

[46] After a detailed review of the evidence, the ALJ found "that the Respondent refused to reinstate David Bates because of serious instances of strike-related misconduct, and therefore the respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act as to him." This finding is not challenged by the General Counsel.

1973). The company has not met that burden. Indeed, in view of the fact that it failed to raise its contention regarding Bates and conditionality during the exchange of correspondence concerning the reinstatement request, the company's argument has more the appearance of a post-hoc rationalization than a serious legal contention.[47] The positions and actions of the parties make clear that the real controversy was not over the conditionality of the reinstatement request, but rather over whether the strikers were economic or unfair labor practice strikers, in light of the differing reinstatement rights afforded those two categories.

We have held above that the strikers were economic strikers at all relevant times. As such, "[t]he strikers * * * run the risk that they may be permanently replaced while the strike is underway, and the fact that such replacements are on the job provides an adequate justification for an employer's refusal of reinstatement." NLRB v. Crimptex, Inc., supra, 517 F.2d at 504. Here, the union took that risk, and all the SGG strikers were permanently replaced before the reinstatement request. However, under Fleetwood Trailer and Laidlaw, supra, the strikers have the right to be rehired before others are hired when the departure of their replacements creates vacancies, unless, in the words of § 2(3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(3) defining "employee"), a striker has "obtained * * * other regular and substantially equivalent employment." See Little Rock Airmotive, Inc. v. NLRB, 455 F.2d 163 (8th Cir. 1972).

The company, relying on its belief that the strikers were economic strikers, acted consistently with these requirements. It did not refuse reinstatement to any of the strikers except Bates, and his termination was found to be for good cause. With respect to all the other strikers, the company in its final letter to the union on March 25, 1977, stated that "upon proper application, the Company will reinstate those strikers who so desire when openings occur under the dictates of the law * * * for economic strikers * * *." The record shows, and the ALJ noted, that pursuant to this offer the company reinstated strikers Earl Curtis on March 21, 1977, George Light in July, 1977, and Henry Ward on October 3, 1977.[48] The uncontradicted testimony of company witnesses Edward Tribou and Andrew Soule indicated that when positions opened, SGG recalled those strikers whom they considered the "best men," "irrespective of seniority," whom management believed were not already working elsewhere,[49] and that no other positions had become available.

There is no claim before us that the company has reinstated strikers in a discriminatory manner, or that it otherwise employed unlawful criteria in choosing who to reinstate when a position became available or has failed to act in good faith. Nor is there any contention that the company has terminated its reinstatement offer or failed to keep it open for a reasonable time.[50] Therefore we hold that, on the record before us, petitioners did not violate § 8(a)(3) of the Act by refusing immediate reinstatement to the strikers as a group, and we deny enforcement of the portion of the Board's order that requires immediate reinstatement with backpay of twenty named strikers and the dismissal of their replacements.

XI.

Revocation of Settlement Agreements

With respect to the Regional Director's June 14, 1977 decision to revoke the three informal settlement agreements he had previously approved, the ALJ concluded:

> In view of all the findings of violations of the Act, I find that all the actions of the Regional [47] H. & F. Binch Co. v. NLRB, 456 F.2d 357 (2d Cir. 1972), cited by the company, is distinguishable. Binch held to be conditional a request for group reinstatement which was explicitly conditioned on all being reinstated together. Binch clearly involved economic strikers, who are not entitled to immediate reinstatement, and the Board there conceded that this fact made the group request conditional. Here, by contrast, the union in good faith took the nonfrivolous position that the strikers were unfair labor practice strikers. A union's group reinstatement demand, based on this premise, does not make the request conditional simply because the union's legal theory is eventually held to be incorrect.

[49] Despite testimony on the subject by Tribou, Andrew Soule, and Levenson, the basis of SGG company officials' beliefs as to who was and was not working is unclear, and no attempts at direct verification by contacting the affected employees were made. An example is Walter Dolbow, who was not recalled, despite testimony that he was considered a "first-rate" glazier, on the basis of Andrew Soule's "understanding," based on "some second or third hand source," that Dolbow was working elsewhere.

[50] Disposition of the present case is without prejudice to any claim that may arise in the future for backpay, under Laidlaw, to any striker wrongfully denied reinstatement.

> Director in setting aside the settlement agreements, reopening Cases 1-CA-11856 and 1-CA-11964, and consolidating those cases for trial was a proper exercise of his discretion and authority.

The company argues, "alternatively" to its substantive arguments against the above unfair labor practice findings, that the Regional Director's revocation of the settlement agreements was an abuse of discretion. We find no merit to this argument.

In Wallace Corp. v. NLRB, 323 U.S. 248, 254–55, 65 S.Ct. 238, 241–242, 89 L.Ed. 216 (1944) the Supreme Court, after noting the strong policy favoring the settlement of labor disputes, approved the Board's practice of disregarding settlement agreements it had previously approved "where subsequent events have demonstrated that efforts at adjustment have failed to accomplish their purpose, or where there has been a subsequent unfair labor practice." In such cases, the Board, is "justified in considering evidence as to [the employer's] conduct, both before and after the settlement." Id. This doctrine was later articulated as follows: "[T]he Board may not consider matters properly disposed by a settlement agreement 'unless there is a breach of the agreement or subsequent independent violation of the Act by the parties to the agreement.'" Rogers Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 486 F.2d 644, 648 (6th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 937, 94 S.Ct. 1937, 40 L.Ed.2d 288 (1974), quoting Lincoln Bearing Co. v. NLRB, 311 F.2d 48, 50 (6th Cir. 1962).

By letter of June 14, 1977 the Regional Director informed the company that his investigations of various pending charges had disclosed that "certain terms of the settlement agreement[s] * * * have been violated." Such a finding justifies the Regional Director in setting aside his approval of the settlements and proceeding to issue a complaint on the underlying charges which he had previously found after investigation to have probable merit. There is no allegation that the Regional Director did not act in good faith or that he manipulated the settlement agreements to achieve purposes contrary to the Act. The fact that this court now reverses the Board's findings on several of the relevant unfair labor practices does not make the Regional Director retroactively guilty of abuse of discretion.

XII.

Withdrawal of Recognition

The ALJ found that the company further violated section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by withdrawing recognition from the union March 25, 1977. On that date Levenson wrote Cohen a letter stating

> The company doubts that Local 1516 continues to represent the bargaining unit at Soule Glass & Glazing Company. Indeed, there is even doubt concerning your representations as the agent of all of the 22 strikers. However, even assuming the desire and eligibility of the 22 in returning, the Company has now made many more than that number of replacements. Our information is that they have no interest in representation by the Union * * *. The Company, therefore, is herewith withdrawing recognition of the Union as the established bargaining representative for Soule Glass & Glazing Company.

In support of his conclusion that this action violated the Act, the ALJ reasoned as follows:

> [T]he question of the Union's continued majority status [cannot be] raised in the context of unfair labor practices by the Employer designed to cause disaffection from the Union or to gain time in which to undermine the Union's majority. Celanese Corporation of America, 95 NLRB 664, 671–672; Burroughs Corporation, 180 NLRB 331; Nu-Southern Dyeing and Finishing, Inc., et al., 179 NLRB 573. Thus, against the background of the unfair labor practices found in this Decision the Repondent was in no position to withdraw recognition from the Union, and in doing so violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Furthermore, at the time recognition was withdrawn the Respondent was obligated to bargain in good faith with the Union by virtue of the settlement agreements in these cases, the last of which was approved * * * on March 4, 1977. The Board has held that an employer cannot justify such a refusal to bargain with a certified union within a reasonable time after the execution of a settlement agreement acknowledging its obligation to bargain, since the parties must have adequate time to attempt to negotiate their differences. Poole Foundry & Machine Co., 95 NLRB 34.

A. The Legal Standards

After the passage of one year from the certification of a union as exclusive collective bargaining representative for a particular bargaining unit, the union enjoys a rebuttable presumption of continued majority. To overcome this presumption, the employer has the burden of demonstrating either (1) that the union in fact no longer has a majority; or, more likely (2) "a reasonable, good faith doubt of the union's majority." E. g., NLRB v. Crimptex, Inc., supra, 517 F.2d at 503; National Car Rental System, Inc., v. NLRB, 594 F.2d 1203, 1205 (8th Cir. 1979). The employer's doubt must be "reasonably grounded" and "based on objective considerations" to justify refusal to bargain with the union. Burroughs Corp., 180 NLRB 331, 332 (1969). See NLRB v. Middleboro Fire Apparatus, Inc., 590 F.2d 4, 8–9 (1st Cir. 1978) (employee statements of dissatisfaction with union are " 'objective, identifiable acts' on which * * * an employer ought to be able to rely"); R. Gorman, supra, at 110–11. Generally, several indicia of loss of majority support are required, and no one factor (e. g., high employer turnover or union "dormancy") is determinative. In reviewing the Board's determination of "reasonable good faith doubt," a court should respect the Board's "seasoned feel for the meaning of events in a labor-management setting," and "may not reverse unless [the court] deem[s] this a case of arbitrariness, irrationality, or abuse of judgment" as to the Board's ultimate conclusion. Middleboro Fire Apparatus, supra, 590 F.2d at 9.

Although mere high employee turnover is not a sufficient ground to negate a union's presumed majority status, the permanent replacement of striking employees presents a different situation. Striker repalacements are > generally assumed * * * not [to] support the union and * * * ought not to be counted toward a union majority. When such strikebreakers or permanent replacements constitute a majority of the unit, the presumption of union majority is undermined. Titan Metal Mfg. Co., 135 NLRB 196 (1962). But in computing the total workforce within which the majority is to be determined, the replaced economic strikers must be counted, at least during the first twelve months of the strike. C. H. Guenther & Sons v. NLRB, 427 F.2d 983 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 942 [91 S.Ct. 240, 27 L.Ed.2d 246] (1970).

R. Gorman, supra, at 112–13 (case citations added). See National Car Rental, supra, 594 F.2d at 1206 (quoting Gorman, supra, and holding replacements presumed antiunion).

However, an employer's prior unfair labor practices may "estop" it from withdrawing recognition based on good faith doubt, where the employer's own actions have undermined the union's support. As the Supreme Court stated in Medo Photo Supply Corp. v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 678, 687, 64 S.Ct. 830, 834, 88 L.Ed. 1007 (1944) (a unilateral wage increase case), > [p]etitioner cannot, as justification for its refusal to bargain with the union, set up the defection of union members which it had induced by unfair labor practices, even though the result was that the union no longer had the support of a majority. It cannot thus, by its own action, disestablish the union as the bargaining representative of the employees, previously designated as such of their own free will.

Accord, NLRB v. Frick Co., 423 F.2d 1327, 1333 (3d Cir. 1970). Compare NLRB v. Cott Corporation, 578 F.2d 892 (1st Cir. 1978). The Board in Burroughs Corp., 180 NLRB 331, 332 (1969) stated that the employer's good faith doubt "must not have been raised in the context [of] illegal antiunion activities, or other conduct by the employer aimed at causing disaffection from the union or indicating that in raising the majority issue the employer was merely seeking to gain time in which to undermine the union." (Emphasis added). Accord, NLRB v. Sky Wolf Sales, 470 F.2d 827, 830 (9th Cir. 1972). "The existence of an unfair labor practice prior to the refusal to bargain interjects an element of uncertainty about whether the employer thus caused the possible loss of majority. But if it is shown that the unfair labor practice did not significantly contribute to the loss of status, the employer may avoid a bargaining order." National Cash Register Co. v. NLRB, 494 F.2d 189, 195 (8th Cir. 1974).

Finally, despite a clear loss of majority by the union, an employer may be compelled to continue to bargain with the union for a "reasonable period" by virtue of its entry into a Board-approved settlement agreement with the union concerning previous unfair labor practice charges. Poole Foundry & Machine Co. v. NLRB, 192 F.2d 740, 743 (4th Cir. 1951), cert. denied, 342 U.S. 954, 72 S.Ct. 626, 96 L.Ed. 709 (1952); NLRB v. Vantran Electric Corp., 580 F.2d 921, 923–24 (7th Cir. 1978). The rationale is both remedial and contractual. The company's Board-approved agreement to bargain in good faith with the union (a standard feature of § 8(a)(5) settlement agreements) "manifests an administrative determination * * * that some remedial action is necessary to safeguard the public interest[] * * *," Poole, supra, at 743; and may be the quid pro quo for the union's agreement to withdraw its unfair labor practice charges. Vantran, supra, at 924. See Straus Communications, Inc. v. NLRB, 625 F.2d 458, 463 (2d Cir. 1980); NLRB v. All Brand Printing Corp., 594 F.2d 926, 931 (2d Cir. 1979).

B. Loss of Majority

We conclude that the ALJ erred, on this record, in finding that the company's withdrawal of recognition of the union violated the Act. First, the record shows that on March 25, 1977 SGG employed 29 permanent striker replacements hired during the strike, and the strikers numbered only 22. Counting all these employees, it is clear that the replacements constituted a majority. Not only are such replacements not presumed to support the union whose picket lines they have been crossing, but in this case the great majority of the replacements testified that they in fact wanted nothing to do with Local 1516 and preferred a nonunion shop. Absent countervailing factors or the operation of some doctrine of estoppel, this objective numerical fact alone is sufficient to support the company's withdrawal of recognition of the union.

No such countervailing factors or constraints are present here. In contrast to the situation condemned in cases like Medo and Frick, supra, the company's unfair labor practices, discussed above, cannot be said to have caused the union's loss of majority. Rather, the strike and the company's lawful hiring of permanent striker replacements did so. The union took the risk that the strikers would be permanently replaced, and knew replacements were being hired starting in May, 1976. Having failed in its attempt to clothe its strike in the "protective garment" of an unfair labor practice strike, cf. NLRB v. Colonial Haven Nursing Home, supra, 742 F.2d at 706, the union must accept the consequences of its actions.

Furthermore, as noted above, there has been no showing that the company's actions, including those found to be unfair labor practices, were motivated by antiunion animus. Here, the majority issue was not, in the language of the Burroughs decision relied on by the ALJ, "raised in the context of unfair labor practices by the Employer designed to cause disaffection with" or undermine the Union's support. 180 NLRB at 332. There is no evidence that any of the four unfair labor practices that we have affirmed affected union support among either the strikers or the replacements, except for the supervisor assault, which actually enhanced union support among the strikers.

C. The Settlement Agreement

We turn next to the settlement agreement, relied on by the ALJ, under the Poole Foundry rationale, as an added reason for barring the company from refusing to bargain on March 25. That agreement, signed by the parties on February 4, 1977 and approved by the Board's Regional Director on March 4, 1977, pertained to the union's December 17, 1976 charge regarding the information refusal. The posting notice issued pursuant to the settlement agreement stated in substance that the company would (a) not refuse to bargain collectively with the union, (b) furnish the union with the requested information "pertaining to all employees performing bargaining unit work," and (c) offer reinstatement to any striker not permanently replaced before December 9, 1976 and discharge if necessary any replacements hired between December

1112

9 and the date of compliance with the settlement agreement.[51] No bargaining sessions were held between the time of the settlement agreement and the withdrawal of recognition on March 25, 1977, although the parties did exchange letters regarding the reinstatement request. The settlement agreement was revoked by the Regional Director on June 14, 1977 following his investigation of two of the union's subsequent charges. The company, pursuant to the settlement agreement, furnished the specified information and hired no more striker replacements.

---

[51] The record indicates that none of the 29 permanent replacements referred to above was hired on or after December 9, 1976.

The company argues that the Board could not rely on the settlement agreement, which the Board itself voided, as the basis for holding the company in violation of the Act. This argument has merit. As a matter of fairness, as well as basic legal principles, the Board in its discretion may elect either to rely upon the agreement and apply sanctions for its violation, including specific enforcement of the agreement to bargain, or it may void the agreement and prosecute the alleged underlying violations. It cannot set aside the agreement, reinstating the previous charges against the employer, and at the same time order compliance in the future with a promise in the voided agreement. Here, the company's obligations under the settlement agreement terminated June 14, 1977. Once the Board elected to revoke its approval of the settlement and proceed to prosecute the underlying charge, it lost the option to enforce terms of the voided agreement. It would be fundamentally unfair to allow the Board to disregard the settlement and compel the company to defend against the information refusal charge, and simultaneously to rely on the settlement to compel the company to bargain when it otherwise would have had no obligation to do so. The Board's action in setting aside the settlement agreement distinguishes the present case from Poole, All Brand, and Straus, supra, where settlement agreements were held to bar the employer's withdrawal of recognition.

We note also the effect of a bargaining order at the present time as a remedy for the company's failure to bargain with the union between March 9 and June 14, 1977. The likely results of this remedy are either to compel the parties to engage in several more months of futile negotiations (accompanied no doubt by a spate of additional unfair labor practice charges and further litigation), or to force unwanted representation upon the current SGG employees (at least pending an election).[52] Even if an agreement were reached between the company and the union, it is unlikely that it would be of any immediate benefit to the replaced strikers. Beyond the in terrorem effect of such results on future employers who are thinking of withdrawing recognition of a union (or considering whether to enter into a settlement agreement including a bargaining provision), we fail to see how a bargaining order in this case would serve the public interest in harmonious labor-management relations. Absent an appropriate reason for doing so—e.g., to remedy the employer's previous antiunion conduct or genuine refusal to bargain in good faith—we decline to enforce the Board's bargaining order. For these reasons, we hold that the company did not violate § 8(a)(5) and (1) by withdrawing its recognition of the union.

XIII.

ALJ Bias and Credibility Determinations

Absent some showing of abuse, the ALJ is presumed free from bias. His findings on credibility will not be disturbed where the choice is among conflicting testimony or where some adequate reason is given for discrediting a witness. E.g., NLRB v. Moore Business Forms, Inc., 574 F.2d 835, 843 (5th Cir. 1978).

It is true, as petitioners observe, that the ALJ consistently credited union witnesses (particularly Dolbow) and discredited company witnesses (particularly Levenson) whenever their testimony conflicted as to the events at the various bargaining sessions.[53] However, we find no merit in petition-

---

[52] The latter problem was acknowledged, but determined not to have controlling significance, in Poole and All Brand, supa.

[53] The ALJ's overall evaluation of the respective credibility of Dolbow and Levenson and the factors on which his conclusions were based are set forth in the following passage:

> By far the greater amount of testimony concerning the actual bargaining was adduced by Walter Dolbow and Alan J. Levenson * * *. Walter Dolbow impressed me as an honest witness who was attempting to remember as best he could the events which occurred at each of a long series of negotiating meetings which ended almost a year prior to his appearance as a witness. Considering the fact that Dolbow testified entirely without the use of notes, he displayed a remarkable ability to remember detail, and, except where otherwise indicated, was a credible witness for the General Counsel. Alan J. Levenson, Esq., on the other hand displayed a poor independent memory concerning what transpired at the bargaining table, despite his status as the Respondent's chief negotiator and labor relations counsel, and found it necessary, for the most part, to rely on notes while testifying about the bargaining sessions. In addition, as did his father Mayo Levenson, Esq. when he testified, Levenson frequently departed from a precise exposition of the facts, and launched into self serving speeches concerning his thought processes and conclusionary assertions about Respondent's good intentions. In addition, when serving at the hearing in the other of his dual capacities as Respondent's chief trial counsel, Levenson adduced much testimony from important witnesses for the Respondent including Charles Soule, Edward Churchill, and Andrew Soule, through the re-ers' allegation that the record demonstrates that bias of the ALJ against the company deprived them of a fair trial. The ALJ may credit the General Counsel's witnesses in preference to those of the employer, Banner Biscuit Co. v. NLRB, 356 F.2d 765, 768 (8th Cir. 1966), and here the ALJ gave adequate reasons for the majority of his credibility determinations. Although the record and the ALJ's decision do at times appear to indicate a certain hostility or impatience by the ALJ toward the company and its counsel, cf. Medline Industries, Inc. v. NLRB, 593 F.2d 788, 795 (7th Cir. 1979); Caribe General Electric Inc. v. NLRB, 357 F.2d 664, 665–66 (1st Cir. 1966), we find no indication that this apparent attitude in any way affected the fairness of the hearing or the integrity of the record.

As the length of this opinion indicates, many of the issues were close ones. The facts that the ALJ found for the General Counsel and against the company in all but one instance (the firing of David Bates) and that we have reversed a number of those findings do not, without more, show bias. Notwithstanding the protestations of a disappointed litigant, "rejection of an opposed view, even if total, 'cannot of itself impugn the integrity of a trier of fact.'" NLRB v. Phaostron Instrument & Electronic Co., 344 F.2d 855, 859 (9th Cir. 1965); see NLRB v. Superior Sales, Inc., 366 F2d 229, 233 (8th Cir. 1966).

XIV.

The Nature of Review in This Case

This case does not present issues of first impression. Nor is it a case where the court has reached out and intruded upon responsibilities assigned to the Board. We would have been happy to defer had the Board, applying its day-to-day familiarity with the labor law, arrived at its own findings explained by analysis of the issues and the evidence. Instead, the Board summarily affirmed the ALJ's decison, with only a single minor modification of the resulting order. Surely in some instances an ALJ's decision merits summary affirmance. This was not such a case.

The need for full examination of the issues and the evidence in this case has necessarily led us to review comprehensively the decisions in numerous areas of labor law. Our statements of the law in these areas are not an effort to revise or reshape the existing law. They are meant only to indicate the bases upon which we have proceeded in resolving the issues before us. There is always some risk that such extensive statements of the law may later be seized upon as fraught with significance in contexts for which they were not framed. We explicitly state that we do not regard our summaries of the law in these various areas as exhaustive, much less as intended to supersede or modify the underlying precedent in this Circuit and elsewhere.

XV.

Remedy

Under section 10(c) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(c), the Board has broad discretion in fashioning appropriate remedies which will "effectuate the policies of this [Act]." Where the Board has found a party guilty of an unfair labor practice and that finding is affirmed, the reviewing court is required to grant great deference to the Board's remedial order and will not disturb it "unless it can be shown that the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act." Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. NLRB, 319 U.S. 533, 540, 63 S.Ct. 1214, 1220, 87 L.Ed. 1568 (1943); Fibreboard, supra, 379 U.S. at 216, 85 S.Ct. at 405. However, it is also plainly true that where the court reverses the un-peated use of leading questions supplying answers relating to crucial issues, despite admonishments from the bench. I have thoroughly and carefully considered all of the above factors in writing the Decision, particularly concerning the findings of fact relating to Respondent's conduct during the negotiations.

Although we decline to disturb the ALJ's credibility determinations, we note that (a) on the first day of the hearing the ALJ told Levenson he was permitted to ask Charles Soule leading questions; (b) Dolbow did have "notes on every meeting," which the ALJ explicitly permitted Dolbow "to utilize * * * while testifying concerning the negotiating sessions" in order to refresh his recollection, and Dolbow did consult and refer to his notes at several points in the record; (c) Dolbow's testimony was not free of self-serving statements, including a categorical denial of any knowledge of any violence by strikers against the company or any mention of the subject during the negotiations ("The only violence I know of was caused by you people up in Bangor * * *.") and asserting legal conclusions regarding the company's unilateral" actions; and (d) the ALJ became increasingly impatient and irritated with Levenson's slow interrogation of witnesses, and on several occasions reprimanded Levenson for delaying the proceedings.

derlying unfair labor practice finding, the corresponding remedy will not be enforced. Also, it is implict in "abuse of discretion" review that the remedy must be in reasonable proportion to the violation; a de minimis, technical, or marginal violation of the Act cannot properly support a broad, draconian remedy.

In this opinion we have sustained four of the Board's findings of unfair labor practices: the wage increase, § 8(a)(1); the supervisor strike misconduct, § 8(a)(1); the unilateral transfer of bargaining unit work to SGR, § 8(a)(5) and (1); and the refusal to provide certain portions of the requested information, § 8(a)(5) and (1). We have held that the proved violations did not convert the strike, that the strikers were therefore economic strikers entitled only to preferential reinstatement whenever jobs become available, that the finding that the company was guilty of an unlawful course of conduct or overall bad faith bargaining was neither tried nor proved, and that the findings, that the company's acts were intended to disparage, undermine, or discriminate against the union and its adherents or were otherwise motivated by unlawful antiunion animus were not supported by substantial evidence.

In this context, we hold that the only appropriate remedies for the proved violations are a cease and desist order and an order for a posting notice. It is appropriate that the order include directives that the company cease and desist from the first two of the above unfair labor practices, and that it post notice of the type ordered by the Board, agreeing to do the same. The otherwise-justified provisions of the cease and desist order relating to the information refusal and diversion of bargaining unit work, and the corresponding affirmative remedial measures designed to benefit the union and restore the status quo ante (i.e., providing additional information and restoring the lost work to the bargaining unit) are and will remain moot unless the union regains its status as bargaining agent. However, in order that these violations of the Act not go wholly unredressed, we direct that the notice posted also disclose the Board's determination of the latter two violations.

We realize that those parts of the Board's order that we have found sustainable impose quite limited sanctions. Indeed, an objection may be voiced that what remains to be enforced will have little practical impact because, as a result of its unsuccessful economic strike, the union no longer has the status of collective bargaining representative. This is an outcome, however, which neither we nor the Board can properly avoid; it is a consequence of legally permissible economic conflict, not unfair labor practices.

For the above reasons, we enforce only the provisions of the Board's Order requiring petitioners to cease and desist from the following actions (with appropriate modifications and deletions to eliminate language inconsistent with this opinion):[54]

> (a) Assaulting employees because of their participation in a strike or other union or protected concerted activities.
> (b) Offering employees raises or other inducements to return to work and cease participating in a strike or other union or protected concerted activities.
> (e) Granting wage increased to other employees in excess of what is offered to * * * union members or supporters, where the timing and amount of such increases is reasonably calulated to communicate to union members or supporters that it does not pay to support a union or participate in union activities, or which otherwise tends to restrain, coerce or interfere with employees' freedom of choice as to unionization and other protected activities.

In addition, statements to the following effect shall be included in the notice to be posted by the company.

> In addition to the above, the Company has been found guilty of the following violations of the National Labor Relations Act against Glaziers Local Union 1516:
> (a) Unilaterally changing the type and amount of work of bargaining unit employees, by diverting outside glass replacement work to Soule Glass Replacement Company, without prior notice and bargaining.
> (b) Failing and refusing to furnish promptly to the union, on request, adequate relevant information concerning the wages and hours of striker replacement employees and others performing bargaining unit work, necessary to the performance of the union's function as collective-bargaining representative.

In all other respects enforcement of the Board's order is denied.

Windsor Woodworking, Inc. v. NLRB

647 F.2d 859 (8th Cir.), May 8, 1981—249 NLRB 289

On petition to review Board Order

Before LAY, Chief Judge, ROSS, Circuit Judge, and VAN PELT, District Judge*

ROSS, Circuit Judge: In this case Windsor Woodworking, Inc. (Windsor) of Des Moines, Iowa, petitions this court for review of orders of the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB or Board) dated May 5, 1980, and June 23, 1980, ordering Windsor to bargain collectively with Local Lodge No. 1513, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO (union). NLRB has cross-applied for enforcement of its orders. We grant enforcement and deny the petition for review.

A representation election was held on December 22, 1978, involving employees of Windsor. Of the 57 votes cast, 12 were challenged. The vote, excluding the challenged ballots, was 25 for the union and 20 against the union. The Board ordered 5 of the votes counted which resulted in a 25–25 tie. The Board then ordered a hearing on whether the other 7 challenged ballots should be counted. These 7 votes had been cast by individuals who had been "let go" by Windsor. The hearing was held on April 17, 1979. On August 7, 1979, the Board adopted the recommendation of the hearing officer that the 7 votes be counted. The recommendation was based on a factual finding that these seven individuals had a reasonable expectation of returning to work. Windsor claimed they had no such reasonable expectation, but the Board held to the contrary. Following certification of the union, the company refused to bargain. The Board granted the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment on an unfair labor practice complaint and a bargaining order was issued.

A. Petitioner's claims

In this appeal Windsor urges that the Board erred for the following reasons:

1. A year earlier five employees had been let go at about the same time of the year and none of them returned to work.
2. A new plant with increased efficiency, coupled with a slow period in the industry as a whole, made it unlikely that there would be a need for additional hiring.
3. Windsor's general manager was asked by the hearing officer this question and gave this answer: "Assuming the market place to expand at normal growth levels as you have experienced in the past, would you be able to operate with the labor force you have?" His response was, "At normal growth levels, I would say 'yes.'" Windsor claims this testimony was unrefuted but was not credited by the hearing officer without stating a reason.

4. The hearing officer did not place the burden of proof on the union nor did he resolve issues of credibility.
5. The Board granted the Regional Director's motion for summary judgment without considering the response of Windsor file on February 27, 1980, even though the order was not issued until May 5, 1980. Upon objection from Windsor, the Board refused to consider the response because, according to its records, it was filed seven days late.[1]

*The Honorable Robert Van Pelt, Senior United States District Judge, District of Nebraska, sitting by designation.

[1] Windsor's response was originally due on February 6, 1980, but upon Windsor's motion the time was extended to February 20 (according to the Board). Windsor claims to have received a telephoned telegraphic communication extending the time to February 28.

We find the Board's refusal to consider the response under these circumstances to be absolutely indefensible. We note in passing, the Board has waited on many occasions, including this case, until on or after the last day for filing before even requesting an extension of brief date on cases filed in this court. Apparently the Board has one set of rules for briefs filed with it and one set for filing briefs in this court. In this case, petitioner's brief was filed on November 4, 1980, and the Board's brief was not filed until December 22, 1980, even though it was due on December 3, 1980. The request for extension of time was not filed until December 5, 1980, and this court ordered the Board to file its brief by December 17, 1980. The brief was mailed on December 17, 1980, and received for filing on December 22, 1980.

The thrust of the response was to the effect that the union certified was different from the union defined in the complaint. It also alleged there was additional evidence which had been filed with the Board in August 1979 to the effect "there was not at the time of the complaint a reasonable expectation that any of the seven persons voting the remaining seven challenged ballots would be recalled to work." This included an affidavit of Mr. Carmichael dated August 7, 1979. Other arguments were made which Windsor had alread advanced.

The Board acknowledged the defect in identification of the union but indicated it was a technical error which would be corrected. We accept that explanation as reasonable. The failure to consider the additional evidence was error, but in our view would not have changed the result. This court has considered this additional evidence, including the affidavit of Carmichael stating that as of August 23, 1979, the number of workers had been reduced to 49 and would soon be reduced to 44. This change, eight months after the election and after the initial Board decision, does not affect the question of whether the seven employees who were "let go" could have reasonably expected to return to work as of the date of election. Compare NLRB v. D.H. Farms Co., 465 F.2d 1230, 1231 (6th Cir. 1972) (eligibility of laid off employees determined at pre election hearing, therefore, hearing should be held on conditions as of date of election based on new evidence submitted by employer). See also Kustom Electronics v. NLRB, 590 F.2d 817, 820–22 (10th Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Atkinson Dredging Co., 329 F.2d 158, 164 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 965, 84 S.Ct. 1647, 12 L.Ed.2d 736 (1964); NLRB v. Jesse Jones Sausage Co., 309 F.2d 664, 666 (4th Cir. 1962). The failure of Windsor to state to the seven employees that they were terminated rather than laid off is some indication that Windsor, at the very least, wanted to retain its options.

B. The Board's claims

In response to the claims made by petitioner, the Board urges that there is substantial evidence on the record as a whole to support the Board's determination and gives these reasons:

1. The Board is vested with wide discretion in conducting elections and our review must be limited to whether the Board reasonably exercised its discretion.

2. Whether the employees had a reasonable expectation of being recalled to work "depends on objective factors, including the past experience of the employer, the employer's future plans, and the circumstances of the layoff, including what the employees were told as to the likelihood of recall." (Citations omitted.)

3. The burden of proof was not on the union.

4. In a prior layoff of employees of Windsor in early 1977, all but one of the employees were recalled to work.

5. The company's business was seasonal in nature and the employees were "let go" at the start of the slow season and before the new plant was in full production.

6. The company did not tell the seven employees that they would not be recalled. Mr. Kenny claimed that two days after the layoff, General Manager Carmichael told him that he didn't know how long the layoff would last. There is other similar but inconclusive evidence in the record as to Gordon Bell and Stephen Earp.

7. The Board properly refused to consider Windsor's response to the motion for summary judgment because it was untimely filed.[2]

C. Conclusion

Our study of the briefs and the record convinces us that there was substantial evidence on the record as a whole to justify the Board's conclusion. In reaching this conclusion, we rely on the evidence relating to the claims of the Board set forth above in paragraphs 4, 5 and 6. Although this evidence was not conclusive, it certainly permitted the inference that the employees had a reasonable expectation of returning to work.

The Board's order is hereby enforced.

Universal Security Instruments, Inc. v. NLRB

649 F.2d 247 (4th Cir.), May 12, 1981; certiorari denied November 2, 1981—250 NLRB 661

On petition to review Board Order

Before HAYNSWORTH, Chief Judge, BUTZNER, Circuit Judge, and WILLIAMS, District Judge*

249

RICHARD L. WILLIAMS, District Judge: Universal Security Instruments, Inc. has petitioned this court to review a finding by the National Labor Relations Board of several violations of § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. The Board, through its General Counsel, has cross-petitioned for enforcement of its order and the union has intervened on behalf of the Board.

I. FACTUAL SETTING

The facts of this case were laid out in the Decision and Order of the Board and in the Administrative Law Judge's (ALJ) decision. See 250 NLRB No. 92 (1980). While we feel no need to repeat all that is printed there, we must, however, explain the factual setting of this case in some detail.

Universal was founded in 1969 and initially manufactured electromechanical sirens and other security equipment. After several years of working in small facilities, the company leased a plant in Baltimore, Maryland on Potee Street in 1971. In 1973 the Industrial Union of Marine & Shipbuilding Workers of America, AFL-CIO (the union), gained representation rights through a National Labor Relations Board conducted election. The union was to represent the production and maintenance workers at the Potee Street plant.

In August of that year the union and the company signed a three-year collective bargaining agreement. The agreement, among other things, contained a clause which recited that it was to cover all production and maintenance workers "at [Universal's] Baltimore, Maryland facility, at 2829 Potee Street * * *." The agreement also contained what was labelled a "Management Rights" clause which said that the union "recognizes that the Company shall have the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the management and operation of its business, * * * and the right to relocate its plant or any portion thereof." The collective bargaining agreement extended to August 1, 1979, and this agreement was in effect at all times material to this case.

At about the same time that the company and the union were negotiating and signing the original collective bargaining agreement covering the Potee Street plant, the company entered the electronics field by making electronic smoke detectors and sirens. This was an expanding market, and because of this expansion, Universal leased a warehouse on Hollins Ferry Road in order to step up the production of smoke detectors and other electronic equipment. Hollins Ferry Road, which began production in 1975, was about 2.7 miles away from the Potee Street facility.

Universal originally staffed the Hollins Ferry Road plant with employees from Potee Street, who would punch in at Potee Street and be driven to Hollins Ferry Road. Eventually Universal hired employees directly for assigned to Hollins Ferry Road. The company voluntarily applied the union dues check-off provision of the existing collective bargaining agreement to the Hollins Ferry Road employees. In May of 1976 Universal formally recognized the union as the collective bargaining representative of the workers at Hollins Ferry Road without requiring proof that the union represented a majority of the workers at that plant.

The company's markets continued to expand and by the spring and summer of 1977, 300 employees were working at the Hollins Ferry Road facility. However, all parties to this action agree, and both the ALJ and Board found, that the conditions at the Hollins Ferry Road plant were poor and both workers and management were dissatisfied with the facilities.[1] Because of these poor conditions, the company began to look for a new, better plant.

After considering several locations, Universal settled on a plant location at Owings Mills, Maryland, which was about 27 miles away from its other two facilities. This location was chosen because it was easily accessible by Baltimore public transportation and the company planned to hire from the Baltimore metropolitan area labor pool. In fact, one of the bus lines which served the Owings Mills plant also ran by the Potee Street plant, a factor which company officials considered to be positive.

*The Hon. Richard L. Williams, United States District Judge for the Eastern District of Virginia, sitting by designation.

[1] The ALJ on page 4 of his decision wrote:

> The ceilings were too high. Temperature and humidity could not be adequately controlled within and the employees were over-crowded. The Hollins Ferry Road facility was too hot in the summer and too cold in the winter. There was inadequate space for [Universal's] production operation. State and local authorities complained to [Universal] about fire hazards and inadequate sanitation.
> These conditions impaired plant operations. The overcrowded conditions in the plant production area caused [Universal] to move its research and quality control activity to a trailer. Further, these shortcomings caused poor productivity and poor product quality at the Hollins Ferry Road plant.

In March of 1977, Universal purchased the Owings Mills plant with the intention of using it to supplement its production facility at Hollins Ferry Road but not to replace that facility. Production began at Owings Mills in mid-September, 1977.

Although the company never informed the union formally of the impending expansion at Owings Mills, union members found out that the company was planning a new facility. They made several inquiries as to when the new plant was going to open and if the union would be recognized there, but these questions were never directly answered. In August or September of 1977 the site of the new plant was visited by union official and on or about September 12, 1977 the union requested that Universal recognize it as the bargaining representative of the employees of Owings. Mills. This request was denied by the company. After some organizational efforts by the union failed, the union filed a grievance against the company for denying this request. The General Counsel issued a complaint and notice of a hearing on January 6, 1978.

In early October, 1977, Universal officials decided that the Owings Mills plant, which was to be primarily staffed by newly hired employees, needed a certain number of experienced workers. Universal chairman Stephen Knepper authorized personnel director Robert O'Neill to recruit several Hollins Ferry Road employees for transfer to the new facility. O'Neill asked four Hollins Ferry Road workers if they would transfer to the new plant. He did not select the workers asked by seniority, but based the offers on recommendations by company management. Three of the four accepted the offer. At no time did the company notify the workers' bargaining representative that is was making these unilateral offers.

Again in late October the company offered transfers to 15 other Hollins Ferry Road employees, once again not selected on the basis of seniority. Twelve of these fifteen accepted the offer. The three who did not were laid off due to adverse business conditions.

By the end of September, 1977 Owings Mills and 65 production and maintenance employees, and by the end of October, 1977 the plant had 80 employees. Hollins Ferry Road at the same time had 200 and Potee Street about 50.

One of the 15 employees offered transfers in late October was Teresa Egitto. O'Neill informed her that she was laid off but could resume working at the Owings Mills plant. She testified that she was told that the work there would be the same, but that there was no union at the new facility and, because of this, the working conditions and benefits were better. She also claimed that O'Neill told her that if the employees at Owings Mills decided to have the union represent them, the working conditions at Owings Mills would deteriorate.

O'Neill also told several of the employees who had transferred that they would retain their seniority with the company for vacation purposes and other benefits, but that for layoffs, plant seniority would be the rule. Also, wages benefits and other terms and conditions of employment were different from that which was negotiated with the union and embodied in the collective bargaining agreement.

Because of various market problems, Universal began to experience serious setbacks in the smoke detector market, beginning at the end of October, 1977. These setbacks forced a general layoff which affected the employees of all three of the company's plants. This layoff was terminated in January of 1978, but the market setbacks, along with the inefficiency of the Hollins Ferry Road plant, made that facility unprofitable for the company. On February 1, 1978, Universal's director of operations Amadee Dean recommended to chairman Knepper that Hollins Ferry Road be closed down. The next day Knepper decided to follow this recommendation and began to plan for the plant's closure by the end of that month. On February 3, Kepper authorized O'Neill to offer transfers to Owings Mills to the Hollins Ferry Road employees. That same day O'Neill began making offers to the employees on a seniority basis. Each employee was asked to fill out a card acknowledging that the offer was made and indicating his or her decision on the offer. Those who refused transfers to Owings Mills were told that positions might not be open at Potee

Street, but that they would be placed on a preferential hiring list for that plant.

Seventy-two of the Hollins Ferry Road employees accepted the offer of transfer and thirty-one declined. Of the 31 who declined, two were given positions at Potee Street. The other 29 were laid off.

In addition to beginning the transfer process, the company also wrote to the union regarding the closure of the Hollins Ferry Road plant. In a letter dated February 3, 1978, a lawyer for the company wrote to union officials to inform them that "it will probably be necessary for the Comapny to close its Hollins Ferry Road * * * plant within the next few weeks * * *. [T]he Company is hereby offering to meet with you, at a mutually convenient time and place, to discuss all aspects of this matter, including, but not limited to, the impact that such closing would have upon the employees at that plant." That letter also informed the union that offers of transfer were going to be made "to as many of the Hollins Ferry Road plant employees as possible."

The first group of Hollins Ferry Road employees who accepted the transfers began to arrive for work at Owings Mills as early as February 8, 1978. they were told of the new health and wage improvements, which were different from those called for under the collective bargaining agreement They were also told of the change in the seniority system for layoffs. At this meeting O'Neill also told the transferees that no union would be recognized at the plant and, because of this, working conditions and benefits would be better than they were at Hollins Ferry Road.

The first of several meetings with union officials did not take place until February 14. The principal issue between the company and the union was whether or not the company planned to recognize the union as the bargaining representative at the new facility. The company steadfastly refused to do so. Some other minor topics were brought up, but apparently no major discussions were held on any other topics. The Hollins Ferry Road plant was closed permanently Februray 28, 1978.

The Board found that the production and maintenance employees at Owings Mills constituted an accretion to the bargaining unit at Potee Street and Hollins Ferry Road and, because of this, Universal had violated § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act [2] by refusing to recognize the union as the bargaining representative at Owings Mills and refusing to apply the terms of the collective bargaining agreement to the production and maintenance workers at that facility. The Board also found violations of these sections of the Act by Universal's unilateral transfer of unit working employees from Hollins Ferry Road to Owings Mills and by making offers of transfers to the employees without consulting and bargaining with the union. The Board also found that company's failure to bargain with the union over its decision to close the Hollins Ferry Road plant to be a violation of § 8(a)(5) of the Act and found that the company also failed to bargain with the union over the effects of that closing. The Board finally found that the company violated § 8(a)(1) by threatening employees with reprisals if they should try and have the union represent them at the new plant.

To remedy these violations the Board ordered:

(1) That the company cease and desist from these unfair labor practices and refrain from restraining empolyees in the exercise of their rights under § 7 of the Act;

(2) The company to recognize the union as the collective bargaining agent of the production and maintenance workers at Owings Mills, to apply the terms of the agreement to those employees retroactively, and to make the employees whole for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the unlawful refusal to apply the terms of the agreement to them;

(3) The company to bargain, upon request by the union, over the transfer of employees to the new plant, the closure of the Hollins Ferry Road plant, and the effects on employees of the plant closures;

(4) A limited back-pay award to be made to the 29 employees who were laid off after refusing transfers to Owings Mills;

[2] § 8(a) reads as follows:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the excercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7.

(5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees * * *.

(5) The company post appropriate notices at the Owings Mills facility and the Hollins Ferry Road plant, should that plant ever reopen.

Universal has asked this court to review the Board's decision and order and the Board has cross-petitioned for enforcement.

II. THE ACCRETION ISSUE

The Board found that Universal's Owings Mills plant constituted an accretion to the Hollins Ferry Road plant as of September 12, 1977, the approximate date on which the union representatives requested recognition of the union at Owings Mills.

" 'An accretion' occurs when new employees are added to an already existing [bargaining] unit." N.L.R.B. v. Sunset House, 415 F.2d 545, 547 (9th Cir. 1969). The additional employees are absorbed into the existing unit without first having an election "where these additional employees share a sufficient community of interest with the unit employees and have no separate identity. The additional employees are then properly governed by the unit's choice of bargaining representative." Lammert Indus. v. N.L.R.B., 578 F.2d 1223, 1225 n.3 (7th Cir. 1978).

If the employees hired and transferred to Owings Mills did constitute an accretion, Universal violated the Act by its failure to bargain, because it unilaterally changed wages, seniority and benefits—all unquestionably "terms and conditions of employment" within the meaning of § 8(d) of the Act[3]—of employees within a bargaining unit with which Universal already had a collective bargaining agreement. The company's duty to recognize the accretion is triggered by the request of the bargaining representative to negotiate. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 195 NLRB 767 (1972).

A finding of an accretion by the Board is similar to the Board's certifying a particular group of employees as an appropriate bargaining unit because in both the Board is using its expertise to determine the most appropriate mix of employees for a particular unit. N.L.R.B. v. R. L. Sweet Lumber Co., 515 F.2d 785, 794 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 986, 96 S.Ct. 393, 46 L.Ed.2d 302 (1975); N.L.R.B. v. Security-Columbian Banknote Co., 541 F.2d 135, 140–41 (3d Cir. 1976). And, just as when the Board certifies a unit, the Board's finding of an accretion is a matter which is generally committed to its discretion. N.L.R.B. v. R. L. Sweet Lumber Co., supra; Lammert Indus. v N.L.R.B., supra; N.L.R.B. v. Security-Columbian Banknote Co., supra. Thus, its finding "should not be set aside unless the reviewing court is convinced that the Board has acted in an arbitrary and capricious manner." N.L.R.B. v. R. L. Sweet Lumber Co., 515 F.2d at 794.

In making its determination the Board must closely analyze the circumstances of the workers to determine whether the new and old employees truly share a "community of interest." To do this several factors are scrutinized. These are: (1) similarity of working conditions; (2) job classification; (3) skills and functions; (4) similarity of products; (5) interchangeabililty of employees; (6) geographical proximity; (7) centralization of managerial control; Lammert Indus. v. N.L.R.B., 578 F.2d at 1225; (8) functional integration of the business; (9) collective bargaining history. *N.L.R.B. v. R. L. > In determining whether a group of employees represents an accretion to an existing unit the Board must consider unique and complex sets of facts in light of the somewhat conflicting policies of stability in bargaining relations, * * * and assurance to employees of the right to choose their own bargaining agents.

N.L.R.B. v. Food Employers Council, Inc., 399 F.2d 501, 504 (9th Cir. 1968) (citations omitted).

Chairman Knepper testified before the ALJ that Owings Mills was established to supplement Hollins Ferry Road's production of smoke detectors and that both plants produced the same product—the SS—200 model smoke detector—until the October 31 general layoff.

Also, workers were required to have similar skills at both plants, demonstrated by the fact that 15 Hollins Ferry Road employees were transferred in October, 1977 to Owings Mills to provide the new plant with experienced workers and to help train newly hired employees. Further, in February, 1978 Universal offered its workers at Hollins Ferry Road transfers to Owings Mills when the company closed down Hollins Ferry Road. Both of these factors tend to show that there were similar skills required at the two facililties.

[3] § 8(d) provides as follows:

For the purposes of this section, to bargain collectively is the performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agrreement, or any question arising thereunder, and the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party, but such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession * * *.

As for geographic proximity Owings Mills was about 27 miles away from Hollins Ferry Road. Despite this distance both plants drew their workers from the metropolitan Baltimore labor pool. In fact, Universal advertised for workers not only in suburban Baltimore newspapers but also in the Baltimore Sun. Also, Knepper chose the Owings Mills plant in part because of its proximity to a Baltimore city bus route which also ran past Potee Street.

A centralized management system controlled all three facilities. This included centralized control over production by director of operations Amadee Dean, who as part of his job established the qualifications for employees at Owings Mills. Also, the director of human relations, O'Neill, hired the new employees for Owings Mills and interviewed and transferred employees from Hollins Ferry Road to Owings Mills. He was in charge of hiring and firing and employee relations.

These factors relied upon by the Board show: (1) there was a similarity of skills required at Owings Mills and the other plants; (2) there was a similarity of product produced; (3) the new facility was geographically close to the other two facililties when the metropolitan area is viewed as a whole; and (4) management, and most importantly, employee relations, were centralized.

While the ALJ and the Board did not analyze all nine of the factors which have been identified in previous cases as helpful in making an accretion determination, those analyzed are certainly sufficient to show that the Board did not abuse its discretion in finding an accretion. There is no requirement that all of the listed factors be present, for to so require would be to hamstring the Board by requiring it to plug each unique case into an artificial test. The Board has a duty to "unearth[ ] the factors relevant to the accretion issue in the case under consideration * * * [and] then decide[ ] the relative weight to be attributed to each factor." Kaynard v. Mego Corp., 484 F.Supp. 167, 172 (E.D.N.Y.1980).

Universal argues to this court that the union did not represent a majority of the Owings Mills employees on the date it opened (September 19, 1977); when the union filed its grievance (November 8, 1977); on the date when the union filed its first unfair labor practice charge (November 17, 1977); when it amended the charge (December 9, 1977); or on the date the complaint issued in this case (January 6, 1978). The company's assertion is that newly hired employees at Owings Mills outnumbered those transferred from its other plants, and that the newly hired employees had never expressed a preference for union representation.

Universal's argument misses the mark. The important fact is that at the end of the summer of 1977, the number of employees in the bargaining unit at Potee Street and Hollins Ferry Road had risen to between 350 and 360. At the end of September, 1977, there were only 65 factory workers and 8 supervisors at Owings Mills. When an accretion occurs, the smaller group of employees is treated as if it were a group of newly hired employees replacing workers within the unit. Replacement employees are presumed to support the unit in the same ratio as those replaced. Lammert Indus. v. N.L.R.B., 578 F.2d at 1226. Because of the "community of interest" found in this case, this smaller group at Owings Mills automatically became part of the bargaining unit.

The accretion doctrine is applied more restrictively when the new group of employees is larger than the original unit. "[T]he Board is cautious in making such a finding, particularly when the accreted group numerically overshadows the existing certified unit, because it would deprive the larger group of employees of their statutory right to select their own bargaining representative." Renaissance Center Partnership, 239 NLRB 1247, 1247–48 (1979). This, however, is not the case at bar. For the stated legitimate reasons the Board has found a smaller new group to be an accretion, and such was well within the Board's discretion. Since the Board was within its discretion when it found an accretion, it follows the Universal violated § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its refusal to recognize the union as the bargaining representative of the Owings Mills employees and its failure to apply the collective bargaining agreement to those employees.

It also follows that Universal violated § 8(a)(5) and (1) by unilaterally changing term and conditions of employment of employees subject to a collective bargaining agreement. Universal's bargaining obligation is defined by § 8(d) of the Act. That section provides, in summary, that neither party to a collective bargaining agreement can unilaterally modify the agreement without first serving written notice and offering to negotiate.[4] When a specific item is included in a collective bargaining agreement, any unilateral change, therefore, violates the duty defined by § 8(d) and made unlawful by § 8(a)(5) and (1). N.L.R.B. v. Baltimore News American Division, 590 F.2d 554 (4th Cir. 1979).

Since Universal did not live up to the duty imposed by § 8(d) and enforced by § 8(a), to provide written notice and to offer to negotiate, the Board was supported by substantial evidence when it concluded that Universal violated the Act by altering the conditions of employment for the employees at Owings Mills, including the transferees.

III. THE CLOSING OF HOLLINS FERRY ROAD

The Board found that Universal had also violated § 8(a)(5) of the Act by failing to bargain over both the decision to close the Hollins Ferry Road plant, and the effects that closure would have on the unit members working there. This involves two separate questions which will be addressed individually.

A. The Decision.

An employer is required "to confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment." Section 8(d). Section 8(a)(5) makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to refuse to bargain collectively with the representative of his employees * * *." These sections together make it an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to bargain in good faith over "wages, hours [and] * * * terms and conditions of employment," and these subjects are considered to be mandatory subjects over which the parties cannot lawfully refuse to bargain. N.L.R.B. v. Wooster Div. of Borg-Warner Corp., 356 U.S. 342, 348–49, 78 S.Ct. 718, 722, 2 L.Ed.2d 823 (1958). Bargaining subjects which are not mandatory are permissive and may be bargained over, but a party can also refuse to so bargain. Id.

The Board has taken the position in this and other cases that an employer's decision to close one of its plants—a partial closing[5]—is a mandatory subject.[6]

The various circuit courts have not all agreed with the Board, with some holding that an economically motivated decision is not a mandatory subject,[7] while two circuits have recently adopted a theory that a partial closing is rebuttably presumed to be a mandatory bargaining subject.[8]

This court has yet to address this issue directly.

Universal claims, however, that no matter what the answer to this question is, the collective bargaining agreement it signed with the union gave the company the right to relocate its plant. The "management rights" clause in the agreement to which it points gave Universal the right to "relocate its plant or any portion thereof."[9]

Citing the Board's decision in Ador Corp., 150 NLRB 1658 (1965) and Consolidated Foods Corp., 183 NLRB 832 (1970), Universal claims that the clause demonstrates that the parties to the agreement bargained over how a relocation decision could be made and gave management the exclusive right to decide without further bargaining to move to Owings Mills.

[5] A "partial closing" is considered to be a closing of one or more facilities by the employer having more facilities than those which he is closing. Textile Workers' Union v. Darlington Mfg. Co., 380 U.S. 263, 275, 85 S.Ct. 994, 1002, 13 L.Ed.2d 827 (1965).

[9] Article XII of the collective bargaining agreement provides:

> The union recognizes that the Company shall have the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the management and operation of its business, the direction of its workforce, including the asignment of tasks and machines to employees, the right to maintain discipline and efficiency in this plant, the right to promulgate nd enforce reasonable working rules, the right to hire, discipline and discharge employees subject to the provisions of this Agreement, the right to establish starting times and quitting times, to establish or discontinue shifts, to assign employees to shifts, and the right to relocate its plant or any portion thereof. It is agreed that the rights enumerated above shall be deemed to exclude preexisting rights of management not herein listed to operate its business in the manner it sees fit, provided that they do not conflict with other provisions of this Agreement.

It is clear that a union can waive its right to bargain over a mandatory subject, but such waiver "must be clear and unmistakable." The Dow Chemical Co., 212 NLRB 333 (1974). "While it is true that a labor organization may enter into an agreement in which it waives the right to bargain about mandatory subjects of bargaining (wages, hours, etc.) such waiver * * * will not readily be implied." R.L. Sweet Lumber Co., 207 NLRB 529, 538 (1973).

The Board found that the "management rights" clause in the agreement between Universal and the union did not clearly and unmistakably cover the transfer of employees in unit work from Hollins Ferry Road to Owings Mills. We agree. At the time of Owings Mills' opening it was not a relocation as that term is normally used. It was hoped that the plant would supplement the ongoing operations at Potee Street and Hollins Ferry Road.[10] The accretion occurred September 12, 1977 and the first transfer of employees from Hollins Ferry Road to Owings Mills did not occur until October. Until the decision to close Hollins Ferry Road was made on February 2, 1978, Universal intended to operate—and did operate—all three plants. Thus it is clear that the closing of Hollins Ferry Road was not a pure relocation and was nothing more than a partial closing. In no way can the union be said to have clearly and unmistakably waived its perceived right to demand bargaining over the closing. That the closing of Hollins Ferry Road occurred only a few months after the opening of Owings Mills does not obviate this fact.

In finding that the union had not waived its rights and that Universal had unlawfully failed to bargain over the closing decision, the ALJ ordered Universal to bargain with the union over the decision to close the plant—a decision which was irrevocably made in 1978. Since that time the plant has been abondoned by Universal and its lease on the property has long since expired. Bargaining over the decision to close, therefore, would accomplish nothing for the bargaining unit members. The Board has recognized before that when a plant has already been closed for economic reasons, and a bargaining order would not change that fact, such an order is inappropriate. In Burroughs Corp., 214 NLRB 571 (1974), the employer did not contest a finding that it had violated the Act by failing to bargain over a decision to close, but contested the accompanying bargaining order because its lease had expired and its equipment removed from the plant. The Board refused to order bargaining, saying, "as the plant was closed for economic reasons and has been closed for some time, we do not believe any useful purpose would be served by requiring further bargaining with respect to the decision to close the plant." Id. at n.4.

We agree with this conclusion and apply it to this case. No useful purpose could possibly be served by a bargaining order requiring the parties to negotiate a foregone conclusion over three years after the fact.

This decision not to enforce this portion of the order can be said to be putting the cart before the horse since we have not yet settled the question of whether or not a partial closing decision is indeed a mandatory subject of bargaining. We are aware of the Supreme Court's holding in Ford Motor Co. v. N.L.R.B., 441 U.S. 488, 99 S.CT. 1842, 60 L.Ed.2d 420 (1979), in which the Court wrote that the Board's judgment as to what is a mandatory bargaining subject is entitled to considerable deference." 441 U.S. at 495, 99 S.CT. at 1848, and that "the judgment of the Board is subject to judicial review; but if its construction of the statute is reasonably defensible, it should not be rejected merely because the court might prefer another view of the statute." 441 U.S. at 497, 99 S.Ct. at 1849.

In this case, however, since we have specifically rejected the remedy ordered by the Board, we need not make a detailed analysis of the Board's judgment on the closing decision. Furthermore, we are convinced that establishing a rule for the judicial circuit would be of minimal value anyway since the Supreme Court has recently decided to review this issue. N.L.R.B. v. First National Maintenance Corp., 627 F.2d 596 (2d Cir. 1980), cert. granted, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 854, 66 L.Ed.2d 798 (1981).

[10] Universal's labor counsel, Earle K. Shawe, testified before the ALJ that the Owings Mills plant was to supplement Universal's other plants rather than to serve as a relocation of the Hollins Ferry Road plant.

Enforcement of this portion of the order is, therefore, denied.

B. Closing Effects.

Although there may be conflicting opinions as to whether an employer has a duty to bargain over a partial closing decision, it is clear that an employer must bargain with the union over the effects of that decision on the bargaining unit members. N.L.R.B. v. North Carolina Coastal Motor

Universal does not question its duty to bargain over the effects of its decision, but challenges the Board's conclusion that it did not bargain in good faith over the effects. The company points to its February 3, 1978 letter to the union inviting it to "discuss all aspects" of the closing, "including, but not limited to, the impact that such a closing would have upon employees at the plant." In that letter to the union it said it intended to offer employment to as many Hollins Ferry Road employees as possible at the new plant.

Several meetings between Universal officials and union representatives were held in February, at which meetings the principal bone of contention was the union's request that the company recognize the union voluntarily as the exclusive bargaining representative of the production and maintenance workers at the Owings Mills plant—a request the company consistently denied. Other specific problems were discussed, although no discussions were held on general problems associated with the transfer, such as servance pay and seniority questions. Universal claims that it stood willing to discuss these issues but the union never brought them up, thus waiving its right to complain later.

The Board concluded that these meetings were insufficient to satisfy the company's duty because they came to late for effective bargaining to take place. We believe the Board's conclusion is supported by substantial evidence.

The decision to close Hollins Ferry Road was made on February 2, 1978. The letter to union officials, dated February 3, 1978, stated that it would "probably" be necessary to close the plant "within the next few weeks." Meanwhile, however, the company began to make offers to transfer to the Hollins Ferry Road employees on February 3, 1978 and completed this process in just a few days, well before the first meeting with the union. Following interviews with each employee, Universal's O'Neill asked each employee to sign a form reciting that the employee had been offered a transfer and to fill out whether or not the offer was accepted.

The transfers began almost immediately. At least some of the former Hollins Ferry Road employees gathered at Owings Mills February 8, 1978, where they were told of the different wages and health benefits there, as well as the change in the seniority status for layoffs. This occurred almost a week before the first meeting with union officials.

In short, the mechanics of the transfer were well in motion by February 14, with many of the areas which could be expected to be bargained over—transfer, wages, seniority, etc.—having already been determined unilaterally.

In N.L.R.B. v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 82 S.CT. 1107, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962), the employer had instituted several unilateral changes in mandatory bargaining areas while the matters were under negotiation with the union, with some of the changes being more advantageous to employees than those the employer offered the bargaining representative. In that case the Court wrote:

> Unilateral action by an employer without prior discussion with the union does amount to a refusal to negotiate about affected conditions of employment under negotiation, and must of necessity obstruct the bargaining, contrary to the congressional policy. It will often disclose an unwillingness to agree with the union. It will rarely be justified by any reason of substance.

The Court went on to say that this type of action was "necessarily inconsistent with a sincere desire to conclude an agreement with the union." 369 U.S. at 745, 82 S.Ct. at 1112.

The Board's policy is that even if the unilateral action is beneficial to the employees the employer is not free to bypass the bargaining representative. Wellman Indus., Inc., 222 NLRB 204 (1976). In that case the Board said that such unilateral action is unlawful because whether or not an offer is beneficial is a matter of opinion, is relative depending upon the employees' alternatives, and places the employer in a position of making choices for employees which are to be made by the bargaining representative. Id. at 206.

In light of the sequence of events which occurred even before the first meeting with the union on February 14, it is clear that Universal had unilaterally made choices for its employees which should have been presented to the bargaining representative. The union's position was undercut by the time negotiations began. Universal's actions were clearly contrary to the spirit of the Act and the Board correctly found them to be so.

Universal's claim that by offering employment to the Hollins Ferry Road employees it removed the most central issue from the negotiations misses the point. The Act condemns such unilateral acts. The transfer offers should have been presented to the union to enable the union to negotiate as to the timing and the manner of the transfers, as well as any other effects with which it was concerned.

IV. UNIVERSAL'S THREATS

The Board's findings that the company's threats of reprisals if Owings Mills employees sought union representation is clearly supported by substantial evidence. Universal, while citing this as error, does not strenuously argue the point.

Universal's O'Neill warned employees Egitto that if the employees attempted to gain union representation at Owings Mills, the working conditions at that plant would deteriorate to the level at Hollins Ferry Road. These same comments were substantially repeated to the group of transferees from Hollins Ferry Road who gathered at the Owings Mills plant on February 8, 1978.

Such conduct violates the spirit of the Act, intimidating employees from exercising their right to organize as guaranteed by § 7 of the Act. N.L.R.B. v. Renner, Plumbing Heating & Air Conditioning, Inc., 437 F.2d 893 (4th Cir. 1971). N.L.R.B. v. Aerovox Corp. of Myrtle Beach, S.C. 435 F.2d 1208 (4th Cir. 1970).

Universal does not challenge this legal conclusion. It does however challenge the factual findings by the ALJ and confirmed by the Board, that the O'Neill/Egitto exchange ever took place. O'Neill denied the exchange when he testified.

The ALJ specifically cited the discrepancies in Egitto's and O'Neills testimony and where they did conflict the ALJ credited Egitto's He did so based on demeanor and apparent conflicts between O'Neill's testimony and other evidence.

Universal has presented us with no sufficient reason to disturb this finding by the ALJ. The company's claim that O'Neill's testimony is buttressed by the fact that Egitto's was only one of hundreds of conversations O'Neill had with Hollins Ferry Road employees and no other employee testified to a similar conversation, in no way tends to suggest that that particular conversation did not take place. In fact, it could be said that with that many conversations compressed into a relatively short time, O'Neill might tend to forget the details of each one. Universal also says that there was no evidence that the company in any way mistreated its Hollins Ferry Road employees. However, there was evidence—evidence which the company does not dispute—that Hollins Ferry Road was inefficient, cold in the winter, hot in the summer, and overcrowded. While these conditions may not constitute mistreatment, employees transferring to Owings Mills no doubt would prefer more pleasant working conditions.

One of the ALJ's functions is to make factual findings. He did so and his findings are supported by substantial evidence. The fact that he credited one witness over another is no reason to disturb the findings since it is his job to determine what is fact when presented with a conflict.

V. THE BACK-PAY AWARD

Universal claims that the portion of the Board's order which requires it to pay back wages to the 29 employees who lost their jobs with the company after declining transfers from Hollins Ferry Road to Owings Mills—which the Board called a "limited" back-pay order—is unwarranted by the facts of the case and punitive in nature.

Before addressing the merits of this issue, however, we must address a procedural matter. The General Counsel for the Board claims that Universal is precluded from challenging this remedy since the company failed to request a reconsideration of the Board's award. It cites the Board's Rules found at 29 CFR § 102.48(d)(1) and (3) for the proposition that a party must move for reconsideration or rehearing when an alleged error arises in the first instance as a result of the Board's decision. Universal having failed to make such a motion, the General Counsel claims the rules bar Universal from objecting on this appeal.

Section 102.48(d)(1) provides:

> A party to a proceeding before the Board may, because of extraordinary circumstances, move for reconsideration, rehearing, or reopening of the record as to the Board's decision or order. A motion for reconsideration shall state with particularity the material error claimed. * * *.

Section 102.48(d)(3) provides:

> The filing and pendency of a motion under this provision shall not operate to stay the effectiveness of the action of the Board unless so ordered. A motion for reconsideration or rehearing need not be filed to exhaust administrative remedies.

The General Counsel cites International Ladies Garment Workers' Union, Upper South Department, AFL-CIO v. Quality Mfg. Co., 420 U.S. 276, 281 n.3, 95 S.Ct. 972, 975 n.3, L.Ed.2d 189 (1975) to support this position. In that case the Supreme Court wrote that § 102.48(d)(1) precluded appeal when the Board adopted a theory not previously charged or litigated. The General Counsel also cited N.L.R.B. v. Erlich's 814, Inc., 577 F.2d 68, 69 n.2 (8th Cir. 1978); N.L.R.B. v. STR, Inc., 549 F.2d 641 (9th Cir. 1977); N.L.R.B. v. Allied Products Corp., 548 F.2d 644, 652–54 (6th Cir. 1977).

We disagree with the General Counsel's position. The cases he cites are cases in which for some reason the Board issued a decision or an order which did not correspond to the issues and facts fully litigated before it. For instance, in the STR case, the court wrote at 642: "The complaint gave the Company more than ample notice that the Board would be examining the circumstances of [the] departure." In the Allied Products Corp. case the court wrote:

> Extraordinary circumstances for these purposes exist only if there has been some occurrence or decision that prevented a matter which should have been presented to the Board from having been presented at the proper time.

It appears clear from these and other cases that the Board regulation is designed for cases in which the Board surprises a party with matters which were not fully presented and litigated before the Board. In a case in which the parties have been made aware that an issue would or could be decided by the Board, and the parties have taken the chance to present their sides of the issue to the Board and the Board has issued its decision, the failure to request reconsideration under the regulation does not bar the losing party from citing the issue on appeal.

In issuing its back-pay order, the Board did not catch these parties by surprise. The ALJ had previously ordered the company to pay these 29 employees back wages and the company cited this finding in its exceptions to the ALJ's decision. From the record before us it appears clear that the parties fully litigated this issue and the failure on the part of Universal to move for reconsideration by the Board does not preclude it from citing the Board's order on appeal.

Despite specifically finding that Universal did not act discriminatorily towards these employees, the Board issued its "limited" back-pay award to make the employees whole and "in order to recreate in some practical manner the situation in which the parties' bargaining position is not entirely devoid of economic consequences for [Universal]." While the Board enjoys broad discretion in fashioning remedies, N.L.R.B. v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 73 S.Ct.287, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953), and a back-pay award "should stand unless [it is] * * * a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act," Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. N.L.R.B., 319 U.S. 533, 540, 63 S.Ct. 1214, 1218, 87 L.Ed. 1568 (1943), its order must be appropriate " 'and shall be adapted to the situation which calls for redress.' " N.L.R.B. v. District 50, UMW, 355 U.S. 453, 78 S.Ct. 386, 2 L.Ed.2d 401 (1958), quoting N.L.R.B. v. Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., 304 U.S. 333, 348, 58 S.Ct. 904, 912, 82 L.Ed. 1381 (1938). See also, Local 60, United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners of America, AFL-CIO v. N.L.R.B., 365 U.S. 651, 81 S.Ct. 875, 6 L.Ed.2d 1 (1961).

Many of the cases in which the Board has awarded employees back-pay in a partial closing context are cases in which the employees were laid off and given no other employment opportunities by their former employer. See, e. g., P. B. Mutrie Transportation, Inc., 226 NLRB 1325 (1976); Thompson Transport Co., Inc., 184 NLRB 38 (1970); or when the laid off employees were found to have been discriminated against. Purolator Products, Inc., 160 NLRB 80 (1966).

The record in this case discloses that all 29 of these workers were offered transfers to Owings Mills. For reasons of their own, they declined the transfers. After declining, they were put on a preferential hiring list at Potee Street. Furthermore, the Board specifically rejected the ALJ's conclusion that these 29 employees had been unlawfully discriminated against.

Given these facts, we believe a back-pay award is inappropriate in this case. We fully recognize that Universal violated the Act by its failure to bargain over the effects of its closure decision and by offering these transfers unilaterally. However, placing these 29 employees on a preferential hiring list is all that is needed to vindicate the policies of the Act. A back-pay award, in our judgment, is not "adapted to the situation which calls for redress."

We therefore decline to enforce this portion of the Board's order.

VI. CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated, therefore, we enforce the Board's order except for those portions which require Universal to bargain with the union over its decision to close the Hollins Ferry Road plant and which would require the company to make a back-pay award to the 29 employees laid off after refusing transfers.

Reichart Furniture Company v. NLRB

649 F.2d 397 (6th Cir.), May 13, 1981; rehearing denied July 9, 1981—238 NLRB 1578

On petition to review and cross-petition to enforce Board Order

Before EDWARDS, Chief Judge, and ENGEL and MERRITT, Circuit Judges

397

PER CURIAM: On receipt and consideration of a petition for review and a cross-application for enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board cited at 238 N.L.R.B. 1578 (1978), this court notes that the threshold question in this case is whether or not the Board erred in overruling the Company's objections to the validity of the representation election at which the Union [1] prevailed by a vote of 15 to 9.

Subequent to the election, the Company filed timely objections as to which the Regional Director conducted an administrative investigation, affording the Company full opportunity to proffer proof supporting the allegations and to provide additional information and clarification to aid in the Board's own investigation. Subsequent thereto, the Regional Director issued his report overruling the objections in their entirey and recommending that the Board certify the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the Company's employees. The Company thereupon filed timely exceptions to the Regional Director's report and sought a hearing on its objections. After considering the Regional Director's report and the Company's exceptions, affidavits and documents in support of its exceptions and its brief, the Board adopted the Regional Director's findings, conclusions and recommendations and certified the Union as the bargaining representative of the Company's employees.

Thereafter, the Union requested bargaining, which the Company refused, and the present unfair labor practice charge was filed contending that the Company's refusal to bargain violated Sections 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act. The Board specifically held that issues not raised by the Company in the prior representation proceeding were not "properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding." 238 N.L.R.B. at 1579. Further, the Board reaffirmed its determination in the representation proceeding that the Comapany had failed to raise "substantial or material issues warranting a hearing" (id.) and granted summary judgment requiring the Company to cease and desist from refusing to bargain with the Union or continue to violate the National Labor Relations Act.

[1] The contesting parties in the election were respectively the Retail Clerks International Union, AFL-CIO (the Union) and the Independent Furniture Workers of the Ohio Valley or Tri-State Area (the Intervenor).

On examination of the briefs and record in this case, the court holds the Board was acting within its appropriate discretion in denying a hearing since no challenge to the election advanced by the Company presented a substantial challenge to the fairness of the election. In NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., 379 F.2d 172, 177, 178 (6th Cir.1967), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 958, this court said:

> It is incumbent upon the party seeking a hearing to clearly demonstrate that factual issues exist which can only be resolved by an evidentiary hearing. The exceptions must state the specific findings that are controverted and must show what evidence will be presented to support a contrary finding or conclusion. Mere disagreement with the Regional Director's reasoning and conclusions do[es] not raise "substantial and material factual issues." This is not to say that a party cannot except to the inferences and conclusions drawn by the Regional Director, but that such disagreement, in itself, cannot by the basis for demanding a hearing. To request a hearing a party must, in its exceptions, define its disagreements and make an offer of proof to support findings contrary to those of the Regional Director. The Board is entitled to rely on the report of the Regional Director in the absence of specific assertions of error, substantiated by offers of proof.

These principles have never been overruled in this court and in fact were reaffirmed in Prestolite Wire Division v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 302, 306 (6th Cir.1979).

As this court sees this record, it fails to present facutal issues and offers of proof thereon which demand and evidentiary hearing before the Board. This conclusion serves to distinguish this case from Prestolite Wire, supra, and NLRB v. North Electric Co., 644 F.2d 580 (6th Cir.1981).

Merritt, Circuit Judge, concurring: I agree with the result reached by the Court in this case, but I do not think the opinion adequately articulates the distinction between this case and Prestolite Wire Division v. N.L.R.B., 592 F.2d 302 (6th Cir.1979); N.L.R.B. v. Curtis Noll Corp., 634 F.2d 1027 (6th Cir.1980) and N.L.R.B. v North Electric Company, Plant No. 10, 644 F.2d 580 (6th Cir.1981). In those cases this Court suggested that the N.L.R.B.'s own rules appear to require, and due process demands, that where a substantial question is raised by an employer regarding the fairness of a representation proceeding, the Regional Director must include in the record transmitted to the Board "documentary evidence" gathered by the Regional Director in connection with his investigation. Section 102.69(g) states that "the Regional Director shall transmit the record to the Board," and that the record shall include "documentary evidence" in addition to certain other papers. In N.L.R.B. v. North Electric Co., supra, we rejected "the Board's position that it does not have to review the documentary evidence" stating that this position is "an abdication of its responsibilities under the National Labor Relations Act." (P. 584). This is the position of our Court stated in Prestolite and Curtis Noll as well.

I would not enforce this principle in the present case, however, because the company's arguments are insubstantial and in most instances frivolous. Its argument that remarks by the Board's agent during the election interfered with the election process and its claim that the Union made misrepresentations concerning its constitution and bylaws are to my mind frivolous. I do not see anything in the briefs or in the record that makes out a colorable claim. If the situtation were otherwise, however, and the case presented real questions concerning the fairness of the representation proceeding, I cannot at the present time see how either the Board or this Court could review the fairness of the election without having before us the documentary evidence on which the Regional Director based his decision. In the instant case the company has used a "shotgun" approach and has failed to proffer or suggest the probability of any facts that would warrant setting the election aside under applicable legal standards. For this reason I concur in the decision of the Court that the Board was excused from enforcing its rule requiring that all documentary evidence gathered by the Regional Director be made a part of the record

On petition to review Board Order

Before Weick and Boyce F. Martin, Jr., Circuit Judges, and Phillips, Senior Circuit Judge

Phillips, Senior Circuit Judge: This case is before the court on the petition of Delco Air Conditioning Division, General Motors Corporation (the company) to review and set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board, and the cross-application of the Board for enforcement of its order. For a recitation of the pertinent facts, reference is made to the decision and order of the Board reported at 24 N.L.R.B. No. 65.

The Board found that the Company violated § 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Robert L. Mullins because of his union activities, and violated § (a)(1) of the Act by conditioning an offer to reinstate Mullins upon his resigning as a Union Committeeman. The Board ordered the Company to offer Mullins immediate and full reinstatement with backpay to his former position or to a substantially equivalent position.

Upon consideration of the briefs, oral argument and the entire record, we conclude that the decision of the Board is not supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole, and set aside the Board's order and deny enforcement.

The evidence was heard by Administrative Law Judge Benjamin K. Blackburn, who died September 2, 1978, after the close of the hearing and before rendering a decision. Administrative Law Judge Thomas A. Ricci prepared a decision based upon the record. The Board adopted ALJ Ricci's credibility findings, concluding that an independent examination of the record disclosed no basis for reversing his determination or findings of fact based thereon.

The Company's employees were represented by Local 801, International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, AFL-CIO-CLC. At the time of his discharge, Mullins was a District Committeeman of the Union on the first shift. The Company contends that Mullins was discharged for just causes unrelated to Union activities.

The collective bargaining agreement recognized that it was the responsibility of management to maintain discipline and efficiency and the right of management to discipline and discharge employees for just cause. The record contains ample evidence of grounds for discharging Mullins. His Labor Relations Supervisor, Robert Burke, testified that during Mullins' approximately 19 months as an employee of the Company, he amassed the worst record of absenteeism and tardiness ever seen by Burke. The record contains considerable testimony as to misconduct on the part of Mullins.

For example, Mullins was discharged in 1976 for falsification of a travel card, but was reinstated in the settlement of a grievance. Burke testified that Mullins later admitted that he had falsified the time entry on the card. In September 1977 Plant Superintendent George Zeller accused Mullins of lying and cheating the Company, docked him for an hour's pay for his fraudulent attempt to receive compensation for time spent away from the plant and warned him that if he ever again was caught attempting to receive pay for time spent improperly out of the plant, he would be discharged.

The discharge involved in the current proceeding grew out of an incident on October 24, 1977. The Administrative Law Judge found that Mullins left the plant at 10 a.m., without signing out, in violation of Company rules. After his return Mullins was handed a written disciplinary notice reading "indefinite suspension", which later was changed to a straight discharge.

Five other employees of the plant had been discharged for engaging in similar fraudulent acts. A 1971 arbitration decision supported the discharge of a Union Committeeman for fraudulent collection of pay from the Company for time spent in conducting Union business outside the plant for which he received pay from the Union.[1]

It is the opinion of the court that substantial evidence on the record as a whole does not support the Board's conclusion that Mullins was discharged for Union activities. A more difficult question is presented as to whether the Company offered to reinstate him if he would resign as Union Committeeman.

[1] The five page text of this arbitration decision, rendered March 19, 1971, appears in the appendix at pp. 532a–536a.

The Administrative Law Judge credited Mullins' testimony that the Company's Labor Relations supervisor, Burke, proposed in a telephone conversation that the Company would withdraw all records of discipline from Mullins' file and reinstate him if Mullins would resign as Union Committeeman. Mullins' testimony on this point, which is uncorroborated by any other evidence in the record, was as follows:

> During your first conversation with Mr. Burke that morning was there anything else that you can recall that Mr. Burke said to you as to making any suggestions to you with regard to your reinstatement?
> A. During the conversation, at the point where we were discussing the reprimand and the two weeks on my record, I said I couldn't live with that. Burke stated that upon my resignation as Com> mitteeman that he would pull the two weeks.
> Q. What did you reply to that?
> A. I was to think about it, which I did. My reply to it was negative.

Mullins filed a grievance for his discharge. On November 11, 1977, Mullins telephoned Labor Relations Supervisor Burke and asked him if there was any way to settle his case. Burke testified he informed Mullins that, since there was an open grievance, he could not deal directly with Mullins; that Mullins stated he realized Burke could deal only with his Shop Committeeman with respect to the grievance, but nevertheless wanted to discuss settlement possibilities off the record; and that Burke agreed to talk with Mullins' Committeeman and "get back with" Mullins later "with the understanding that any conversation between Mr. Mullins and myself were only discussions and not formal proposals to settle the case."

Burke testified further that Mullins insisted that, in the event he was reinstated by settlement of the grievance, no record of discipline be placed in his record. The testimony of Burke includes the following:

> Q. Okay. Did he have a response to that?
> A. We talked about that for a couple of moments. He stated that—let me think of exactly what he did say. He was still somewhat opposed to the three days being on his record. He stated at that time that as long as he was a committeeman he wasn't worried about the three days. He said but I'm thinking about getting out of this whole business. I said well would you explain what you mean? He said well I am thinking about resigning as a district committeeman and going to the third shift. I said, Bob, I have no idea of what your intent is to resign or anything else but it doesn't have any bearing on this case. He told me at that time that he felt that if he went to the third shift with a three day on his record the first time he messed up he'd be living with a week out and he couldn't live with that. He wasn't worried about it as long as he was a committeeman but if he went to the third he didn't want that hanging over his head. I said, Bob, if that is the only thing from keeping us from settling this case on all the conditions said above then I would consider cancelling that discipline if and when you went to the third shift.
> Q. Okay. What was his response to that?
> A. Mr. Mullins said we have no problem. Call me back to work.
> Q. Okay, and what did you say?
> A. I said, Mr. Mullins, I cannot call you back to work. I have already told you I have to deal with your shop committeeman. I suggested that Mr. Mullins contact Mr. Miller and relate to him the discussions we had just had and have Mr. Miller get with me and when we set down and we both understood the terms of that agreement then I would call him back to work. Mr. Mullins stated that he would like to think about the whole thing for a while before he made a final decision and he talked about he really didn't think Mr. Miller would agree with the time equalization split. He would rather handle that on his own. I told him that due to some prior dealings that I had had with Mr. Miller it was imperative that I have the entire settlement in writing. Again he told me he would like to think it over. I said okay fine think it over and give me a call back.
> Q. Okay. Did you receive a call back?
> A. About 30 minutes later Mr. Mullins called me back.
> Q. Okay, and what was said?
> A. He told me that he did not feel that he could convince Mr. Miller to agree to the equalization split and he didn't think that he should have the three day disciplinary layoff put on his record at all.

Q. Anything else said?

A. I told him that if that was the way he felt there was really no reason to continue this discussion and he agreed. I told him that I would contact Mr. Miller his shop committeeman and make him an offer along the same lines that we'd just talked about. He said that's fine, if Miller buys it that's okay with me.

Q. Okay, and did you subsequently have a conversation with Mr. Miller?

A. Yes, sir, I did. And I made him the formal proposal.

Q. Okay. Which proposal did you make to Mr. Miller?

A. To cancel the discharge and return to work without any compensation; place a three day disciplinary layoff on his record for violating shop rule 6; cancel the three day at the appeal step without any compensation; split the time equalization groups effective January 3rd.

Q. Was that the entire proposal that was made?

A. To the best of my knowledge, yes it was.

Q. Was there any insistence on your part that Mr. Mullins resign as a committeeman?

A. Absolutely not.

Q. What was Mr. Miller's response?

A. Mr. Miller said he would talk with Mr. Mullins and he came back I believe the following day and rejected the offer and the offer was withdrawn at that time.

Q. The offer was withdrawn by you?

A. Yes, sir. (Emphasis added.)

If the Board was correct in its factual conclusion that the Company offered reinstatement to Mullins upon the condition that he resign his position as Union Committeeman, the Company violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act; Associated Truck Lines, Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 884, 106 LRRM 2242 (1981); Cameron Iron Works, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 464 F.2d 609 (5th Cir. 1972).

However, the court concludes that this finding of fact by the Board is not supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole. Universal Camera Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); N.L.R.B. v. Elias Brothers Big Boy, Inc., 327 F.2d 421 (6th Cir 1964). See also N.L.R.B. v. Otsego Ski Club-Hidden Valley, Inc., 542 F.2d 18 (6th Cir. 1976); Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. N.L.R.B. 371 F.2d 573, 582 (6th Cir. 1967); N.L.R.B. v. Barberton Plastics Products, Inc., 354 F.2d 66, 69 (6th Cir. 1965) N.L.R.B. v. Mt. Vernon Telephone Corp., 352 F.2d 977, 979 (6th Cir. 1965).

Although credibility determinations ordinarily are the prerogative of the Board, this court is unwilling to enforce a backpay award upon the uncorroborated testimony of Mullins who would be the beneficiary of reinstatement and the backpay award. See Elias Brothers Big Boy, supra, 327 F.2d at 427.

Significantly Administrative Law Judge Blackburn, who heard the testimony, made this statement at the close of the hearing regarding the credibility of Mullins' testimony on another issue:

> I would suggest and no matter how you structure your briefs in the beginning on all of these issues on credibility and what time he actually left the plant and so forth, my present feeling is that my finding of fact is going to be in the Respondent's favor, that he did leave the plant at 10:10 and did not come back until 12:06. Let me say why I think that at the moment because I want to preserve it for later on to see if it still seems like such a good reason to me when I write the decision. The thing that impresses me the most in this area is the existence of R-4 and R-5. R-4 is the Irrregular Hours Pass with the time out, time in on it. Coupled with the testimony of Mr. Kester yesterday which frankly I found quite persuasive, taking the two together at the moment I think I'm persuaded that I'm going to find against Mr. Mullins on the question of when he left the plant.

Administrative Law Judge Ricci, who inherited the case, also credited the Company's version of the facts on this issue and concluded that Mullins was not telling the truth when he denied leaving the plant while the guard's back was turned. Nevertheless, Administrative Law Judge Ricci credited the uncorroborated testimony of Mullins that he was offered reinstatement upon the condition that he resign as Union Committeeman.

NLRB v. Oesterlen Services for Youth, Inc.

649 F.2d 399 (6th Cir.), May 13, 1981; rehearing denied June 8, 1981; certiorari denied November 9, 1981—243 NLRB 563

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Merritt, Brown and Jones, Circuit Judges

Oesterlen Services for Youth, Inc., operates a mental health care facility in Springfield, Ohio. On October 20, 1978, an election was conducted among certain employees to determine whether they wished to be represented by the Service, Hospital, Nursing Home and Public Employees Union, Local No. 47 (the Union). Of approximately 36 eligible voters, 17 voted for the Union, 12 voted against, and four ballots had been challenged. The number of challenged ballots was not sufficient to affect the results of the election.

On October 27, Oesterlen filed five objections to the election alleging that certain actions of the Board's agent and of the Union's observer prevented a fair election. The Regional Director conducted an administrative investigation. On December 11, the Regional Director overruled all of the Company's objections. The Board affirmed. Oesterlen refused to bargain with the Union. Thus, the Board petitioned for enforcement of its Order that Oesterlen violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. by refusing to bargain with the duly certified collective bargaining representative of its employees. Applying the well settled rule that "a party who seeks to overturn the results of a representation election has the burden to show that the election was not fairly conducted," NLRB v. Bostik, Division, USM Corp., 517 F.2d 971, 975 (6th Cir. 1975), we grant enforcement.

During the election, the Board agent absented himself from the polling area for ten minutes, and took with him the unused ballots. Though he failed to seal the ballot box, both the Union's and Oesterlen's observers constantly watched the box. Three employees presented themselves to vote. Each employee was told that they could vote when the Board agent returned. The three employees subsequently voted. Oesterlen contends that the employees who failed to vote may have been influenced by the Board agent's action in leaving the polls and leaving the ballot box with the observers. However, no evidence has been presented in support of such contention. The employees known to have been in the polling area during the Board agent's absence eventually cast a ballot. On the basis of the above cited facts, we agree with the Board that the integrity of the election had been maintained. Compare Anchor Coupling Co., Inc., 171 NLRB 1296 with Kerona Plastics Extrusion Company, 196 NLRB 1120 (1972).

Oesterlen also contends that the Union's observer engaged in unlawful electioneering with several of the employees. The Union's observer exchanged pleasantries with mostly every voter. During the Board agent's absence, one employee who wished to vote seated herself behind the observers' table and began a conversation with the Union observer. Oesterlen's observer stated that the two discussed their work schedules as well as the fact that another employee had worked a full week before deciding to quit. Apparently, most employees know after one day whether they like the job. Additionally, the Union's observer stated to one employee that he intended to be at the site of the Union's organizational meetings later that evening. Finally, in response to a voter's question concerning the turnout at the polls, the Union observer stated his belief that "more" employees would probably vote at the shift change.

It is a well settled Board rule that prolonged conversations between observers and voters in the polling area are deemed prejudicial without investigation as to the content of the conversations. Milchem, Inc., 170 NLRB 362 (1968). See also Midwest Stock Exchange v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 629 (7th Cir. 1980). However, not "any chance, isolated, innocuous comment or inquiry by an observer to a voter will necessarily void the election." Milchem at 363. The reasons for the rule set forth in Milchem are not difficult to fathom. As was aptly stated in Midwest Stock Exchange:

> The Board reasoned that the potential for distraction last minute electioneering, and unfair advantage, justified a 'strict rule' against such conduct without requiring an examination into the substance or effect of the conversations.

Applying these well settled principles to the above-cited facts, we hold that the record supports the Board's finding that the Union observer's conversations constitute nothing more than "innocuous" conversation that did not constitute electioneering.

We have reviewed Oesterlen's other allegations of error and find that they are without merit.

Accordingly, the Board's Order is ENFORCED.

The Standard Register Company v. NLRB

649 F.2d 412 (6th Cir.), May 14, 1981; rehearing denied June 29, 1981, certiorari denied December 14, 1981—243 NLRB 300

Before KEITH, BROWN and KENNEDY, Circuit Judges

The case is before the court upon a petition by Standard Register Company to review the NLRB's order against the company. The Board's order is reported at 243 NLRB 32, and the supplemental order is reported at 246 NLRB 54. The issue presented by the company is whether the Board properly overruled the company's election objections and, therefore, properly found that the company's refusal to bargain violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The Standard Register Company is engaged in printing business forms at plants in Dayton, Ohio, and other locations in the United States. The company's Dayton employees had traditionally been represented by the Graphic Arts International Union, Local 508, O-K-I, AFL-CIC-CLC (GAIU). Employees at other company plants had been represented by the Dayton Printing and Graphic Communications Union Local 54, AFL-CIO (Pressmen).

On December 27, 1976, the Pressmen filed a petition with the Board seeking to represent the company's employees at the Dayton plant. The GAIU intervened in the election proceeding. On March 2, 1977, the parties executed a Stipulation for Certification upon Consent Election agreement providing for an election on March 11, 1977. Pursuant to the Stipulation, the ballot choices were: GAIU, Pressmen, and neither. The election was conducted as scheduled, and the results were: 57 votes for the GAIU, 52 votes for the Pressmen, and 40 votes for neither organization. Pursuant to the Board's rules and regulations, a runoff election between the union and GAIU was necessary, since none of the three choices on the ballot received a majority of the votes cast.

On March 17, the company filed timely objections to conduct which allegedly affected the results of the election. The company alleged that the GAIU improperly affected the outcome of the election by engaging in "impermissible promises and inducements, material misrepresentations of fact, and threats at a time when the company was effectively precluded from responding to them." GAIU had sent a handbill out less than 24 hours before the election which represented the salaries of GAIU-represented employees as compared to those of Pressmen, and which also allegedly included threats of non-representation by the GAIU if it were defeated.

Following an administrative investigation, the Board's regional director issued his Report on Objections on May 17, finding that the objections "raised no substantial or material issue affecting the result of the election," and recommending that the Board overrule the objections and direct a runoff election between the GAIU and the Pressmen. On June 2, the company filed timely exceptions to the director's report.

The runoff election was conducted on July 14. The results were: 73 votes for the Pressmen, 37 votes for the GAIU, and 10 challenged ballots, an insufficient number to affect the results of the election. On August 14, the company again filed timely objections to the runoff election based on the Board's refusal to set aside the initial election. Following an Administrative Investigation, the regional director issued his report on September 19, recommending that the company's objections be overruled. Following the company's filing of exceptions, the Board issued a Supplemental Decision and Certification Order on December 27, affirming the regional director's report and certifying the Pressmen as the collective bargaining representative of the company's employees.

On January 3, 1979, the Pressmen wrote to the company noting its certification as bargaining agent by the Board, and requesting the company to "enter into negotiations toward a new collective bargaining agreement at the earliest possible date." On January 24, 1979, the company replied, refusing to meet or to recognize the Pressmen because of the election irregularities. Since January 24, 1979, the company has refused to bargain with the Pressmen. On July 3, 1979, the Board granted the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment.

Upon consideration of the entire record together with the briefs and oral arguments of counsel, the court concludes that the misrepresentation by the union in this case did not meet the four criteria set forth by the Board in Hollywood Ceramics, Co., Inc., 140 NLRB 221 (1962). That case held that the test for determining whether a misrepresentation is so egregious that an election must be voided is:

> * * * an election shall be set aside only where there has been a misrepresentation or other similar campaign trickery, which involves a substantial departure from the truth, at a time which prevents the other party or parties from making an effective reply, so that the misrepresentation, whether deliberate or not, may reasonably be expected to have a significant impact on the election. 140 NLRB at 224.

In applying the Hollywood Ceramics standard, the Fifth Circuit formulated that test as:

> * * * (1) whether there has been a misrepresentation of a material fact; (2) whether the misrepresentation came from a party who was in an authoritative position to know the truth or who had special knowledge of the facts; (3) whether the other party in the election had an adequate opportunity to reply and to correct the misrepresentation * * *. Recently, this court added a fourth element to the test: whether the employees had independent knowledge of the misrepresented fact, so that they could effectively evaluate the propaganda. NLRB v. Southern Foods, Inc., 434 F.2d 717, 720 (5th Cir. 1970).

Although the handbill's reference to $1.00 and $1.50 differentials overstated the amount the salary differences between the plants, it did convey the essentially correct message that the GAIU had won higher wages for its members than the Pressmen. In fact, in one category, employees earned $1.51 more at the GAIU plant. Therefore, we conclude that the Board did not abuse its discretion when it determined that the misrepresentation was not material under the Hollywood Ceramics test.

The company contends that Diamond Electronics Division of Arvin Systems, Inc., v. National Labor Relations Board, 570 F.2d 156 (6th Cir. 1977), mandates a reversal of the Board's decision. We disagree. Diamond is distinguishable from the present case on its facts. There was no truth in the union's contention in Diamond that it had won a 40% increase in a single negotiation. Here, however, it is true that some GAIU members make $1.50 more than the Pressmen members. Most importantly, Diamond is distinguishable in that the union that misrepresented the increase there also won the election. Therefore, it was more difficult for the Diamond court to conclude that the Board had not abused its discretion when it concluded that the misrepresentation did not affect the election result. Here, the GAIU did not win the election and the Pressmen, the current collective bargaining agent, did nothing to adversely affect the "laboratory conditions" of the election process.

Accordingly, we deny the company's petition for review and enforce the Board's order in full.

CORNELIA G. KENNEDY, Circuit Judge, dissenting: I respectfully dissent. At the time of the election the GAIU was representing the employees in arbitration proceedings seeking back wages claimed to be owing. The GAIU handbill contained the following statement:

> As the company stated in their presentation to the employees, the GAIU has a case pending in Court regarding the "lost" $.45 wage increase. It would be to the Company's advantage if the GAIU was defeated in the election and would ultimately decide not to spend the remaining members' dues in an effort to collect the lost wage increase for its former members. This would relieve the Company of an approximately $4,000 pending liability per each affected member.

I agree with the dissenting member of the Board that this statement was "an impermissible threat * * * to abandon the bargaining representative's statutory duty to represent the unit membership after the election." The majority of the Board, concentrating on the GAIU's intention, held that the intent of the language was to negate implications in an earlier letter of the employer. It found that > [n]owhere does the Intervenor [GAIU] indicate an intention to abandon its efforts to collect the disputed wages * * *. [i]n our view, the Intervenor was merely describing what the Employer would wish to have happen should the Intervenor [GAIU] lose the election.

The problem with the Board's holding is that is not what the leaflet says. It does not say that this is what the employer wants the GAIU to do. Rather it threatens that this is what the GAIU will do if not re-elected. We must read the language as it would be likely to be understood by the ordinary reader. It is what was said that is important, not what was intended to be said. Certainly the statement here was "reasonably susceptible of coercive implications." G. H. Hess, 82 N.L.R.B. 462 (1979). Our Court stated in Plastic Masters, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 512 F.2d 449, 450 (6th Cir. 1975):

> * * * in our opinion the intent or absence of intent on the part of the Union to influence the employees' votes by the overpayments is not a controlling factor. Whether the conduct of the Union was intended to influence the vote, these actions "undoubtedly had a tendency to influence the election results." Collins & Aikman Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 383 F.2d 722, 729 (4th Cir. 1967).

In a decision in which it relied on our Court's holding in Plastic Masters, the Fifth Circuit explained:

> The intent test is inconsistent with the logic behind these holdings [setting aside representation elections]. The effects of an act intended to influence an election may be so minimal that the outcome remains unaffected. Conversely an unintentional act may have such a deleterious effect on the conduct of an election that the result does not reflect the voters' free will. In determining whether an election should be invalidated, the focus should be on the effects of a particular act on the 416 electorate rather than on the actor's intent.

N.L.R.B. v. Gulf States Canners, Inc., 585 F.2d 757, 759 (5th Cir. 1978).

The threat here could not but have a tendency to influence the outcome of the voting. Employees who might have wished to vote for "no union," as well as those who might have wished to vote for the Pressmen, may have voted for the GAIU so as not to lose their claims to the back wages. The panel fails to discuss the effect on the election of the Union's threat.

In addition, the majority of the Court suggests that the overstatements of the wage differential between Pressmen and GAIU plans were not misleading under Diamond Electronics Division of Arvin Systems, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 570 F.2d 156 (6th Cir. 1977). The Board never analyzed the misleading nature of these statements. It simply asserted that the statements did not require setting the election aside. In Diamond the union overstated by 40 percent the wage increase it won in a bargaining session. Our Court ruled that "[t]his was a material misrepresentation with respect to wage rates, a matter of great concern to employees." Id. at 157. In this case the GAIU overstated the average wage differential between the GAIU represented Dayton plant and the Pressmen represented York and Fayetteville plants by 78 percent and 88 percent, respectively. This is more misleading than the statements at issue in Diamond.

The panel suggests the overstatements were not misleading because they conveyed the "essentially correct message that the GAIU had won higher wages for its members than the Pressmen." By the same token, the overstatement at issue in Diamond conveyed the "essentially correct" message that the union had won a wage increase for its members. Diamond forecloses the conclusion that such an "essentially correct" message is not materially misleading. I also disagree that this case is distinguishable from Diamond merely because the otherwise misleading statements were accurate with respect to one out of thirty-five job categories.

The majority further states that Diamond is distinguishable in that the union making the misstatement in Diamond won the election while the GAIU which made the wage overstatement here was the loser in the runoff election. The majority's position appears to be based on the assumption that the GAIU's misleading statements could only have hurt the Pressmen; that they could not have influenced the employees to vote union in preference to "no union." I disagree. The employees might well have believed that a company which paid its workers in different cities substantially different wages for comparable work is unfair, and that the protection of a union is necessary for employees of that company.

The GAIU received 20 votes less in the runoff election than it received in the first election. Had half of those 20 votes been given to the employer, the parties in the runoff election would have been the employer and the Pressmen. We can only speculate as to what the outcome of an election not influenced by material misrepresentations would have been. The Board should have required a new election. I would deny enforcement of the Board's order.

NLRB v. Laborer's International Union of North America, Local No. 721

649 F.2d 33 (1st Cir.), May 15, 1981—246 NLRB 691

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before ALDRICH, Senior Circuit Judge, WINTER, Circuit Judge,* and WYZANSKI, Senior District Judge.

34

PER CURIAM: The National Labor Relations Board petitions for enforcement of its order, 246 N.L.R.B. No. 108 (December 4, 1979), directing Laborer's International Union Local 721 (the Union), among other things, to cease and desist from its unfair labor practices in violation of §§ 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b) (1976), and to rescind the unlawful disciplinary actions taken against two of its members. Although the Union claims its disciplinary actions were appropriate, we think that there was substantial evidence to support the Board's determination that the Union violated the Act in two respects. We direct that the Board's order be enforced in full.

I.

The Union disciplined the two members when they refused to participate in a strike called by the Union. The Union had requested that the employer of the two workers, a construction contractor, place a Union-designated steward at the jobsite as permitted by the collective bargaining agreement. The two men were the only Laborers at the jobsite, so the employer asked the Union to designate either man as the steward. The Union refused, and the employer likewise refused to hire an additional Laborer or to discharge either man then employed in order to take on a steward acceptable to the Union. The Union thereupon called the strike, which the two workers participated in for one day. After a work hiatus due to inclement weather, they resumed work in spite of the continuing strike call. The Union proceeded to discipline the two workers, notwithstanding the fact that the collective bargaining agreement also contained a valid no-strike provision applicable to this strike and a provision for arbitration of such disputes. The Union held a hearing and fined the men. They apparently declined to pay the fines, and the Union proceeded to suspend them, refusing to accept their tenders of regular dues. Finally, the Union sent a message to their employer which stated that the men were no longer members in good standing with the Union and should therefore be discharged according to a closed-shop provision of the collective bargaining agreement. The employer did not discharge the two workers. They nonetheless preferred charges against the Union with the General Counsel to the Board.

After the parties stipulated to the facts, a divided Board held that the Union violated § 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by subjecting the two men to discipline because the strike violated a no-strike provision of the agreement. It determined that the employer's refusal to hire a Union-designated steward in violation of the collective bargaining agreement did not constitute an unfair labor practice sufficiently serious to justify the strike. The Board also held that the Union violated §§ 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the Act by attempting to secure the employer's discharge of the two men.

Of the District of Massachusetts, sitting by designation.

II.

It is conceded for purposes of this appeal that the collective bargaining agreement's provision for union designation of a steward served a legitimate union objective. Accordingly, the employer's violation of the provision constituted an unfair labor practice, despite the fact that the Union refused to consider designating one of its two members on the job as steward and insisted upon a steward of its own choice, even if the employer had to discharge another Union member to hire the chosen individual. Cf. The PaintSmiths, Inc. v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 1326 (8 Cir. 1980), rev'g 239 N.L.R.B. 1378 (1979). The Supreme Court has long held that strikes called to protest unfair labor practices of employers do not violate general no-strike provisions of collective bargaining agreements in the absence of a more specific waiver of the right to strike. Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 76 S.Ct. 349, 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956). The Board, however, has interpreted the right to strike under Mastro Plastics as limited to disputes involving "serious" unfair labor practices. Arlan's Department Store of Michigan, Inc., 133 N.L.R.B. 802 (1961). Because the steward designation dispute did not involve a "flagrant" unfair labor practice by the employer "threatening the very existence of the union itself," Drake Bakeries, Inc. v. American Bakery Workers, 370 U.S. 254, 266, 82 S.Ct. 1346, 1353, 8 L.Ed.2d 474 (1962), the Board determined that the employer did not commit an unfair labor practice sufficiently serious to justify the strike in view of the no-strike provision of the collective bargaining agreement and the availability of an arbitration procedure to settle the dispute.

We think the Board is correct in its view that Mastro Plastics does not justify strikes in violation of bargained-for no-strike provisions in labor agreements over any unfair labor practice, no matter how insignificant. National labor policy encourages dispute resolution without resort to industrial strife, especially arbitration. See, e.g., Gateway Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 414 U.S. 368, 377–82, 94 S.Ct. 629, 636–39, 38 L.Ed.2d 583 (1974); Boys Markets, Inc. v. Retail Clerks, 398 U.S. 235, 250–53, 90 S.Ct. 1583, 1592–93, 26 L.Ed.2d 199 (197)). Wooden application of a rule justifying strikes would completely vitiate the efforts of the parties to minimize disruptions by establishing mechanisms to resolve disputes through collective bargaining. Mastro Plastics contemplates strikes to protest unfair labor practices which threaten the integrity of the collective bargaining relationship. Permitting such strikes in defiance of no-strike provisions when the unfair labor practice is not so serious, however, would also undermine the collective bargaining relationship.

The Board, moreover, can best determine what unfair labor practices by an employer threaten a union's ability to represent a bargaining unit effectively and which do not. The Board's expertise is best applied in areas such as this, which emphasize factfinding and call for a flexible, case-by-case approach, and is best deferred to by the courts, subject of course to general supervisory review. We accept the Board's determination in this case that the employer's conduct did not warrant a strike. Substantial evidence in the record as a whole supports this determination for the record reveals that what was at stake was not a refusal on the part of the employer to honor the Union's contractual right to have a steward on the jobsite but a simple dispute as to the identity of the steward. There was thus, as the Board found, no effort on the part of the employer to "undermine the Union as the employees' collective bargaining representative."

III.

As a further step, we accept the Board's determination in this case that the Union's discipline of the two men who refused to participate in a strike unwarranted by a serious unfair labor practice violated § 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(A). NLRB v. Retail Clerks Union, Local 1179, 526 F.2d 142 (9 Cir. 1975); Mississippi Gulf Coast Bldg. v. Construction Trades Council, 222 N.L.R.B. 649, enf'd, 542 F.2d 573 (5 Cir. 1976).

Although unions are permitted to assess fines to maintain discipline, the Act prohibits unions from maintaining discipline by interfering with the employment of their members. See, e.g., Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423, 428 89 S.Ct. 1154, 1157, 22 L.Ed.2d 385 (1969). The imperative words of the union's message to the employer requesting the immediate implementation of the discharge provision of the collective bargaining agreement with respect to the two wrongfully disciplined workers unmistakably provide substantial support for the Board's finding of unlawful interference with employment of the two men in violation of §§ 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the Act.

ENFORCEMENT GRANTED.

NLRB v. Container Corporation of America

649 F.2d 1213 (6th Cir.), May 18, 1981—244 NLRB 318

On petition to enforce Board Order

PER CURIAM: The National Labor Relations Board petitions for enforcement of an order requiring Container Corporation of America to cease its unfair labor practices under section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 151 et seq. The company cross-petitions for review of the NLRB's determination that it violated the Act by threatening to discipline an employee if he continued to post anti-management notices on the company's bulletin board. An individual charge brought by Union Vice President Young, alleging that the company had unlawfully threatened him if he refused to agree with changes in the employee break system, has been consolidated with the charge of Local 4018 United Paperworkers International Union, AFL—CIO.

The controversy between the Union and the company began when the Union Vice President posted on the company bulletin board a newsletter written by the Union President. This notice criticized the manner in which the company was proccessing grievances. The company claims it also contained virulent ad hominem attacks on the plant's General Manager. The notice alleged that management had treated employees in a "disgraceful manner," and announced the Union's intention to resist further unfair management behavior. It also criticized the General Manager and implied that he was a slave driver, and stated that "he expects more and more sq. (sic) footage from the 'chain gang' with nothing in return."

After the General Manager saw the notice, he consulted the company's industrial relations advisor. He then called the Union President and told him he found the notice abusive, insulting, disruptive, and violative of the negotiated contract provision which allowed notices to be posted which related to "official union business." The General Manager announced that he would remove the letter from the board. Nevertheless, the notice reappeared the next day and was removed again. The General Manager then called a meeting with the Union Vice President and other Union committeemen during which he read aloud the relevant contract clause, reiterated his opinion of the notice, and threatened to suspend the Vice President if the notice reappeared on the board. The Vice President did not replace the notice and the Union filed charges with the NLRB against the company.

After a hearing on the charges, the Administrative Law Judge found that the "newsletter" was "official union business" within the meaning of the contract. The ALJ also found that the posting of notices was a statutorily protected activity because the company had given the Union a contractual right to use the board. He also found that the contents of the notice deserved the Act's protection because the remarks against management were not "egregious." Based on these facts, the ALJ determined that the company violated section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The NLRB modified these findings and found that, although the Union had no statutory right to use the bulletin board, nevertheless an employer who has permitted union access to a company board, either by formal rule or practice, may not then remove notices or discriminate against and employee who post notices which the company finds distasteful.

As an initial matter, we agree that the NLRB properly exercised its discretion under section 10(a) of the Act in refusing to defer to arbitration in this dispute. The determinative issue on appeal centers on the uncoerced exercise of employee rights under section 7 of the Act, rather than on construction of an embiguous contract provision. See General American Transportation Co., 228 N.L.R.B. 808 (1977).

*Honorable Richard S. Enslen, United States District Judge for the Western District of Michigan, sitting by designation.

The company attempts to justify the General Manager's actions and remarks by pointing to a historical company practice of removing propagandistic notices from the board which tended to create dissension, demean management, or ridicule personnel. Such notices were removed by the company during negotiations in 1969, 1971, and 1973. The company contends that the NLRB erroneously ignored this history.

The record reveals that the Union and the company fought a contracts battle on the bulletin board during their 1968 negotiations. By mutual agreement, the bulletin board was eliminated as a battleground. We agree with the ALJ that this agreement was limited to those particular contract negotiations and does not carry over to the instant controversy as a waiver of the Union's right to post notices relating to union business. Ample uncontradicted evidence supports the finding that employees were allowed to post personal notices, none of which related to employment, without censorship or company supervision. The Union President testified that "questions" had arisen about letters posted on the board in the past, but to his knowledge the company had never removed any notices. He also testified that he intended to convey to union members by his letter, the company's attitude towards the Union and its committee. Based on these facts, we see no reason to disturb the finding that the contents of the letter related to "official union business," namely, the grievance procedure and the Union President's perception of the company's attitude towards grievance steps.

Similarly, we agree with the ALJ's determination, adopted by the NLRB, that the remarks in the notice were not sufficiently egregious to fall outside the protection of section 7. Union rhetoric is protected by federal law even if it is "abusive" or "insulting." National Association of Letter Carriers v. Austin, 418 U.S. 264, 94 S. Ct. 2770, 41 L.Ed.2d 745 (1974). The record is barren of evidence to contradict the ALJ's view that the posted notice had no greater disruptive potential than literature distributed outside the plant. Accordingly, the company cannot justify removing the notice from the board on the basis that its contents were disruptive or unpleasant.

We turn now to discuss the individual charge that alleged that the company threatened Vice President Young and threatened to "make it hard" on union members. The NLRB found, in deciding the individual charge, that Mr. Grundy, a plant manager in training, coerced Vice President Young in the exercise of his section 7 rights and thereby violated section 8(a)(1).

Young testified that Grundy had stated to him that Grundy had visited one of the company's plants in which employees' first grievances were "placed in a desk drawer," and that subsequent grievances resulted in dismissals. Young also testified that Grundy intimated to him that the retiring plant manager "could make it hard" on union members. Grundy denied having made any such statements directly to Young. Rather, he testified that he had merely joked with other management personnel in the cafeteria and told them about the grievance remark which had been made by another plant manager, reputed to be a "character." Grundy testified that Young may have overheard this remark.

Young's testimony was uncorroborated. However, the record does contain evidence to support Grundy's testimony that Young disliked him because of a dispute over issuing warnings to employees, and that Young had threatened "to get" Grundy, the very day before he filed his charge against the company based on Grundy's alleged statement. After Grundy issued the disputed warnings, Young filed the charge, a full month after Grundy allegedly threatened him.

Viewing the record as a whole, we do not find substantial evidence to support the ALJ's credibility findings. He fully credited Young's testimony, a highly interested witness, although this testimony was not supported by other evidence. The uncorroborated testimony of an interested charging party does not amount to substantial evidence of an unfair labor practice. N.L.R.B. v. Otsego Ski Club-Hidden Valley, Inc., 542 F.2d 18 (6th Cir. 1976). See also N.L.R.B. v. Elias Bros. Big Boy, Inc., 327 F.2d 421 (6th Cir. 1964). Young testified that Grundy never threatened him personally. In light of Young's inability to recall with specificity the conversations in which Grundy allegedly made the challenged statements, we cannot say that substantial evidence supports the ALJ's and the NLRB's findings on this issue.

Accordingly, the NLRB's order is enforced in part and denied enforcement in part.

650 F.2d 19 (3d Cir.), May 20, 1981

On appeal from preliminary injunction

Before SEITZ, Chief Judge, and ALDISERT and GIBBONS, Circuit Judges

20

GIBBONS, Circuit Judge: The New York Shipping Association, Inc. (NYSA), the International Longshoremen's Association, AFL–CIO (ILA), and others, appeal from a preliminary injunction issued pursuant to Section 10(l) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 1601(l), on a petition brought by William A. Pascarell, Acting Regional Director, on behalf of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board). The injunction prohibits the defendants from implementing certain provisions of a collective bargaining agreement between NYSA and ILA pending resolution of charges before the Board that those provisions, the Rules on Containers, violate Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4)(ii)(B). Prior stages of this ongoing dispute are set out in NLRB v. International Longshoremen's Ass'n, 447 U.S. 490, 100 S.Ct. 2305, 65 L.Ed.2d 289 (1980); Consolidated Express Inc. v. New York Shipping Ass'n, Inc., 641 F.2d 90 (3d Cir. 1981), mandamus and prohibition denied, In re International Longshoremen's Association, ——— U.S.———, 101 S.Ct. 2008, 68 L.Ed.2d 318 (1981); Consolidated Express, Inc. v. New York Shipping Ass'n, 602 F.2d 494 (3d Cir. 1979), vacated and remanded, 448 U.S. 902, 100 S.Ct. 3040, 65 L.Ed.2d 1131 (1980); Balicer v. International Longshoremen's Ass'n, 364 F.Supp. 205 (D.N.J.), aff'd mem., 491 F.2d 748 (3d Cir. 1973). In the Balicer case the Regional Director on behalf of the Board obtained a Section 10(l) injunction preventing the operation of the Rules on Containers pending resolution of unfair labor practice charges pending before the Board. Since the charges involved alleged violations of Section 8(b)(4) that application was, under Section 10(l), mandatory. Compare Section 10(j), 29 U.S.C. § 160(j). A preliminary injunction issued, and thus from 1973 to date the Rules on Containers were never operative. The Board in a number of cases held that the Rules on Containers did in fact violate Section 8(b)(4). The effect of those decisions was to prevent implementation of the Rules. On June 20, 1980, however, the Supreme Court held that in deciding the Section 8(b)(4) charges the Board had applied on incorrect legal standard, and remanded for further consideration. N.L.R.B. v. International Longshoremen's Ass'n, supra.

The status quo from 1973 through 1980 was that the Rules on Containers were inoperative. This permitted continued operation of the businesses of certain freight consolidators who employed teamsters rather than longshoremen. Late in 1980, NYSA and ILA agreed to institute implementation of the Rules beginning January 2, 1981. Meanwhile, pursuant to the Supreme Court's mandate, the Board conducted an investigation of the Section 8(b)(4) charges in light of the Court's opinion, and concluded that complaints should be processed. That conclusion triggered the mandatory Section 10(l) duty to petition for injunctive relief pending the Board's final adjudication. By the time the district court considered that petition it was clear that the defendants intended to implement the Rules. Such implementation would drastically alter the status which prevailed from 1973 through 1980, by depriving the freight consolidators and their employees of business they had enjoyed for years. The district court issued a Section 10(l) injunction prohibiting implementation of the Rules pending the Board's decision on the pending charges. This appeal followed. Several objections to the district court order are advanced, none of which are meritorious.

First NYSA and ILA contend that the district court should not have entertained a Section 10(l) application, but should have referred the Board to the Court of Appeals from which the pending unfair labor practice cases were remanded for consideration of pendente lite relief. We reject that contention because it is plainly inconsistent with the structure of the Act. Authority of Courts of Appeals to enforce the prohibitions against unfair labor practices depends on 28 U.S.C. § 2112 and Section 10(e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160. Those statutes provide for enforcement of Board orders.

Section 10(e) authorizes appropriate temporary relief, but only in connection with enforcement of a Board order. The Board's unfair labor practice orders have been vacated. The Board itself lacks authority to order pendente lite relief, but must apply for such relief to a district court pursuant to Section 10(j) or (l). Undoubtedly the Congressional decision to direct the Board to the district courts for temporary relief reflects the reality that such relief will require the creation of some kind of factual record in advance of the creation of the Board's adjudicative record. The creation of such a record is a task for which an appellate court is unsuited. We do not hold that a court of appeals reviewing a Board decision pursuant to Section 10(e) lacks the power to enforce a board order pending a remand. See 28 U.S.C. § 1651. We hold only that if there is such power it in no way preempts the district court's section 10(l) authority or the Board's Section 10(j) discretion and Section 10(l) duty.

Next, NYSA and ILA contend that the district court erred in issuing a preliminary injunction upon a finding that there is reasonable cause to believe an unfair labor practice is present and the Board's legal theory is substantial and not frivolous. In applying that standard the district court applied the settled law of this circuit. Consolidated Express Inc. v. New York Shipping Ass'n Inc., 641 F.2d 90 (3d Cir. 1981), mandamus and prohibition denied, In Re International Longshoremen's Association, ——— U.S.———, 101 S.Ct. 2008, 68 L.Ed.2d 318 (1981); Hirsch v. Building & Construction Trades Council of Philadelphia & Vicinity, 530 F. 2d 298 (3d Cir. 1976); Samoff v. Building & Construction Trades Council of Philadelphia & Vicinity, 475 F.2d 203 (3d Cir.), vacated for mootness, 414 U.S. 808, 94 S.Ct. 151, 38 L.Ed.2d 44 (1973); Schauffler v. Local 1291, International Longshoremen's Ass'n, 292 F.2d 182 (3d Cir. 1961). This panel is not free to disregard those cases. Moreover, for the reasons set forth therein we are convinced the rule they announce is sound.

Finally, NYSA and ILA contend that even assuming the Hirsch-Samoff-Schauffler test for determining whether pendente lite relief is appropriate the district court must under Section 10(l) determine what injunctive relief is "just and proper." Obviously the language of the statute would permit the district court to decline an injunction when there was no actual threat that the unfair labor practice charged before the Board was likely to continue pendente lite. That is not our situation, however, for NYSA and ILA agreed in late 1980 to change the status quo effective January 2, 1981, by putting into effect Rules on Containers which up to then had not been in operation. Those Rules involve non-frivolous substantial unfair labor practice charges. Given the fact that the Board's obligation to seek pendente lite relief against Section 8(b)(4) violations is mandatory, we cannot hold that the trial court erred in refusing to permit a change in the status quo by authorizing operation of the Rules, and putting the freight consolidators out of business, while the Board hearing went forward.

The judgment appealed from will be affirmed.

NLRB v. Tri-State Transport Corporation

649 F.2d 993 (4th Cir.), May 21, 1981—245 NLRB 1030

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before HAYNSWORTH, Chief Judge, INGRAHAM, Senior Circuit Judge,* and MURNAGHAN, Circuit Judge

INGRAHAM, Circuit Judge: Pursuant to section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976), the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) seeks enforcement of its order issued on September 28, 1979, against Tri-State Transport Corporation (Tri-State) of Wheeling, West Virginia. After formal hearing, the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) concluded that Henry Cunningham was an employee of Tri-State within the meaning of section 2(3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(3) (1976). The ALJ further concluded that Tri-State discharged Cunningham for participating in a strike by other drivers against the company, in violation of section 8(a)(1) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976). The Board adopted the findings and conclusions of the ALJ and ordered

---

*Honorable Joe M. Ingraham, Senior United States Circuit Judge for the Fifth Circuit, sitting by designation.

Tri-State to offer Cunningham reinstatement and make him whole for any lost earnings.

Tri-State raises two principal arguments on appeal. The first argument is that since counsel for the company was detained at the last moment by other legal proceedings and the company's defense was inadequately presented by its non-lawyer president Mrs. Jean Witsberger, and for other reasons, the company did not receive a fair hearing before the ALJ. The second argument is that since Cunningham was not an employee of Tri-State within the meaning of section 2(3) of the Act, the cessation of his business affiliation with Tri-State was not a violation of section 8(a)(1). Because we hold that Tri-State's position with respect to the second argument is correct, we do not reach the issues raised by the company in its first argument.

I.

The dispositive issue in this case is the legal status of Cunningham's relationship to Tri-State. This is the only issue on which the ALJ took testimony at the hearing. Based on the testimony given and the exhibits admitted, the ALJ found that Cunningham was an employee of Tri-State. On this application for enforcement, our standard of review is to determine whether there is substantial evidence on the record as a whole to support that finding. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

Section 2(3) provides, in relevant part, that the term "employee" shall not include "any individual having the status of independent contractor." In enacting this provision, Congress did not define the status of independent contractor but intended instead that in each specific case the question whether an individual were an employee or an independent contractor was to be determined by the the application of general agency principles. See NLRB v. United Insurance Co., 390 U.S. 254, 256, 88 S.Ct. 988, 989, 19 L.Ed.2d 1083 (1968); NLRB v. A.S. Abell Co., 327 F.2d 1, 4 (4th Cir. 1964).

Thus, the Board's decision in this case involved not only factual findings by the ALJ but also the application of common law principles to those facts. Accordingly, the decision, although not one in which the Board had to apply its special expertise, should be upheld if the Board chose between two fairly conflicting views. NLRB v. United Insurance Co., 390 U.S. at 260, 88 S.Ct. at 991.

In distinguishing employees from independent contractors, > there is no shorthand formula or magic phrase that can be applied to find the answer, but all of the incidents of the relationship must be assessed and weighed with no one factor being decisive. What is important is that the total factual context is assessed in light of the pertinent common law agency principles.

Id. at 258, 88 S.Ct. at 990. Those common law principles may be referred to as the right-to-control test.

In this case, there is the further consideration that Tri-State is a trucking firm engaged in the interstate carriage of pipe, authorized to operate under a certificate of public convenience and necessity issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC). Tri-State also must comply with numerous regulations of the Department of Transportation (DOT). The common law test of right-to-control has proven especially difficult to apply in cases involving owner-operators and non-owner drivers of trucks leased to carriers governed by these ICC and DOT regulations. See Local 814, International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. NLRB, 512 F.2d 564, 568 (D.C.Cir. 1975) (Bazelon, J., dissenting).

Under the applicable regulations, carriers are required to demand certain information from and to impose certain rules on all drivers, regardless of the particular contractual arrangements between the carrier and those drivers.[1] The number and nature of the government controls create an appearance of employee status. This is true even in situations where the contractual arrangements expressly disclaim any such relationship[2] and the actual practice of the parties belies any such inference. As a result, the Board and the courts have struggled to develop an appropriate rule for weighing the government regulations in the assessment of the overall factual context. The following standard can be discerned from the cases: A contractor is an employee only if there was "a layer of carrier regulation put upon the contractor beyond what was required by government regulation, impairing the contractor's independence." Local 814, International Brotherhood of Teamsters (Santini Bros., Inc.), 208 N.L.R.B. 184, 197 n.18 (1974), remanded for clarification, 512 F.2d 564 (D.C.Cir. 1975), clarified and upheld, 223 N.L.R.B. 752 (1976).

[2] For example, the leases involved in this case were preprinted forms. In certain places, where choices were to be made, the parties were to signify their intent by striking out the unwanted language, thusly: "Lessor/agrees to accept * * *." On each lease, the following sentence was entirely stricken: "The Lessee shall be responsible for the driver or drivers of subject vehicles and said driver(s) shall be employees of the Lessee."

II.

We now turn to the record to examine the factual incidents of the relationship between Tri-State and Cunningham. At this point it is necessary to introduce one more principal actor of the dramatis personae, Joseph Coss. Coss owned two truck-tractors and two flatbed trailers of the type required in Tri-State's hauling business. Cunningham had driven for Coss before. Witsberger, president of Tri-State, was looking for access to more capacity than she had at the time. Witsberger learned from another about Coss and Cunningham. She called Cunningham and the drama began to unfold.

Coss was hospitalized at the time. Cunningham, armed with a power of attorney from Coss, went to Tri-State along with Coss' wife, Violet. A lease agreement covering one tractor-trailer rig was prepared by Tri-State's general manager and executed by Violet Coss for her husband, as lessor, and Jean Witsberger, president of Tri-State, as lessee. The lease provided for various divisions of responsibility between Coss and Tri-State, many of which provisions obligated Tri-State as the result of federal and state regulations. Apart from those, lessor Coss assumed responsibility for the following items: furnishing all licenses necessary for the intended operation of his truck and trailer; payment of all fines and penalties incurred as a result of any unlawful operation of the rig; and responsibility for all maintenance costs. Tri-State undertook to insure against damage to the public and to cargo, but Coss had to insure against damage to the equipment itself. Coss was to receive seventy-five percent of the gross revenue, out of which he was to pay the driver's wages and the costs of operating the equipment.[3]

The individual who was the general manager of Tri-State during the relevant period testified that he understood Cunningham to be a driver in the employ of the owner-broker of the equipment, Coss. Witsberger testified that Violet Coss represented her husband and Cunningham as being in "sort of a partnership." Violet Coss testified that her husband and Cunningham were not in fact partners. Cunningham testified that he considered himself to be an employee of Tri-State. Witsberger, proceeding pro se, did not cross-examine Cunningham concerning any representations made at that first meeting. There were no other witnesses called who were present at that meeting.

Witsberger testified without contradiction that if Cunningham were unable to drive the Coss tractor-trailer rig, she would have to contact Coss for his permission to put some other driver on that rig. Mrs. Witsberger further testified that in order to dispatch Cunningham, unless he called in, she had to contact Joseph or Violet Coss and have one of them instruct Cunningham to check with the company. Mrs. Coss verified this routing of information was employed on several occasions.

At the outset, Cunningham supplied certain information that was recorded by Tri-State's general manager on a form entitled "Application for Employment." The application form was introduced into evidence by counsel for the General Counsel. The form was only partially completed. Another application form was submitted on behalf of the General Counsel, covering a person conceded by Tri-State to be an employee, to show that Cunningham filled out the same form as the "other" employees. The information solicited from Cunningham was no more than that required by federal regulations,[4] and it is not surprising that a company whose general manager worked only part-time did not have special pre-printed forms for non-employee drivers. More significant to us is that the classification of the conceded employee was "Road driver," whereas the classification of Cunningham was "Road driver for Broker—J. Coss." Even more significant, perhaps, is the inscription that Cunningham on July 27, 1978, was "Discharged by Broker—J. Coss," and on September 18, 1978, was reinstated by Broker—J. Coss."

[3] Cunningham's arrangement with Coss appears to have been that he would receive twenty-five percent of whatever amount Coss received from Tri-State.

[4] In fact, although the printed form seems to comport with the requirements of 49 C.F.R. § 391.21, responses were not recorded for many of the questions.

After Cunningham began driving, the first four checks for the lessor's seventy-five percent of the rig's weekly gross were made payable to Cunningham. Witsberger testified without contradiction that this arrangement was at the instruction of Coss, who did not want another source of his income jeopardized by extra earnings during the month he was hospitalized. Thereafter, having consulted his attorney regarding the matter, Coss instructed Witsberger to make the checks payable directly to him. Witsberger never made tax, social security, or other payroll deductions from the Coss-Cunningham earnings, as she did for certain other drivers who she considered to be employees of Tri-State.

On one occasion, Witsberger attempted to dispatch Cunningham on a trip to Jamesburg, New Jersey. Cunningham refused to make the trip. On direct examination by counsel for the General Counsel, he testified that his reason for refusing the run was that "we couldn't make any money on that run because we had to cross the mountains and fuel was so high and we had to pay for our own turnpike fees." He further testified that Witsberger stated that she would call Coss and that "if [Cunningham] didn't want to make the run to just park the truck.

Subsequent to the lease covering the tractor-trailer rig that was to be driven by Cunningham, Coss entered into another lease agreement with Tri-State. The second lease covered a different tractor-trailor rig that Coss personally drove. Under this lease, Coss received only sixty-two percent of the gross revenue earned by the rig. Although Coss was contractually obligated to carry the physical damage insurance on the rig, he testified that he did not have it insured and was therefore "very careful with it." At one point when he was ill, Coss had another person drive that rig. On the third trip, the person had an accident that damaged the cargo on the flatbed trailer but that did not damage the rig itself. The driver was promptly terminated. Although Coss characterized the termination decision as having been made by Witsberger with his consent, it is instructive to note that Witsberger told Coss about the accident and then he, not Witsberger, went to the driver and demanded the keys to the truck.

On November 9, 1978, Witsberger sent a letter to Coss advising him that she was terminating the leases on his two tractor-trailer rigs. The following weekend, Coss contacted Cunningham. According to Cunningham, "[Coss] said that I was laid off because she fired his truck."

III.

The ALJ acknowledged in his opinion that "much, if not all of this so-called control is dictated by Interstate Commerce Commission rules and regulations and does not necessarily create an employer-employee relationship." He went on to conclude, however, that on balance the record facts supported "a finding that although Cunningham might have been (without any specific record showing) some sort of profit sharer or agent for Coss, he was also an employee of [Tri-State]." We reach the opposite conclusion. We find that there is not substantial evidence in the record to support the finding that Cunningham was an employee of Tri-State. Instead, the record substantially supports the conclusion that Cunningham was either an employee of or a profit sharer with Joseph Coss.[5] The factors relied upon by the ALJ are for the most part expressions or consequences of the rules and regulations of the ICC and the DOT. Once those controls are stripped away, what little control remains is simply not sufficient to support the conclusion that Tri-State was an employer of Henry Cunningham qua employee. See, e.g., NLRB v. A. Duie Pyle, Inc., 606 F.2d 379 (3rd Cir. 1979); Local 814, International Brotherhood of Teamsters (Santini Bros., Inc.), 208 N.L.R.B. 184 (1974), remanded for clarification, 512 F.2d 564 (D.C.Cir.1975), clarified and upheld, 223 N.L.R.B. 752 (1976). Accordingly, the application for enforcement of the Board's order must be denied.

ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

[5] We note that at the hearing the ALJ adverted to "a lead case on this called Greyhound," noting that perhaps Cunningham was an employee of both Coss and Tri-State for purposes of the right-to-contract test. We further note that the ALJ did not base any part of his written opinion on any case involving a party named Greyhound. The ALJ expressly stated that Cunningham's relationship to Coss "is not clarified in the record." Given our conclusion that Cunningham is not an employee of Tri-State, we need not question the propriety of the ALJ's failure to clarify the nature of his relationship to Coss.

MURNAGHAN, Circuit Judge, dissenting: The case concerns whether Henry Cunningham was an "employee" of Tri-State Transport Corporation (Tri-State), and therefore covered by the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(3) (1976), or whether he possessed independent contractor, or some other inconsistent status in relation to a vehicle lessor, deemed to exclude him from the protections of the Act. Because I believe that the record as a whole evidences substantial support for the Board's view that Cunningham was an employee within the meaning of § 2(3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(3), I respectfully dissent.[1]

In the labor relations context, Congress has entrusted the Board with the principal duty of determining whether a particular person is an employee or not. Under the substantial evidence standard, where there are two "fairly conflicting views" of the matter, a reviewing court must defer to the Board's judgment. NLRB v. United Ins. Co., 390 U.S. 254, 260, 88 S.Ct. 988, 991, 19 L.Ed.2d 1083 (1968). Our mission on review is not to sift and weigh the evidence, or to choose between conflicting versions of the facts, but solely to determine whether the line the Board has drawn is reasonably based in the record. The majority view, unfortunately, allows insufficient weight to certain significant evidence upon which the Board has relied, and fails altogether to mention other facts which for the Board were dispositive. The majority decision amounts to a de novo review of Cunningham's status and concludes that Cunningham "was either an employee of or a profit sharer with Joseph Coss." At 997. There appears to be an implicit further conclusion that such status would preclude a finding that Cunningham was a Tri-State employee. With respect, I disagree with the majority's conclusions.

As a basis for departure, I first mention my agreement with the majority position that whether a particular person is an employee is to be tested under the "right to control" doctrine borrowed from the common law of agency. NLRB v. A. S. Abell Co., 327 F.2d 1, 4 (4th Cir.1964). See United Ins. Co., supra, 390 U.S. at 258, 88 S.Ct. at 990. Applying the right to control criterion has proved to be a difficult proposition for both the Board and the courts of appeal in the context of the highly regulated trucking industry in which the classic employer-employee relationship is rarely found. In the interests of responsible trucking and highway safety, government agencies such as the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) and the Department of Transportation (DOT) require carriers to adopt particular relationships to equipment lessors and exert certain types of controls over the drivers of leased vehicles. One issue is the weight to be accorded those aspects of an employment relationship that are mandated by federal regulations. As does the majority, I reject the view that the forms of employee control mandated by such regulations, merely because compelled or "involuntary," should therefore be discarded in determining employee status.

First, many employers are "involuntarily" subject to the provisions of the Act. Second, while perhaps involuntary for an employer, obedience to ICC or DOT regulations is also involuntary for the employee. If Congress and various regulatory agencies have validly required the nation's shippers or haulers to exercise considerable control over their drivers in the interest of highway safety, there is no reason why such controls should not play a significant role in determining whether certain drivers are "employees" within the meaning of the Labor Relations Act. For purposes of tort law and workers compensation, the government regulations create what has been termed a "statutory employee." White v. Excalibur Ins. Co., 599 F.2d 50, 52-53 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 965, 100 S.Ct. 452, 62 L.Ed.2d 377 F(1979). Consequently, if the overall effect of government regulations is to require someone to exercise employerlike controls over a particular person, he is nonetheless an employee. Congress contemplated that such a statutory employee should be accorded the labor Act's protections against potential abuses of employer power, even though the employer might have preferred a relationship other than that of employer-employee.

Recognizing that the right to control, and not the reason for its existence, is the crucial element, apparently every reviewing court decision in the trucking context relies on regulatory mandates as significant, if not definitive, factors in resolving the question of whether a particular driver is an employee. See, e.g., NLRB v. A Duie Pyle, Inc., 606 F.2d 379, 385 (3d Cir.1979); NLRB v. Deaton, Inc., 502 F.2d 1221, 1225 (5th Cir.1975), cert. denied, 442 U.S. 1047, 95 S.Ct. 2665, 45 L.Ed.2d 700 (1975). Therefore, we are called upon carefully to consider all incidents governing the actual relationship between the parties, see United Ins. Co., supra, 390 U.S. at 258–60, 88 S.Ct. at 990–91, without regard to whether some of the control derives from government regulation. See Doran Hauling & Rigging Co., v. NLRB, 462 F.2d 190, 194 (6th Cir.1972). Furthermore, and in any event, the Board relied on ample evidence showing that Tri-State exercised controls over Cunningham that substantially exceeded Tri-State controls arguably mandated by federal regulations.

[1] Obviously, this is not to say that, acting independently as a finder of fact, I would have reached the same result as the NLRB. I conclude only that there was substantial evidence to support the decision which the NLRB reached.

Evidence received at the hearing showed that Cunningham, an unemployed driver, had accompanied Violet Coss, wife of Joseph Coss, to negotiate the equipment lease.[2] The same day, Cunningham filled out an "Application for Employment" required by Tri-State of all its employees.[3] In accordance with federal regulations governing "regularly employed drivers," Cunningham was given a physical examination and a truckdriving test.[4] Significantly, the lease gave Tri-State "exclusive possession, control, and use of equipment for the duration of this Agreement." See Deaton, supra, 502 F.2d at 1225 ("Control over trucks involves control over drivers"). Tri-State also assumed responsibility for insuring the truck and the driver for public liability and property damage.

Over and beyond the "involuntary" incidents to which we have referred, and which constitute evidence that an employer-employee relationship existed between Tri-State and Cunningham, the Board also relied on extensive record evidence showing that Tri-State, as a matter of choice and not as a consequence of ICC or DOT mandates, repeatedly and directly exercised controls over Cunningham's work. The controls took three distinct forms: first, the evidence was abundant and uncontradicted that Jean Witsberger, President of Tri-State, held herself out to Cunningham, Coss, and Coss' wife as Cunningham's "boss,", and imposed upon Cunningham a special code of conduct; second, Tri-State exercised direct and immediate supervision of Cunningham's work; and third, Tri-State enforced certain rules that effectively prevented Cunningham from seeking or accepting other work.

First, the evidence showed that Tri-State held itself out as Cunningham's employer. Under General Counsel examination, Cunningham testified without contradiction that, after he had filled out the employment application and passed the tests, Witsberger took him aside, and, in private, gave him instructions:

> Q. Who did you talk to after you completed all of these application procedures?
> A. Jean Witsberger.
> Q. What do you recall being said at that time?

[2] Cunningham stated at the hearing that he possessed a power of attorney from Coss to negotiate the equipment lease. However, Violet Coss, not Cunningham, actually signed the lease. Moreover, Cunningham stated that the parties did not bargain over the terms of the lease. Therefore, there is little significance in the fact that Cunningham may have assisted Violet Coss on behalf of the hospitalized Joe Coss.

[3] The majority opinion dismisses the significance of Tri-State's giving Cunningham an "Application for Employment" to fill out for several reasons. First, it states that the application "was only partially completed," implying that substantial sections were left blank. However, the form was as complete as a similar form introduced into evidence, which had been submitted by an admitted Tri-State employee. Cunningham responded to each section of the three-page form, leaving blank such items as "reason for [previously] leaving [Tri-State]" when he had already indicated he had never previously worked for the company. Second, the majority suggests the application solicited only information "required by federal regulations." However, federal regulations specifically exempt carriers from requiring applications of "a person who is not a regularly employed driver * * * [or who drives] on an intermittent, casual, or occasional basis," or who is a regularly employed driver of another carrier. See 49 C.F.R. 391.63, 391.65 (1977). If, as suggested by the majority, Cunningham was employed by another carrier, Cunningham need not have filed this information. Therefore, Cunningham's filling out the application suggests he did something more than required by federal regulations. Cunningham indicated on his application form that he was not currently employed.

Third, the majority speculates that "it is not surprising that a company whose general manager worked only part-time did not have special preprinted forms for non-employee drivers." At 996. However, neither should it surprise us that a company that hired Cunningham as its employee might use the same form required of other employees. Moreover, there was no testimony to the effect that Tri-State did not have forms for non-employee drivers. The Board was entitled to point to the "Application for Employment" as evidence of Cunningham's employee status.

Finally, the majority opinion gives no weight to the fact that, in response to the application inquiry "are you now employed?" Cunningham wrote "no." And, in a space denominated "Applicant hired/rejected," a Tri-State official had checked the "hired" space and written in the "date employed" as June 10, 1978.

[4] Also in accordance with government regulations, the leased equipment bore Tri-State's name and address.

A. She said that she leased the truck and I was hired as a driver.

Q. Do you recall anything else?

A. She said I was hired and was working for Jean Witsberger not Joe Coss, and I was not to have any unauthorized passengers, no hitchhikers, and no female passengers, and there would be no moonlighting or we would be dismissed, and if we didn't turn our logs in on time we wouldn't get paid.

Q. Do you recall anything else being said at that time?

A. She said that there would be no drinking, or loafing in the shop or we would be dismissed.[5]

Some of the instructions directed to Cunningham by Witsberger (no drinking while driving, e.g.) are mandated by law.[6] Some (e.g., loafing in the shop, moonlighting, turning in of logs on time) are not. The substance of Witsberger's instructions possesses the character of an employer's charge to its employee. Combined with Witsberger's demand, as stated by the ALJ, "that Cunningham follow only her instructions," the demand for compliance with the employee code of driver behavior, no matter how reasonable or unreasonable the rules it contained, structured Cunningham's working environment in a manner supportive of the Board's conclusion that Cunningham was an employee subject to Tri-State's control. See Aetna Freight Lines v. NLRB, 520 F.2d 928, 931 (6th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 424 U.S. 910, 96 S.Ct. 1105, 47 L.Ed.2d 314 (1976). The majority opinion is altogether silent on that testimony, and consequently accorded it no significance.

In addition to the content of the instructions, it is worth noting the context in which they were made. After directing Cunningham to complete an application form and take tests required of other employees, Witsberger excused a bystander—Mrs. Coss—in order to instruct Cunningham in Tri-State's special rules of employee conduct, without an outsider present. Referring to the time of the initial signing of the lease, Mrs. Coss testified under cross-examination by Witsberger that "I assumed he was your [Tri-State's] driver, if you recall you asked me if I would step outside for a 1001 while, you wanted to instruct your driver in privacy, and I went out on the porch at that time, [and in] approximately ten or fifteen minutes you opened the door and told me I could come back in."

Moreover, that Witsberger, not Coss, possessed the authority to hire and fire Cunningham is illustrated by each incident in which there was conflict between Witsberger and Cunningham.[7] For example, Witsberger, not Coss, threatened to discharge Cunningham after she learned he might have carried an unauthorized female passenger. Further, Cunningham was required to accept all dispatch assignments directly from Tri-State; this too supports the Board's conclusion that Tri-State exercised control over Cunningham. On one occasion, Cunningham initially refused to make a run to Jamesburg, New Jersey, because, since Tri-State's drivers received a percentage of the gross, he thought he would lose money. However, after Witsberger became angry, Cunningham decided to make the run rather than risk losing his job. Again, it was Witsberger, not Coss, who prevailed on Cunningham to make the run. Indeed, Coss testified that since he, too, lost money on the run, he would have told Cunningham not to make the run if he had thought it would do any good. Yet Witsberger's wishes were the ones that counted.

On several other occasions, according to Cunningham, Witsberger in direct communication with him emphasized that she, not Coss, was the "boss." The term certainly carries the connotation of "employer." Additionally, Coss testified about two instances in the first of which Witsberger "made the rules clear that she was the boss[;] I tried to interrupt her once and she said to me[']I am not through talking[']." On the second occasion, when Cunningham was refusing to make the Jamesburg run, Coss told Witsberger "Jean, you are his boss, I am not his boss, you ordered him to take it, you do what you want to * * *." [8] Again, the testimony, although not mentioned by the majority, supports the Board's conclusion.

[5] Joe Coss testified that Witsberger subsequently repeated the conversation to him. His version of what occurred was substantially the same as Cunningham's version. Moreover, President Witsberger admitted the conversation occurred, though she contended that the rules were required by DOT regulations.

[6] Even as to the requirements mandated by regulation, a word should be said about the penalty for infraction. A federal regulation forbids drivers from drinking. See 49 C.F.R. § 392.5. But the regulation neither requires a lecture on the rule by the carrier, nor necessitates that, for infraction of the regulation, the driver be dismissed.

[7] As support for its belief that Cunningham was an employee of Coss, not Tri-State, the majority points to an incident in which a driver of another of Coss' vehicles was involved in an accident and Coss, not Witsberger, took the other driver's keys away. Whatever probative value the symbolic act of collecting keys from the other driver has for suggesting that Coss was his employer, the issue here is Cunningham's status.

Turning from assertions by Tri-State of employer status over Cunningham to evidence that Tri-State in fact exercised direct and immediate supervision over Cunningham's work, it should be observed that it was Tri-State, not Coss, who dispatched Cunningham on various trips, told him where to go, what loads to pick up, and where to deliver the loads. The Witsberger sometimes left messages with the Coss's for Cunningham to call in does not support the majority declaration that dispatch information was "routed" through Joe Coss. At 996. No one testified that Coss ever personally directed Cunningham where to go or what loads to pick up. On the contrary, Tri-State's dispatch procedure called for Witsberger, not Coss, to direct Cunningham to his destination. Tri-State set the schedule of hours and driving timetables, and checked his activities through the use of logs. If Cunningham did not already know what route to follow, he checked with Tri-State, not Coss. When he reached the end of a run, he was to call Witsberger, not Coss, for instructions regarding any backhaul. The long distance phone calls were paid for by Tri-State. Upon returning from a run, Cunningham would again contact Witsberger. The occasional use of Coss as a relay for getting the message to Cunningham provides no necessary inference that Coss controlled Cunningham's routes, or, indeed, contributed in any way to the content of the message. Substantial evidence supports the Board's conclusion that Witsberger dispatched Cunningham and that she did not go through Coss in controlling Cunningham's movements.

In Aetna Freight Lines, supra, 520 F.2d at 930, the court relied primarily upon two indicia of control, in addition to the elements imposed by governmental regulation, in sustaining a Board finding that an employer/employee relationship existed. First, Aetna exercised control over the hiring and firing of drivers by "employing lease cancellation as a means of enforcing driver discipline and discharge." Id. at 930. Here, Witsberger once threatened to discharge Cunningham after she learned he might have carried a female passenger.[9] Moveover, Cunningham made the Jamesburg run out of fear he would otherwise lose his job. Finally, when Cunningham refused to break the strike, the same day Witsberger indeed cancelled the equipment lease, and, accordingly, Cunningham's employment "partly in retaliation for Cunningham's refusal to cross [Tri-State's] employees' picket line," in the words of the ALJ. The company's retention of the right to discharge Cunningham is a further indication of his employee status.

Second, in Aetna, drivers took complaints to and received instructions concerning daily tasks from Aetna, and not the equipment owner. Here, like the employer in Aetna, Tri-State directly supervised and gave daily instructions to Cunningham. Tri-State did all dispatching, and required Cunningham to report directly to it, not to Coss. In addition, when Cunningham did not know what routes to take, he asked Witsberger. Finally, Cunningham retained little discretion over whether to accept particular assignments, a conclusion aptly illustrated by the Jamesburg incident. In sum, to quote the ALJ below, "[Tri-State] exercised virtually complete control over Cunningham's hours of work and other conditions of employment."

Other courts have reached results similar to Aetna. In NLRB v. Deaton, Inc. supra, 502 F.2d at 1226–28, for example, the court upheld a Board finding that nonowner drivers of leased vehicles were employees where, in addition to the controls mandated by federal regulations, the carrier (1) exercised power over the qualifications of the drivers that were hired beyond that required by law, and (2) exercised power over a driver's conduct by threatening the equipment owner with lease cancellation. See also News-Journal Co. v. NLRB, 447 F.2d 65 (3d Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 1016, 92 S.Ct. 676, 30 L.Ed.2d 664 (1972); Frank Hager, Inc., 230 NLRB 476, 477 n.10 (1977) (owner-operators are employees where carrier exercised control over "the assignment of runs, including the distance, the nature of the load, and to whom they deliver, the maintenance of their equipment, the selection of their insurance, and the performance standards with which they must comply").

[8] The majority refers to Witsberger's testimony that if Cunningham were unable to drive the leased vehicles, "she would have to contact Coss for his permission to put some other driver on that rig." At 996. However, President Witsberger admitted that her statement was purely hypothetical as the situation had never arisen. The ALJ described no significance to Witsberger's conjecture in the heat of litigation. Furthermore, the terms of the lease contradict Witsberger's assertion. The lease provided that Tri-State "shall have exclusive possession, control, and use of equipment for the duration of this Agreement." While the lease vests explicit authority over the vehicle in Tri-State, it says nothing about Coss' authority to approve a driver. In any case, even if Coss' approval of a substitute driver would have been required, little light is thereby cast upon Cunningham's relationship to Tri-State. There is nothing surprising about an arangement between the lessor and the lessee of equipment by which the lessor would only permit it to be operated by a lessee employee approved by lessor.

[9] Cunningham's version of the event was corroborated by Coss. Coss testified about a conversation with President Witsberger in which she told him of her suspicion and stated that if she ever caught Cunningham with a female rider she would discharge him. Tri-State made no effort to discredit the story, of which the versions of Cunningham and Coss were consistent and which supported a conclusion that Cunningham was an employee of Tri-State.

The situation here is even stronger than that in Aetna, et al. Unlike Aetna, Tri-State held itself out as Cunningham's employer. Tri-State established detailed rules of day-to-day conduct for all its drivers, including both Cunningham and Coss (who also, on occasion, drove for Tri-State), infraction of which risked immediate termination. Thus, the parties' practices and understandings support the Board's conclusion that Cunningham was Tri-State's employee.

Finally, indicative all on its own of the employer-employee relationship existing between Tri-State and Cunningham was Tri-State's insistence that Cunningham not engage in any backhauling on his own. The work Cunningham performed was performed exclusively for Tri-State. At the end of a run, Cunningham was required to return empty to the plant unless Tri-State had a pickup to assign him. Cunningham simply did not have the characteristics of an independent contractor when he depended solely on Tri-State for direction. The prohibition upon backhauling indicates that Cunningham lacked an enterpreneurial interest that diverged from Tri-State's. As pointed out below by the Administrative Law Judge, Tri-State's ban on moonlighting effectively gave it control over the amount of Cunningham's earnings.

In Ace Doran Hauling & Rigging Co. v. NLRB, supra, 462 F.2d at 194 (enforcing Board determination of employee status where drivers drove exclusively for company, and performed duties similar to those of other employees, even though driver-owners could refuse trips and were permitted to backhaul), the "exclusivity" principle was utilized to distinguish between those drivers who were employees because they "dr[o]ve 'exclusively' for Ace," and those who also performed other, unrelated work for the truckowner and were therefore nonemployees. See also News-Journal Co. v. NLRB, supra, 447 F.2d at 68 (upholding Board finding of employee status because the Board considered, among other factors, "the possibility of realizing additional profits through the exercise of enterpreneurial skill"). The absence of any possibility of Cunningham's realizing additional profits supports the Board's conclusion that he was Tri-State's employee.

The majority relies heavily on the method by which Cunningham was paid to support its assertion ab initio that Cunningham "was either an employee of or a profit sharer with Joseph Coss." At 997. It is true that the lease stated that Coss would receive "75% of gross revenue, including all driver wages and fringes which are the responsibility of the lessor [Coss]." However, the provision pertains to the method by which whoever drove the vehicle would receive payment, and itself sheds no light on the particular issue of what Cunningham was required to do, and of who supervised his activities. Indeed, uncontradicted hearing testimony indicates that Witsberger explicitly told Cunningham he would be paid 25% of the gross, because "her drivers get 25%." Further, even despite lease language to the contrary, when Cunningham first began driving the Coss equipment for Tri-State, Tri-State deducted Cunningham's 25% share from the rental, paid that directly to Cunningham, and then transmitted the balance to Coss. In addition, the ALJ found that Tri-State required Cunningham to maintain a trip log which had to be correctly maintained and turned over to it before Cunningham, as well as Coss, would be paid. That Tri-State, whose general manager wrote the lease, chose an indirect method by which to pay Cunningham cannot obscure the fact that it set the percentage of his wages and controlled his total income by virtue of its control over his driving assignments.[10]

[10] In footnote 3. At 996, the majority opinion hypothesizes: "Cunningham's arrangement with Coss appears to have been that he would receive twenty-five percent of whatever amount Coss received from Tri-State." The record contains no evidence that Coss and Cunningham ever made any such agreement. The only evidence pertaining to the percentage Cunningham would receive was Witsberger's statement to Cunningham that "her drivers get 25%."

Continued

Even were the majority correct in asserting that Cunningham was either an employee of or profit sharer with Coss, such conclusion does not resolve Cunningham's relationship to Tri-State. In Boire v. Greyhound Corp., 376 U.S. 473, 481, 84 S.Ct. 894, 898, 11 L.Ed.2d 849 (1964), the Supreme Court affirmed that two employers may exercise sufficient control over an employee to qualify as a "joint employer." In Boire, the Board had found that Greyhound had contracted with another company to provide janitorial services at four terminals. While the independent contractor "hired, paid, disciplined, transferred, promoted and discharged the employees, Greyhound took part in setting up work schedules, in determining the number of employees required to meet those schedules, and in directing the work of the employees in question." 376 U.S. at 475, 84 S.Ct. at 895. In addition, the Board had found that Greyhound had prompted the discharge of a cleaning employee and that the independent contractor's supervisor visited the terminals irregularly. Id. Subsequent to the Supreme Court's decision, the Fifth Circuit enforced the Board determination that Greyhound was a joint employer. NLRB v. Greyhound Corp., 368 F.2d 778 (5th Cir. 1966). In light of Boire, surely the evidence relied on here by the Board is sufficient to support its decision that Tri-State was Cunningham's employer. Even if the evidence is given the gloss put on by the majority, at best we would face two conflicting versions of the facts in which event the Board's interpretation controls. See United Ins., supra, 390 U.S. at 260, 88 S.Ct. at 991.

There is another important reason for affirming the Board's decision. While there is no evidence in the case of intentional evasion of the Act, a ruling contrary to the Board's will encourage other employers to seek to expand the "nonemployee" category constructed by today's decision through unconventional arrangements with their employees.

Therefore, since the Board's order is supported by substantial evidence in the record as a whole, I would grant the application for enforcement.[11]

The majority also points out that Tri-State did not make payroll deductions from Cunningham's earnings, although it did so for its other employees. Nothing in the record indicates who, if anyone, complied with legal requirements that payroll deductions of that nature be made.

[11] Tri-State also contended that it was denied a fair hearing because, though it had engaged an attorney, it was represented at the hearing only by its president, Jean Witsberger, who is not an attorney. Tri-State neither requested a delay in the hearing, nor gave any indication to the ALJ that it preferred to appear with counsel. Additionally, although midway through the proceeding President Witsberger indicated that Tri-State's counsel was tied up elsewhere that day, she did not request postponement. Ms. Witsberger, president of an interstate carrier, was accorded great latitude in presenting her case to the ALJ, who also gave her assistance.

In factfinding proceedings such as this, a pro se litigant undoubtedly struggles at a grave disadvantage when opposed by attorneys well-versed in the legal significance attached to certain facts, and skilled in the art of exposing them to a hearing officer. However, the Labor Relations Act allows a party to choose its representative in appearing in Board proceedings, see 29 U.S.C. § 160(b) (1976), including a nonattorney. See Tred-Air of California, Inc., 193 NLRB 672, 673 (1971), enforced, 82 LRRM 2080 (9th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 411 U.S. 906, 93 S.Ct. 1529, 36 L.Ed.2d 195 (1973) (corporation may be represented by its president). Absent evidence that Tri-State objected to proceeding at the hearing without counsel, the case raises no tenable issue of due process. Local Union No. 742, UBCJA v. NLRB, 377 F.2d 929 (D.C. Cir. 1967).

Beaird-Poulan Division, Emerson Electric Company v. NLRB

On remand from 571 F.2d 432

Before BRIGHT and MCMILLIAN, Circuit Judges, and RENNER,* District Judge

MCMILLIAN, Circuit Judge: The Beaird-Poulan Division of Emerson Electric Company (the Company) petitions this court to review and set aside the supplemental decision and order [1] of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued on February 25, 1980. The Board had overruled the Company's objections to the representation election and found that the Company violated § 8(a) (5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., by refusing to bargain with the United Auto Workers Union (the Union), as the duly certified representative of the Company's employees. The Board cross-petitions, pursuant to § 10(e) of the Act, for enforcement of its order.

*The Honorable Robert G Renner, United States District Judge for the District of Minnesota, sitting by designation.

For the reasons discussed below, the Company's petition to set aside is denied and the Board's order is enforced in full.

The Company, a Missouri corporation, has two plants for the manufacture of chain saws in Shreveport, Louisiana. In mid-February of 1976, the Union began its organizational campaign at these two plants. The Company actively opposed the Union's organizational campaign. All participants agree that the campaign was intense and vigorous.

On April 30, 1976, pursuant to a stipulation for certification upon consent election, the Board conducted a secret ballot election. The tally showed that 402 ballots were cast for the Union, 383 ballots were cast against the Union, and 10 ballots were challenged. On May 19, the Union requested the Company to recognize and bargain collectively with it. Since that date, the Company has continued to refuse such requests.

The Company filed timely objections to the election. After investigating these objections and considering the evidence submitted by the Company, the Regional Director made credibility resolutions adverse to the Company. He recommended to the Board that each Company objection be overruled and that the Union be certified as the bargaining representative. The Company filed timely objections to the Regional Director's report. The Company asked the Board to review and set aside the election or, in the alternative, to order a hearing to resolve the factual issues. On November 23, 1976, the Board rejected the Company's request for a hearing, overruled the objections, and certified the Union as exclusive bargaining representative.

On December 13, 1976, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board. The Board's General Counsel issued a complaint alleging that the Company's refusal to bargain with the Union violated § 8(a) (5) and (1) of the Act. The Company admitted its refusal to bargain but contended that it had no duty to bargain because the Board improperly certified the Union. Thereafter, on May 25, 1977, the Board granted the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment. The Board also held that the Company had failed to raise substantial or material issues which would warrant an evidentiary hearing.

The Company then petitioned this court for review. On March 2, 1978, the Board's cross-application for enforcement was denied and the case was remanded for a hearing on the alleged misconduct in the representation election. The salient language in that opinion was the following: "Although we make no factual findings with regard to the alleged misconduct, we do find that the company presented specific allegations of misconduct sufficient to set aside the election, if true, and is entitled to an evidentiary hearing." Beaird-Poulan Division, Emerson Electric Co. v. NLRB, 571 F.2d 432, 434 (8th Cir. 1978).

After nine days of hearings, the administrative law judge (ALJ) recommended to the Board that the Company's objections be overruled. On February 25, 1980, the Board adopted the findings and recommendations of the ALJ, affirming the Union's certification and finding that the Company violated § 8(a) (5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to bargain. Because of that decision, the Company once again filed a petition for review in this court.

It is axiomatic that representation elections are not to be set aside lightly. The burden of showing grounds for doing so is on the party seeking to overturn the election. And that burden is a heavy one, requiring the objecting party to show by specific evidence not only that improprieties occurred, but also that they interfered with employees' exercise of free choice to such an extent that they materially affected the election results. NLRB v. Mattison Machine Works, 365 U.S. 123, 124, 81 S.Ct. 434, 435, 5 L.Ed.2d 455 (1961); NLRB v. Griffith Oldsmobile, Inc., 455 F.2d 867, 871 (8th Cir. 1972).

I. The Coercive Incidents

The Company argues that the Board's decision overruling its objections to the election is not supported by substantial evidence. It contends that the Union conducted a campaign of fear and intimidation, including predictions of violence and economic detriment to employees opposed to the Union, which permeated the entire atmosphere thereby destroying the laboratory conditions required by the Board in its election proceedings.

For review of the Board's decision, the standard is whether the Board acted within the "wide degree of discretion" vested in it by Congress regarding representation matters. NLRB v. A.J. Tower Co., 329 U.S. 324, 330–31, 67 S.Ct. 324, 327–328, 91 L.Ed. 322 (1946); Macy's Missouri-Kansas Division v.

NLRB, 389 F.2d 835, 842 (8th Cir. 1968) "[T]he Court is bound by the fact-finder's assessment of 'credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony,' unless such assessment is 'shocking to [its] conscience.' " Keokuk Gas Service Co. v. NLRB, 580 F.2d 328, 334 (8th Cir. 1978). We look first, therefore, to the credibility determinations made by the ALJ.

The ALJ's Supplemental Decision set forth exhaustively the testimony of each witness. Regarding each of the over twenty instances of alleged misconduct, he detailed the conflicts between different witnesses' versions of the event, the internal inconsistencies in a single witness' version, or the other factors [2] that entered into his determination. Significantly, in discussing the first incident, he stated:

> As has appeared and will appear throughout this Decision, I have been unable to credit in full the testimony of any of the principal witnesses. Much of the testimony suggests a tendency to embellish or revise the facts in a direction which is favorable to the witness' own point of view. Where as here, 2 or 3 years elapsed between the events in question and the hearing, and most of the witnesses have a partisan interest in the outcome of the case, their testimony must be viewed with considerable caution.

Ultimately, the ALJ did not credit testimony about several alleged instances of misconduct, including some of the most serious charges such as brandishing a gun, threatening anti-Union employees and their families, and vandalizing Company property. He further found that several incidents including arguments, an automobile accident, an attempted break-in, and flat tires, were unrelated to the election because they were 593 personal matters or occurred after the election or were totally fortuitous. He credited accounts of five arguably coercive incidents, which we will discuss below, but concluded that they were not sufficiently serious to warrant setting aside the election.

After our reveiw of the entire record, it is difficult to imagine more detailed or better reasoned credibility findings than those made by the ALJ in this case. Because his assessments are supported by substantial evidence in the record and are not shocking to the court's conscience, we are bound by them. We will disregard, therefore, the alleged incidents which the ALJ discredited.[3]

The ALJ credited the following five incidents:

1. Employee Anether Hall, a member of the pro-Union committee, told employee Willie Daniel that the Union would take him to court because he had stopped attending Union meetings.

2. Employee Bernice Franklin testified that employee Beverly Washington told her that Beverly had said to employee Mary Windham that Mary could get hurt wearing an anti-Union sticker but that Beverly was only kidding.

3. Employee Edwin Bachman, a member of the pro-Union committee, asked employee Estelle Nugent to vote for the Union. When she replied that she did not think the employees needed a union, he said that there might be "complications," like the air let out of her tires or her tires slashed or acid poured on her car. He added that he was not implying that this would happen to her but that "there could be complications."

4. At a Company meeting for 35 to 40 employees, employee Bobby Brewer, a member of the pro-Union committee, complained that only pro-Union employees were receiving written warnings for tardiness. Employee Charles Davis defended the Company, saying that the anti-Union employees were also being subjected to the Company's tardiness program. Brewer then shook her finger at Davis and shouted, "if [you are] so damned smart why [don't you] get up there [with the Personnel Manager]" and "you better watch your white ass or someone is going to get you good, brother."

5. At another of the Company meetings, employee James Alford asked the Personnel Manager how much money the Company's president made. Employee Herbert Robinson asked Alford what difference that made. Alford retorted that he would "straighten" Robinson out.

[2] In this case, the ALJ's credibility assessments were primarily based upon his analysis of the contents of the various witnesses' testimony, rather than the demeanor of the witnesses. Particular weight is given to credibility findings based upon demeanor. Canteen Corp., 202 N.L.R.B. 767, 769, 82 L.R.R.M. 1748 (1973). A court may make an independent evaluation of credibility findings based on other factors. Id. But the court must still defer to credibility findings, based on other factors, which have sufficient support in the record.

[3] The Company has cited numerous cases for the proposition that threats such as those discredited here are sufficient to warrant setting aside an election. E. g. NLRB v. Van Gorp Corp., 615 F.2d 759 (8th Cir. 1980); Wilkinson Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 456 F.2d 298, 304 (8th Cir. 1972); Gabriel Co., 137 N.L.R.B. 1252, 50 L.R. R.M. 1369 (1962). The obvious distinction, however, is that in the cited authorities the allegations were credited, whereas here they were not.

None of these direct or implied threats was ever carried out.

We turn next to the ALJ's conclusion that the credited incidents did not warrant setting aside the election. Having made creditibility assessements and findings of fact, the ALJ proceeded to make conclusions of law about the effect of the five credited incidents, which he concluded "fell far short of demonstrating a pattern of intimidation directed at anti-union employees or even at a single anti-union employee."

He defined the scope on remand thusly:

> I reject the Company's argument in its brief that my sole function in deciding this case is to resolve the credibility questions posed by the evidence concerning the Company's objections. The Board's order directing a hearing in accordance with the Court's remand, specifically rejects that the Administrative Law Judge hearing this proceeding shall prepare a decision containing findings of fact, conclusions of law and recommendations. The Company's argument is based on the premise that the Court of Appeals resolved all of the legal issues in this case when it held that a hearing was warranted. That premise is erroneous. The Court could not and did not resolve these questions, because the factual record was incomplete. Rather, the Court simply held, in essence, that the Company came forward with evidence which if fully credited, unexplained or uncontradicted by credible evidence and interpreted in a manner most favorable to the Company's position, would warrant setting aside the election. Insofar as the Court cited decisional authority in support of its conclusion, I have considered and, where appropriate, discussed those authorities insofar as they are applicable or inapplicable to the facts as determined in this Supplemental Decision.

The Company again asserts that our previous decision is the "law of the case," citing Synalloy Corp., Blackman-Uhler Chemical Division 239 N.LR.B. 637, 99 L.R. R.M. 1702 (1978). In short, the Company urges that we had considered already the specific allegations of misconduct and determined that they were "sufficient to warrant setting aside the election, if true * * *."

We must agree with the ALJ, however, that the above-quoted language was not intended to limit the scope of authority of the Board. There were over twenty specific allegations of misconduct; all but five were discredited. In fact, all of the incidents that this court listed as "examples of alleged violence and intimidation," 571 F.2d at 434 n.2, were discredited. The opinion gave no guidance on the effect of any single incident or of any combination of incidents. We did not hold that each incident "if true" was sufficient to warrant setting aside the election. Until the facts were determined, this court could not and did not determine their legal effect. Therefore, the ALJ correctly developed a full record and reached conclusions of law.

"In election proceedings, it is the Board's function to provide a laboratory in which an experiment may be conducted, under conditions as ideal as possible to determine the uninhibited desires of the employees * * *." General Shoe Corp., 77 N.L.R.B 124, 127 (1948). An election will be overturned where the objecting party has proven the occurrence of violence or threats of violence. A distinction is made, however, between coercive actions undertaken by a party and coercive actions undertaken by individual employees or third parties. Because "neither unions nor employers can prevent misdeeds * * * by persons over whom they have no control," less weight is given to misconduct by individual employees or third parties. NLRB v. Griffith Oldsmobile, Inc., supra, 455 F.2d at 870. Accordingly, where the threats or violence are not attributable to the union or the employer, the election will be overturned only if the coercive actions have created "an atmosphere of fear and reprisal such as to render free expression of choice impossible" Id. A small number of isolated and non-coercive threats would not be sufficient to justify setting aside the election. Abbott Laboratories v. NLRB, 540 F.2d 662, 665–67 (4th Cir. 1976) ("rough talk" not sufficient).

The Company has proven five threats. Nowhere does the Company maintain that these threats were either authorized or condoned by the Union, but the Company does argue strenuously that three of the incidents were attributable to the Union because pro-Union committee members had apparent authority to act on behalf of the Union. We agree with the ALJ, however, that the pro-Union committee was a "large and amorphous" group whose members were not viewed by the employees as Union agents. See Certain Teed Products Corp. v. NLRB, 562 F.2d 500, 509–10 (7th Cir. 1977) (campaign activity alone does not establish the requisite close connection with the union). Compare NLRB v. Georgetown Dress Corp., 537 F.2d 1239 (4th Cir. 1976) (committee was union's only contact with workers; no professional organizers). Therefore, this election will be overturned only if the five threats created "an atmosphere of fear and reprisal."

The Company has recited numerous incidents which allegedly coerced anti-Union employees and created "an atmosphere of fear and reprisal." But the testimony relied upon by the Company to establish several of these incidents has been expressly discredited, and the Company failed to prove that several of the remaining incidents were related to the election campaign. The ALJ found that only five incidents actually occurred, were potentially coercive and were related to the election campaign. Moreover, none of the five credited incidents involved Union representatives or employees acting as agents of the Union, and none resulted in any physical harm of violence. Compare NLRB v. Van Gorp Corp., 615 F.2d 759 (8th Cir. 1980) (escalating threats culminating in an act of violence). Once the discredited and unrelated incidents are omitted, the Company is left contending that five empty threats, occurring during a ten-week election campaign involving over 800 eligible voters, so tainted the election process that it was an abuse of discretion to allow the election results to stand. We reject that contention and, therefore, affirm the ALJ's conclusion that the arguably coercive threats did not warrant setting aside the election.

II. Misleading Handbill

The Company also contends that, immediately before the election, the Union made material misrepresentations in a handbill about a contract between the Union and another employer, namely Huck Manufacturing Company (Huck).

Beginning on April 22, 1976, at small group meetings held for its employees, the Company began to review the Union's record after it organized employees at Huck. Using the chart entitled "UAW Promises vs. Performance," the Company spokesman made the point that, despite the Union's preelection promises there, the Union had been unable to negotiate improvements or sign a labor contract at Huck. Employees began to question the Union representative about the situation at Huck.

On April 29, between 6 a.m. and 7 a.m.—less than twenty-four hours before the polls were to open—the Union issued a handbill with "The Huck Story." The handbill stated in relevant part:

> The UAW and Huck entered negotiations for a contract at Waco, Texas. Negotiations have now been completed and a contract agreed upon by the UAW and Huck and accepted by the members
> The UAW-Huck contract provides:
> 1) Fully paid Hospitalization Insurance for the employee and their dependents
> 2) Fully paid sick and accident insurance that pays the employee 50% of his base rate up to fifty-two (52) weeks, Example—An assembler at Huck, under the UAW-Huck contract earns $4.47 per hour—or $178.80 for a 40 hour week. If sick and disabled, this assembler will draw sick benefits of $89.40 a week for an illness up to 52 weeks.
> 3) Wage rate up to $5.73, per hour.
> 4) A $9,000 Company paid life insurance policy.

(Emphasis in original.)

The handbill thus contained four questionable statements. First, Huck had no "assemblers" and no assembly line operation whatsover, whereas about one-third of the Company employees were assemblers. Apparently the handbill referred to Huck's "assembly-band annealer set up," which is a higher job classification. Second, the non-existent "assemblers" classification at Huck was listed as earning $1.17 per hour more than the actual assemblers at the Company. Third, the Union and Huck had not executed a contract. Although the Union had "agreed upon" the substantive terms, when it signed Huck's proposed agreement, it changed the duration clause. As a result, Huck broke off negotations and the contract was not executed.[4] Fourth, the proposed contract, which was not in effect in any event, provided for $6,000 in current insurance benefits with an eventual increase to $9,000.

Between 9 a.m. and 11:30 a.m. of that same morning, the Company posted its response. The Union's flier was annotated, enlarged to poster size and placed on all the main plant's bulletin boards.[5] The annotations reiterated that no contract was in effect at Huck, stated that Huck employees had a $6,000 life insurance policy, and asserted that the Huck "assemblers" did not perform work comparable to the Company's assemblers. They did not, however, clarify that Huck had no employees classified as "assemblers" because the company did not learn this fact until after the election.

The ALJ found that Huck was not a major campaign issue. He also found that the statements in the union flier were "either literally true, or believed to be true by the parties involved, although each statement was arguably misleading." For example, it was "literally true" that the union membership had accepted the contract, although the contract was not executed. Similarly, it was "literally true" that the contract provided for certain benefits, although the contract was never in effect. On the other hand, the Union "believed" that it had a contract with Huck because, on April 3, the Union notified Huck that the Union accepted Huck's proposed contract. It was not until May 6—after the certification election at the Company—that the Union's international representative altered the duration clause of the proposed contract, and not until May 17, that Huck broke off negotiations and the contract.

Therefore, the ALJ held that there was no misrepresentation which would warrant setting aside the election. Alternatively, he found that the Company had had an adequate opportunity to respond to the handbill prior to the election.

In assessing preelection campaign statements for both employers and unions, the Board does not ordinarily "police or censor propaganda used in the elections it conducts, but rather leaves to the good sense of the voters the appraisal of such matters, and to opposing parties the task of correcting inaccuracies and unlawful statements." Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers, 383 U.S. 53, 60, 86 S.Ct 657, 662, 15 L.Ed.2d 582 (1966) citing Stewart-Warner Corp., 102 N.L.R.B. 1153, 1158, 31 L.R.R.M. 1397, 1399 (1953). The standard for reviewing alleged campaign misrepresentations is the following:

> [A]n election * * * [will] be set aside only where there has been a misrepresentation or other similar campaign trickery, which involves a substantial departure from the truth, at a time which prevents the other party or parties from making an effective reply, so that the misrepresentation, whether deliberate or not, may reasonably be expected to have a significant impact on the election * * *. [E]ven where a misrepresentation is shown to have been substantial, the Board may still refuse to set aside the election if it finds upon consideration of all the circumstances that the statement would not be likely to have a real impact on the election.

ITT Blackburn Co. v. NLRB, 545 F.2d 58 (8th Cir. 1976), citing Hollywood Ceramics Co., Inc., 140 N.L.R.B. 221, 224, 51 L.R.R.M. 1600, 1601–02 (1962). The burden is on the objecting party to prove prejudice to the fairnesss of the election. NLRB v. Target Stores, Inc., 547 F.2d 421, 424 (8th Cir. 1977).

The wording of the handbill may have implied that the Huck contract was in effect or that the Huck employees were currently receiving benefits provided in that contract. The ALJ's conclusion that these did not amount to material misrepresentations is nevertheless supported by substantial evidence. First, the references to the status of the contract were literally true. Second, the contract terms were actually negotiated by the Union but were not in effect for a reason that was beyond the Union's knowledge. See NLRB v. Southern Health Corp., 514 F.2d 1121, 1125 (7th Cir. 1975) (negotiated terms exceeded wage stabilization guidelines; distinguishing cases where a union took credit for terms it had not negotiated).

The ALJ's conclusion that the "assembler" wage rate was not a material misrepresentation is not, however, supported by substantial evidence. Misrepresentations about wages "go to what is perhaps the most crucial issue of any organization effort: whether the company is paying the bargaining unit employees as much as it would if the employees were represented by the union." J.I. Case Co. v. NLRB, 555 F.2d 202, 205 (8th Cir. 1977). See La-Cresent Constant Care Center, Inc. v. NLRB, 510 F.2d 1319 (8th Cir. 1975). The ALJ noted that Huck had no employees in the classification of "assembler" and further that there was no basis for comparing the functions of the Huck employees at the higher wage rate with the assemblers at the Company. Almost one-third of the employees at the Company were assemblers. Therefore, the statement in the Union handbill that "assemblers" at Huck earned more, under a Union contract, than non-Union assemblers did at the Company could reasonably be expected to affect significantly the outcome of the election.

[4] Subsequently the Union lost a decertification election at Huck, so the Union and Huck never did have an executed contract.

[5] The Company poster actually preceded the Union flier to the satellite plant. There the poster arrived at 3:45 p.m. on the 29th, and the flier arrived on the morning of the 30th, just before the election.

The issue remains, then, whether the Company had an adequate opportunity to reply to the misrepresentation about "assembler" wage rates.

"Adequate time to reply must mean adequate time to make an effective reply * * *. [A] last minute bare denial cannot be an effective reply." Cross Baking Co. v. NLRB, 453 F.2d 1346, 1350 (1st Cir. 1971). It is particularly difficult for an employer to rebut a union's misrepresentations about the terms of a contract it negotiated because "workers would be likely to give special weight to a Union official's interpretation of the language of a collective bargaining agreement to which the Union is a party * * *." NLRB v. Van Gorp Corp., supra, 615 F.2d at 762 (union representative reinforced misrepresentation by quoting from contract which was complex and confusing). It has been held that a company does not have an adequate opportunity to reply to a letter first circulated the day before the election where "[t]he claims of the union were largely based upon calculations using figures derived from other unidentified calculations. Any reply would necessarily have required careful preparation." J.I. Case Co. v. NLRB, supra, 555 F.2d at 207.

This situation can be distinguished, however, from a "last minute bare denial" or a reply necessitating "careful preparation." In fact, the Company had already disseminated the correct information during its employee meetings. When the Company learned of the handbill, its personnel director had already been in contact with the Huck management and gathered all the information on the contract. That morning the assistant personnel director again telephoned Huck and received more detailed information, including the duties performed by the Huck "assemblers" who earned $4.47 per hour. The preparation was complete. Within hours, the Company formulated a point-by-point reply, had it blown up to poster size, and placed copies on the plants' bulletin boards. The evidence showed that the bulletin boards were an effective means of communicating with the employees; due to high interest in the campaign, they went to read any notice posted there.

The Company did rebut the misrepresentation about "assembler" wage rates. The reply stated that the Huck "assemblers" did not perform work comparable to the assembly line workers at the Company. Certainly, the employees understood that if the functions were not comparable the wages would not be comparable, regardless of the name. Therefore, the Company had an adequate opportunity to reply to the one material misrepresentation in the handbill.

III. Adversarial Hearing

The Company contends that the ALJ improperly sanctioned the adversarial role of the General Counsel at the hearing. This court has held that there is no denial of due process merely because a hearing on remand is conducted in the context of an unfair labor practice proceeding rather than a representative proceeding.[6] NLRB v. Commercial Letter, Inc. 496 F.2d 35, 38 (8th Cir. 1974). But the Company says it is not objecting to the context per se but because the General Counsel assumed such an adversarial role that substantial prejudice to the Company resulted.

The Board has set forth the following standard for the General Counsel in presenting evidence:

> * * * the role of a responsible agent of the Board in attempting to assure that a determinative issue concerning employee choice in a Board-conducted election be resolved on the basis of competent evidence and a record fully presenting the evidence developed in the prehearing investigation.

Sahara-Tahoe Corporation d/b/a Sahara-Tahoe Hotel, 173 N.L.R.B. 1349, 69 L.R.R.M. 1590 (1968).

The Company's only specific allegation of misconduct was that the General Counsel failed to call Company witness Roger Tyson. At the hearing, Tyson was called as a rebuttal witness by the Company and the ALJ struck his testimony as improper rebuttal testimony. The record shows, however, that Tyson testified concerning evidence that was not mentioned in his investigatory affidavit. Thus the General Counsel was not on notice of the evidence that the Company sought to introduce on rebuttal. Consequently, in failing to call Tyson, the General Counsel was not attempting to deny the Company a full and fair hearing.

Here, the ALJ explicitly held:

> * * * General Counsel recognized that as a government representative, it was obliged to present available material evidence unknown to the Company whether favorable or unfavorable to the Company's position. I am satisfied that this was done.

Furthermore, responding to an identical complaint that the General Counsel resisted introducing evidence favorable to the Company in order to enhance its chances of success in the unfair labor practice charge, the Fourth Circuit reasoned:

> An alleged conflict of interest said to arise from the dual role played by the Board's attorney in consolidated proceedings may be more apparent than real, and a denial of due process cannot be established by this theoretical conflict, at least where, as here, the company was adequately represented by competent counsel * * *. The company was given ample opportunity to produce evidence of its own and to cross-examine adverse witnesses. (citations omitted)

Barrus Construction Co. v. NLRB, 483 F.2d 191, 195 (4th Cir. 1973). See also NLRB v. Bancroft Manufacturing Co., 516 F.2d 436, 446 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 424 U.S. 914, 96 S.Ct. 1112, 47 L.Ed.2d 318 (1976) (". . . the ULP hearing boasts all of those procedural safeguards ordinarily associated with the concept of due process").

The Company in this case has likewise received due process. The General Counsel recognized its duty to present material evidence unknown to the Company. The Company was ably represented by counsel. The Company had the opportunity to produce evidence and to cross-examine adverse witnesses. And, finally, the Company demonstrated no prejudice as a result of the General Counsel's dual role at the hearing. Therefore, the Company had a full and fair hearing.

Accordingly the Company's petition to set aside is denied and the Board's order is enforced in full.

GEE, Circuit Judge: Campaign tactics preceding a representation election held among twenty over-the-road truck drivers at the petitioning employer's Fort Smith, Arkansas, facility draw before us two interesting questions of labor law. The first concerns the effect of "sincere-money" payments exacted by the union as a precondition to its organizing effort—a sort of Savair-in-reverse condition.[1] The second involves the effect on the election's validity of pre-election threats of picket line violence, arguably made or adopted by the union, and of threats and misconduct by union supporters in and about the polls. The Regional Director agreed with the employer that the last of these required a hearing for resolution but overruled all its other objections. In a split decision, with two of five members dissenting, the Board overruled all of the employer's objections, rejected the Regional Director's recommendation of a hearing on the violence issue, and certified the union as bargaining representative without more ado. The employer's refusal to bargain, the Board's consequent certification and bargaining order, and the employer's petition to us constitute the procedural vehicles by which the validity of that certification and the election on which it depends are brought forward. Since, for the reasons that follow, we partly disagree with the Board's disposition, we deny enforcement, vacate the Board's order, and remand for a hearing.

[1] National Labor Relations Board v. Savair Mfg. Co., 414 U.S. 270, 94 S.Ct. 495, 38 L.Ed.2d 495 (1973).

The "Sincere-Money" Payments

The union's campaign opened in the fall of 1977 with a meeting of fifteen or sixteen of the twenty drivers, held in a rest area near Fort Smith. Present and taking the lead there were a union business agent, Cecil Douthitt, and one of the drivers, B.J. Bramlett. After an exhortation by Mr. Bramlett and the consequent signing of union authorization cards, Mr. Douthitt took the floor and advised the assembly that before the union would go further it would be necessary for a majority of the drivers to pay a total of forty dollars each, representing one month's dues and an initiation fee. He explained that the union set this condition because of an unsuccessful organizing campaign held three years earlier, when a large percentage of the drivers signed cards but most voted against the union. Douthitt observed that there had been a lot of laughter at the union then but that this time the union would do the laughing—all the way to the bank and regardless of the election's outcome. Seven of the drivers paid directly, and Bramlett paid for seven more who were caught short on condition that he be reimbursed next payday. The employer contends that Douthitt's action in requiring these payments interfered with the employees' freedom of choice in the election and rendered it invalid.

In support of its contention the employer advances essentially two arguments, one deriving from authority and one from logic. The authority relied on is National Labor Relations Board v. Savair Manufacturing Co., 414 U.S. 270, 94 S.Ct. 495, 38 L.Ed.2d 495 (1973). In that case the Court invalidated an election because of a campaign maneuver of a somewhat similar type to that employed here: waiver by the union of a ten dollar initiation fee for those employees who signed union representation slips before the election but not for those who signed them thereafter.[2]

As we read its opinion, the Savair Court discerned one basic vice in the tactic used there and other, subsidiary faults of a lesser nature. The major vice was characterized as buying of endorsements, and the Court concluded that "the statutory policy of fair elections . . . [does not permit] endorsements, whether for or against the union, to be bought and sold in this fashion." 414 U.S. at 277, 94 S.Ct. at 498. To do so, the Court observed, permits the union to paint a false pre-election picture of employee support and subjects rank and file opponents of unionization to the fear of facing a wrathful union regime should the union carry. We are unable to grasp fully the force of the Court's final observation, since it appears to us that the danger noted will always be present for any opponent who makes his opposition known; but except for it, we see no application of the Savair rationale to this case.

Here there was no vote buying, rather the contrary. Here we view not a special concession to those who endorsed the union in the course of the election campaign but rather an unusual, union-emposed obstacle to employee support of the organizing effort. Nor is any false depiction of employee support presented by the tactic, since support with cash as well as words is true support indeed. In short, whatever the merits or demerits of the tactic employed here, Savair does not condemn it.

The argument from logic is not so readily rejected. It is patently true and must be conceded straight away that the preliminary cash investment in union victory exacted by Mr. Douthitt tended to advance the moment of decision for or against unionism by the drivers who paid. This being so, the opportunities of the employer to change their views in the course of the campaign were plainly diminished and their freedom of choice at the moment of casting their ballots somewhat preempted.

The matter is one of degree, however, and for several reasons we do not think the interference was of the type or of the degree of severity that we need condemn. As for its type, it was entirely legitimate: no duress was involved, and the choice to put up the "sincere money" or not was a free one. Indeed, it was a lesser step than another that would also have been entirely legitimate: affiliation with the union in advance of the election by drivers who wished to join it. What Douthitt required was no more than an early voucher of commitment to the union cause, and we know of no rule or doctrine disqualifying persons from participation in organizing campaigns or elections on the basis of their degree or timing of commitment, whether for or against the union cause.[3] [2] There, as in our case, the union's winning margin was paper thin: one vote.

We therefore concur with the Board and the Regional Director that the sincere-money tactic, while perhaps inelegant or unwise, was not improper. The matter is otherwise, however, as to the objections based on the threats of picket-line and strike violence and on misconduct at the polls, subjects to which we now turn.

The Threats of Violence

In our circuit, it is settled that when an objector such as Hickory Springs makes out a prima facie case by its affidavits the Board must grant a hearing and may not conclude that one is unwarranted by "considering matter turned up by the regional director, * * * weighing the relative factual data and * * * making credibility determinations." NLRB v. Claxton Manufacturing Co., 613 F.2d 1364, 1373 (5th Cir. 1980). Even so, "considerable weight must be assigned to [the Board's] determinations regarding the existence or nonexistence of substantial and material factual issues." Id. at 1365–66 (quoting NLRB v. Osborn Transportation, Inc., 589 F.2d 1275, 1282 (5th Cir. 1979)). Bearing these holdings in mind, we turn to the showing here made by Hickory Springs.

As related by the Board in its opinion, 239 N.L.R.B. 641, 99 L.R.R.M. 1715 (1978):

> [T]he Employer alleges that there was "[h]arassment of employees eligible to vote in the representation election." The Regional Director concluded that a hearing should be held for the purpose of resolving certain of the issues raised by this objection. The Petitioner thereafter excepted to this conclusion contending that, even if the statements testified to by employee witnesses were made and/or adopted by union officials, they did not constitute grounds for setting aside the election. We agree.
> Each of the statements alleged to have been made or adopted by union officials related to what actions the Union would take in the event of a strike. Thus, at a union meeting one employee allegedly stated that if there were a strike and anyone crossed the line, they should be "taken out and have the dog... beat out of them." Another employee stated that, in the event of a strike, if company trucks were caught on the road, there were lots of teamsters and anyone pulling a load would find themselves in a gully. Another employee cited a particular stretch of road where this could be accomplished. It is alleged that Union Representative Cecil Douthitt was present when these statements were made but did nothing to disavow or put a stop to them. At another meeting, presided over by the president of the Local Union, an employee asked what would be done in the event of a strike. The Local's president replied that whatever would be necessary on the picket line would be done. An employee stated that anyone who crossed the line would "get it." Another employee purportedly stated that, if there was any stomping done, he would be in the middle of it. The Employer's witness said he echoed the sentiments of the last employee and added that if anyone bothered his family "that would be it." Finally, a question was raised about the nonunion firm which leased its trucks to the Employer. The witness said that the Local's president stated that "Ryder would be taken care of."

(footnotes omitted and emphasis added).

As the emphasized passage evidences, it was the conclusion of the Board majority in this case that even if the quoted threats of beatings, "stompings," and assorted mayhem were made or adopted by union officials in the course of this organizing campaign, not even a prima facie case justifying a hearing on whether the election should be set aside was made out by the employer. This is so, says the Board, because they include no specific threat directed at employees' conduct during or vote in the impending election. Since the threats were all conditioned on what the union would do in the event of a strike after winning the election, it is said, they could not have destroyed the proverbial "laboratory conditions" necessary for a valid election. Moreover, says the Board, such nasty words are likely to repel voters who, after all, need only vote against the union and so evade these threatened consequences of union victory. With all such deference to the Board's expertise in the labor field as we are often adjured to accord, we think that view myopic and far too narrow.

[3] Two subsidiary arguments by the employer merit brief notice. The employer attempts to make capital of the circumstance that the drivers probably—the record is not entirely clear—signed the endorsement cards before Douthitt advised them of the required payment. We see small significance in this possibility, since all it amounted to was a second opportunity to opt against support of the union by refusing to pay up.

The employer also views with alarm Bramlett's advance of "sincere money" for the seven impecunious (or reluctant) drivers at the first meeting, an advance that is said to have created an obligation to repay. Doubtless it did create at least a moral one, but it too could have been countermanded simply: "Don't put up any money for me. I want to think about it; and if you do, that's your lookout."

Unless, as the record does not indicate, Bramlett was so formidable an individual that merely to disagree with him in a matter of free choice was to risk life or limb, we fail to see how several opportunities to disagree could be more coercive than one.

In the first place, we find in the record affidavits establishing, prima facie, that the Board's version of the facts is, to be kind, incomplete. These affidavits assert that B. J. Bramlett—coyly referred to as "an employee" by the director's report and as to these matters ignored entirely by the Board majority—did indeed engage in other threats than those related and in some specifically directed to the election. Mr. Bramlett was the driver who, as detailed above, exhorted the drivers at the first organizational meeting in favor of the union and advanced several hundred dollars in "sincere money" for seven drivers who could not (or would not) do so at that time themselves. In another exchange, omitted in the administrative accounts excepting for the outraged dissents of the Board minority, Bramlett advised a group of drivers awaiting a run that in the event of a strike, "there were ways to stop Hickory. You've heard about drivers being pulled out of trucks, and trucks being burned. You've heard about drivers being run off the road."

And against the background of this and other strike-related threats came election day. Polling was at the shipping office, Bramlett was the official observer for the union. According to one affidavit, "[e]ach time the door opened and closed to let a new voter in. Each time someone would finish voting, Bramlett would holler out 'Send another one in.' The NLRB man never said anything about this." By another:

> On the day of the election there was a group gathered about 15 feet from the door to the shipping office. Ron Jones and Joe Hill were telling everybody that was there and everybody that arrived that if they didn't vote yes they were going to get fired. I was there the whole time and this was told to everyone that was present. Often everyone voted, they came back to this group. Ron and Joe did this also, and continued to talk as they were previously.
> Bramlett made the statement to most everybody in my presence that if he found out anyone voted against the union, he was going to beat their ass.

Affidavit of Gerald W. Haney, R. 84 (emphasis added). So much for laboratory conditions.[4]

Even were the board's canvass of the record a complete one, however, and were the matter referred to above not a part of it, we could not concur in the Board's conclusions. To do so would be to issue a free license to union officials and organizers[5]—it should be recalled that the Board majority assumed in its opinion that the union made or ratified most of the above-quoted statements—to make whatever threats they wish of burnings, beatings, and suchlike to come so long as they do not relate them specifically to the campaign or election. This we decline to permit the Board to do, for such a course of action flies in the face of human experience. Men judge what others will do on given occasions by their prior actions and, less reliably, doubtless, by their statements about their intended future actions. So they assess what kind of folk they are dealing with and how those folk are likely to react if crossed. Even the implicit threat of a club or pistol on the hip, without more, may be sufficient to influence significantly the conduct of those who are cast in company with the bearer. In short, we reject the view that such pervasive threats of violence as these can be said, in effect as a matter of law, not to have created a coercive atmosphere sufficient to contaminate the election because they were merely conditional ones.[6] [4] The report of the Regional Director, Mr. Raymond A. Jacobson, incorrectly states that, "All of the employer witnesses testified that they had not been threatened in any way [at the election]." R. 18. It further construes and trims the affidavit of Haney in the first passage emphasized above:

> The third witness testified he heard two drivers he identified as union supporters make the statement that if the Union wasn't voted in, everybody might as well find another job, that they would all be fired. This statement was not directed at any one person, but at the group as a whole. (R. 18).

To be sure, the director's interpretation is a possible construction of the statements attributed to Jones and Hill. Another, more sinister one, exists however: that after a union victory, it would find out those who voted "No" and procure their discharge. One purpose of hearings is to resolve such ambiguities.

We find the director's "no threats" misstatement especially hard to understand, since the statement attributed to Bramlett appears immediately after those of Jones and Hill (see above), and none of them appears anywhere else in the record.

[5] And presumably, since such matters are supposed to be treated evenhandedly, to employers as well.

It may be that at the hearing that we direct it will become apparent that the affidavits in the record before us overstate matters or even that they are not true. Other evidence may expose Bramlett's fulminations as mere puffery or establish that he was not such a surrogate for the union as he seems on the present record. These things are for the administrator. But it is not for him to deny a hearing on such a showing as was made here. We note, moreover, as we did in Claxton[7] that it should not be necessary for us as a reviewing court to parse the record and determine whether, in denying a hearing, the Board has made submerged credibility choices by ignoring matter standing clear on the face of affidavits.

We DENY enforcement of the Board's order appealed from, VACATE it as to the employer's objections 2 (strike violence) and 3 (conduct of union supporters in and near polls), and REMAND for a hearing on these objections. It is so ORDERED.

[6] Among those recounted by us in Claxton is a similar one:

> A fourth employee stated that a union adherent, who had twice tried unsuccessfully to get her to sign an authorization card, said that "if anyone tried to cross a picket line there probably would be guns and knives and that people could get hurt and have their arms broken." She said that this conversation scared her * * *. The regional director did not mention this affidavit in his report.

Fall River Savings Bank v. NLRB

649 F.2d 50 (1st Cir.), May 22, 1981—250 NLRB 935

On petition to review Board Order

Before CAMPBELL, BOWNES and BREYER, Circuit Judges

LEVIN H. CAMPBELL, Circuit Judge: Fall River Savings Bank petitions for review of an order requiring it to bargain with Local 1325 of the United Food and Commercial Workers. The Board cross-petitions for enforcement of its order.

Fall River Savings Bank (the Bank) operates out of five branch offices in the Fall River, Massachusetts area, in addition to its main office in Fall River. Each branch office is staffed by a Branch Manager, an Assistant Branch Manager,[1] from one to four tellers, and a janitor. The main office is the headquarters for the Bank's officers and professional staff; a number of tellers also work there. On February 28, 1978, Local 1325 of the Retail Clerks International Association petitioned the Board for certification as the bargaining representative of all the Bank's regular full- and part-time employees, excluding "supervisors and guards as defined in the Act." On March 24, 1978, the Retail Clerk's Union and the Bank entered into a "Stipulation for Certification upon Consent Election," which defined the bargaining unit as:

> All regular full-time and part-time employees at the Employer's Offices * * * excluding the president, vice-presidents, assistant vice-presidents, treasurers, assistant treasurers, branch managers, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The election was held on April 28, 1978. Of 44 uncontested votes, 23 were for the Union and 21 against. Seven ballots were challenged; when these ballots were eventually opened after the Board's ruling on exceptions, the final tally was 28 votes for the Union and 23 against. The Bank filed timely objections to the conduct of the election, all of which were rejected by the Regional Director. The Board adopted most of the Regional Director's recommendations, but directed that a hearing be held to receive evidence on two categories of objections. The hearing was to focus on: 1) the supervisory or employee status of the five Assistant Branch Managers; and 2) the effect of the pro-union activity of various supervisory personnel.[2] After nine days of hearings, held between October 23 and November 21, 1978, the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) recommended that the objections be overruled and that the challenged ballots be opened. On December 6, 1979, the Board issued its "Supplemental Decision and Direction" adopting the ALJ's recommendations. This decision included a footnote which stated:

[1] The use of this term has become a bone of contention between the parties; several witnesses testified that these persons were commonly referred to as "backup tellers" up to the time of the Union campaign, suggesting that the term "Assistant Branch Manager" was introduced in an effort to endow them with supervisory status for purposes of the labor law. Since job titles are not determinative of supervisory status, NLRB v. Sayers Printing Co., 453 F.2d 810, 815 (8th Cir. 1971), the dispute has no bearing on our decision; we find it convenient to use the title "Assistant Branch Manager" here.

> On June 7, 1979, the Retail Clerks International Association and the Amalgamated Meatcutters and Butcher Workmen of North America merged, forming the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, AFL–CIO. The name of the Union herein, formerly Local 1325, Retail Clerks International Association, has been amended to reflect this change.

The Union was certified on December 20, 1979. The Bank did not seek reconsideration of either the December 6 decision or the Certification two weeks later.

Between December 20, 1979 and January 7, 1980, the Union sent to the Bank at least three letters requesting that bargaining sessions be scheduled. Each such letter was sent on stationery bearing the letter head of the "United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, Local No. 1325." The Bank responded on January 10, 1980, essentially reasserting its previous objections to the election. The Union then filed a charge with the Board, which, on January 29, 1980, issued a complaint charging the Bank with refusing to bargain in violation of sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (5).

The Bank answered the complaint on February 13 reasserting several of its objections to the election. Upon motion by the general counsel, the Board on March 25, 1980 transferred the proceeding to itself and issued a notice to show cause why summary judgment should not be granted. On April 14, 1980, the Bank amended its answer to raise, for the first time, a defense based on the merger between the Retail Clerks International Association and the Amalgamated Meatcutters and Butcher Workmen. The Board refused to address this issue on the ground that it was not timely raised; it granted summary judgment for the general counsel, along with the order now under review, on July 24, 1980.

The Bank raises four issues for our consideration: 1) whether the Assistant Managers of the three largest branches are "supervisors" as defined in section 2(11) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(11);[3] 2) whether the pro-union conduct of supervisors requires tht the election be set aside; 3) whether the Board erred in refusing to grant a hearing on the Bank's allegation of a threat made by one supervisor to an employee; and 4) whether the Board's certification of the United Food and Commerical Workers is invalid because of the Board's failure to inquire into the validity of the merger between the Retail Clerks International Association and the Amalgamated Meatcutters. We resolve each of these issues against the Bank and enforce the Board's order.

I. The Status of the Assistant Branch Managers

Section 2(3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(3), excludes from the definition of "employees" for the purpose of the Act "an individual employed as a supervisor." Section 9(b), 29 U.S.C. § 159(b), in turn limits to employees the persons who may be included in bargaining units designated by the Board. Section 2(11) defines the term "supervisor" as follows:

> The term 'supervisor' means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline

[2] The Board's decision referred specifically to the allegations described in paragraphs B1, B5 and D2 of the Regional Director's report. These allegations involved: 1) attendance at Union meetings by Branch Managers, Assistant Branch Managers, and Assistant Treasurers, and pro-union speeches at one such meetings by one Branch Manager and one Assistant Branch Manager; 2) pro-union letters distributed to employees by one Branch Manager and one Assistant Branch Manager; and 3) visits by an Assistant Branch Manager on behalf of the Union to the home of one employee.

[3] The Bank has not challenged the Board's conclusion with respect to the Assistant Managers of the two smallest branches. We therefore do not consider these individuals.

> other employees, or reasonably to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

"By well-settled construction, this section is to be read in the disjunctive, with the existence of any one of the statutory powers sufficient to confer supervisory status." Maine Yankee Atomic Power Co., v. NLRB, 624 F.2d 347, 360 (1st Cir.1980); NLRB v. Magnesium Casting Co., 427 F.2d 114, 117 (1st Cir.1970), aff'd, 401 U.S. 137, 91 S.Ct. 599, 27 L.Ed. 735 (1971). We have repeatedly held that application of the statutory test is a question of fact for the Board, Stop & Shop Companies, Inc. v. NLRB, 548 F.2d 17, 18 (1st Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Magnesium Casting Co., supra; NLRB v. Swift & Co., 292 F.2d 561, 563 (1st Cir. 1961). While the Board's discretion in this area is not unlimited, Maine Yankee Atomic Power Co. v. NLRB, supra; NLRB v. Metropolitan Petroleum Co., 506 F.2d 616 (1st Cir.1974), the Board's determination should be sustained if supported by substantial evidence.

The Bank contends that Assistant Branch Managers are supervisors primarily because they are in charge of the branch during the absence of the Branch Manager. The parties stipulated to the supervisory status of Branch Managers, who are ordinarily the highest ranking persons present in each branch. While both Managers and Assistant Managers spend much of their work day performing the routine chores of a teller, Branch Managers, and to a lesser degree Assistant Managers, perform some functions which tellers do not perform. Managers open the branch with a key; they turn on the branch computers with a "supervisory override" key; they initiate and assist tellers in the process of "proving out" in which each tellers balances his or her trans- 54 actions at the end of the day; they accept applications for loans, which are then forwarded to the main office; they approve passbook loans through application of a mathematical formula; they authorize the cashing of particularly large checks; they sign bank checks; and they assign tellers to windows according to a pre-arranged rotation system. With regard to personnel management, there was some conflicting testimony, but the Board reasonably found that hiring, firing, promotions and salary increases were all handled by the main office, without significant reliance on recommendations from the branches, and that Branch Managers would discipline tellers formally only after consultation with the main office.

Managers are absent from their branches during lunch hours, management meetings (which Assistant Managers do not attend), illness, and vacations, although there was testimony that higher officials from the main office make a practice of supervising at branches when Branch Managers are absent for extended periods. Also, Assistant Managers rotate with Managers for work on Saturday mornings, when the branches operate with a reduced staff. On these occasions, unless a supervisor from the main office is present, the assistant Branch Manager is the highest ranking person in the branch.

We have had several occasions to consider the status of employees who, while otherwise serving as ordinary workers, are occasionally called upon to take charge of others during the absence of a superior. NLRB v. Sayers Printing Co., 453 F.2d 810 (1st Cir.1971); NLRB v. Magnesium Casting Co., 427 F.2d 114; NLRB v. Swift & Co., 292 F.2d 561; NLRB v. Quincy Steel Casting, 200 F.2d 293 (1st Cir.1952). We have taken the position in such cases that "spasmodic and infrequent assumption of a position of command and responsibility does not transform an otherwise rank and file worker into a spervisor." Quincy Steel Casting, at 296. While the Bank seeks to distinguish these cases, arguing that Assistant Branch Managers take charge on a more regular than "spasmodic" basis, we think the Board could properly view the limited occasions on which Assistants were in charge as a factor significantly weakening the claim of managerial status.

Moreover, even on those occasions when the Managers were absent, the Board could find, on this record, that the duties performed by Assistant Managers did not involve significant supervisory authority. The Bank argues that the Assistant Branch Managers, on these occasions, possess authority responsibly to direct and to discipline tellers. As a primary example, the Bank cites the "proving out" process. This process is essentially a matter of checking computations to insure that the transaction records are accurate. Each teller proves his or her own window; from the testimony the Board could find that the primary role of the person in charge is to initiate the process by instructing the first teller when to begin. If a teller is unable to prove, the person in charge, as well as other tellers, may assist him or her in searching for the error. If the error is not found by closing time, the manager directs the tellers to continue looking for it; but several withnesses testified that this process never continues for longer than an hour, after which time the employees all leave and continue the search the next day. The Board concluded that this process is "routine or clerical," not requiring "the use of independent judgment," and we find substantial record support for this conclusion. See Goldies, Inc. v. NLRB, 628 F.2d 706 (1st Cir.1980) ("countermen" who occasionally assign tasks to "partsmen" and give them instructions found not supervisors).

The Bank contends that Assistant Branch Managers have authority to discipline tellers. In support of this, the Bank relies on three incidents. In one, Assistant Branch Manager Griffin had experienced what he termed a "personal conflict" with Charlotte Snell, a teller who had worked unsuccessfully in several branches and was being given a last chance at Griffin's branch. Feeling unable to bring the problem to the Branch Manager because of her friendship with Snell, Griffin went to Charles Murray, then Vice President, and suggested that Snell be transferred to another branch. Murray then discharged Snell. The Board reasonably concluded that the incident was "an isolated instance with unusual circumstances and not indicative of supervisory authority." Griffin obviously had no authority to take any independent action against Snell, and even his recommendation of transfer was not followed. Snell's discharge appears to be less the result of any recommendation by Griffin than of her long history of inadequate performance. See Stop & Shop Companies, Inc., 548 F.2d 17 (pharmacy managers whose recommendations on hiring and firing were sometimes ignored found to have no authority "effectively to recommend" such action).

In a second incident, the Bank asserts that Assistant Manager Gail Silva once "directed" an employee not to report to work on a Saturday. Silva's testimony was that, when the teller called in at 11:00 to say that she had just awoken, Silva replied, "Well * * * I don't know what to tell you, but for an hour and a half it would be foolish to come in." The Board saw nothing in this incident to suggest an exercise of supervisory authority, nor do we. A third incident relied upon by the Bank, involving a written warning issued (after the election) by Assistant Manager Nancy Savage Ferreira to a teller who was absent without excuse, similarly failed to prove supervisory status. The warning was issued only after clearing with, and on instructions from, the main office.

The Bank argues also that Assistant Managers have authority to train and evalute new tellers. This activity was mentioned by only one witness, and then in vague terms. By itself such activity, if it occurred, would not establish supervisory status, experienced employees may instruct new personnel without possessing supervisory authority. See Magnesium Casting, 427 F.2d at 118 (not unusual that most skilled workers would command respect even through not supervisors). Similarly, management's solicitation, in this context, of the opinions of more experienced employees about the performance of newcomers did not necessitate a finding of supervisory status.

Other duties cited by the Bank as managerial, such as possession of the branch and computer keys, power to approve checkcashing, and authority to sign checks, are not directly related to supervision of employees. These responsibilities do indeed suggest that Assistant Managers are among those persons whom the bank considers particularly reliable and trustworthy. But we cannot say that such duties and traits required a finding that Assistant Managers play a role in which "they must be representatives of the interests of their employer vis-a-vis other employees." Stop & Shop Companies, Inc. v. NLRB, 548 F.2d at 17. Nor does the slightly higher pay received by Assistant Managers compel a finding of supervisory authority.[4] Pay differential may be explained by any number of differences in skill, seniority, reponsibilities, or market power; here the Board could rationally attribute it to seniority, experience, and the various other reponsibilities of a non-supervisory nature assigned to Assistant Managers. See NLRB v. Metropolitan Petroleum Co., 506 F.2d 616 (dispatchers paid less per hour than drivers whom they supervised); NLRB v. Sayers Printing Co., 453 F.2d at 815 (higher pay "of no legal significance").

[4] There was testimony that tellers were paid between $106 and $133 per week at the time of the election. Assistant Branch Managers received "in the area of" $144 to $146. Branch Managers, unlike tellers and Assistant, were paid on an annual basis, at a rate of between $8,000 and $12,000. Tellers and Assistant Branch Managers fill out weekly time reports; Branch Managers do not.

The Board has a large measure of informed discretion when it comes to deciding who, as a practical matter, falls within the definition of supervisor. Stop & Shop Companies, Inc. v. NLRB, 548 F.2d at 18; NLRB v. Swift & Co., 292 F.2d at 563. We find substantial record support for its determination.

II. Pro-Union Activity of Supervisors

The Bank contends that the election should be set aside because pro-union activities by certain of its own supervisors interfered with the "laboratory conditions" under which the election was conducted. The Board has a "wide degree of discretion" in matters relating to representation proceedings, NLRB v. A.J. Tower Co., 329 U.S. 324, 334, 67 S.Ct. 324, 329, 91 L.Ed. 322 (1946). A party urging that an election be set aside carries the "heavy burden" of demonstraing that the Board has abused its discretion. Melrose Wakefield Hospital Association v. NLRB, 615 F.2d 563, 566 (1st Cir. 1980); NLRB v. S. Prawer & Co., 584 F.2d 1099, 1101 (1st Cir. 1978). The Board has found pro-union activity by supervisors objectionable on two possible grounds: first, it may lead employees to the false conclusion that their employer favors the union; and second, it may cause employees to support the union out of fear of retaliation by the particular supervisors rather than out of free choice. Stevenson Equipment Co., 174 NLRB 865 (1969). Accord, Catholic Medical Center v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 20 (2d Cir. 1980) (employees may be confused or coerced); NLRB v. San Antonio Portland Cement Co., 611 F.2d 1148 (5th Cir. 1980) (supervisory support objectionable only if it contains "seeds of reprisal"); see also NLRB v. Underwood Machinery, 179 F.2d 118 (1st Cir. 1949) (supervisors' solicitation of union authorization cards objectionable only if "the signing employee was subject to a reasonable apprehension that his failure to sign could have adverse consequences"). Unless one or both of these effects appears to have flowed from the supervisors' conduct, the Board has declined to set aside an election.

The Bank's complaints of pro-union activities by supervisors here center on the activities of certain Assistant Branch Managers. Our holding in Part I makes it unnecessary to address these claims. The Bank's remaining objections relate to the conduct of several Branch Managers and an Assistant Treasurer. The Bank contends that these personnel attended numerous union meetings and invited other employees to do so; that one Branch Manager volunteered to telephone and visit employees on behalf of the Union, made a pro-union speech, and sent a letter to employees expressing support for the Union; that another Branch Manager was elected to be the employees' "liaison with the union" and on one occasion questioned a teller as to how she would vote; and finally that an Assistant Treasurer made a pro-union speech at one meeting.[5]

The Board found support for some, but not all, of these claims, and our review of the record persuades us of the reasonableness of the Board's findings. Generally, the Board found that several supervisors made known their support for the Union, but that no supervisor ever told any employee how to vote or threatened any form of retaliation against employees who failed to support the Union. The Board found also that Bank management expressed unambiguous opposition to the Union in a series of strongly worded letters to employees. On the basis of these factual findings, the Board concluded that the activities of supervisors neither misled employees as to the Bank's position nor caused them to fear retaliation, and that there was therefore no need to set aside the election.

The bank does not challenge the standards applied by the Board; its argument is that the supervisors' activities did in fact mislead employees and cause fear of retaliation. First, the Bank asserts that employees may have been confused about management's position since "the bank's employees cannot be expected to be able to adequately understand that the very real, pro-union proselytizing by supervisors is to be differentiated from the abstract concept of the position of 'Bank management.' " We find nothing in the record that necessitates a finding that any such confusion existed—and much to indicate that the employees could and did make this distinction. Each employee who was questioned on the subject demonstrated a clear understanding of the identity of Bank management and of its views on the Union campaign.

[5] The Bank contends, somewhat inconsistently, both that its management was unaware of the extent of supervisory support for the Union, and that it attempted to control the activity of supervisors but was unable to do so. The Board found, on the basis of explicit testimony, that Bank officers were told of the supervisors' activities early in the union campaign; thus the Bank could have taken steps to head off any unwanted conduct by them. The reason supervisors are unprotected by the Act is precisely that employers are entitled to demand their complete loyalty—and take disciplinary measures to secure it. An employer who fails to exercise its authority may not later be heard to complain of the results of its inaction. NLRB v. Lamar Electric Membership Corp., 362 F.2d 505 (5th Cir. 1966).

The Bank's second contention is that the supervisor's "active and vocal" support for the Union coerced employees by implying threats of retaliation. We think the Board was entitled to reject this contention. It is clear that certain supervisors favored the Union, and that employees knew this; but without evidence of any threats, express or implied, this does not compel a finding of coercion, Compare Turner's Express v. NLRB, 456 F.2d 289 (4th Cir. 1972) (foremen warned employees that they would "get tough" if the Union lost, and that anti-union employees would "pay for it"). Here there was no significant evidence of threats,[6] and none that any employee feared retaliation; those employees who were asked about such fears stated that they had none.[7]

In rejecting the Bank's claim of coercion by Branch Managers, the Board relied also on the Managers' limited power to retaliate against tellers. The Bank criticizes this reasoning, quoting Turner's Express v. NLRB, 456 F.2d 289, for the point that an employee's immediate supervisor may be more influential than a more distant corporate official. In Turner's Express, however, the immediate supervisor had substantial influence on hiring, firing, and wage-setting; here the Branch Managers' ability to injure the interests of tellers was more limited. See NLRB v. Kane, 435 F.2d 1203 (4th Cir. 1970) (low level of supervisor's authority weighs against inference of coercion). Thus we think the Board could take into account the relatively limited power of the Managers as well (far more importantly) as the absence of threating conduct, in refusing to set aside the election on grounds of coercion.

III. The Alleged Threat by Pimental

The Bank complains that it has been denied due process by the Board's refusal to grant a hearing on an incident it describes as an "express threat" by Assistant Treasurer Pimental to Debra Paulhus, a clerical employee. According to the Bank, Pimental asked Paulhus' husband how Paulhus intended to vote. Mr. Paulhus replied that he did not know, and Pimental told him that in 1977 Debra had been on a "hit-list" of employees to be fired by Vice President Murray. The Bank has raised this incident, both before the Board and in this court, as an example of "supervisory pressure" on an employee; the Bank has not attempted to put forward any theory of this incident as part of a union-organized campaign to mislead employees with false rumors about management's plans. The Board saw no "substantial and material issue" arising from this incident as it was presented by the Bank, and that conclusion was within the Board's discretion. Pimental is not alleged to have suggested that he himself had some intention of firing Paulhus if she failed to support the Union. Taking the Bank's account of the incident as true, the Board could reasonably conclude that the incident did not demonstrate coercion by a supervisor and therefore was not a basis for setting aside the election. No hearing, therefore, was necessary.

IV. The Union Merger

As outlined in the statement of the facts, the Board certified the United Food and Commercial Workers on December 20, 1979, after having noted in its order of December 6 that this Union was the result of a merger between the petitioning Retail Clerks International Association and another Union. The Bank raised no objection to the substitution of the new Union for its predecessor until it filed its amendment answer to the unfair labor practice charge on April 14, 1980.[8] At the time the Board refused to address the issue, citing its rule against litigation in an unfair labor practice proceeding of issues which could have been raised in the representation proceeding. The Bank now argues that it has been denied a hearing on the validity of the merger, and that the Board's action in certifying the new Union without affording such a hearing was beyond its power.

[6] We find reasonable the Board's disagreement with the Bank's characterization of Branch Manager Boleski's letter as containing "thinly veiled threats."

[7] The Bank cites the testimony of teller Clare Pires, who stated:

> I figured that if I said I was for the union the other bank management basically from downtown wouldn't like it, and if I said I was against the union the people I have to work with every day wouldn't like that too much either. But I still had to make up my own mind.

This scarcely compels a finding that Pires feared retaliation from anyone, let along that supervisors would retaliate because of an anti-union stance.

Union mergers are a relatively frequent occurance, and the Board has developed a set of procedures for responding to them. Ordinarily, the successor union petitions for amendment of the certification of representation under 29 C.F.R. § 102.61(e). The Board then conducts an inquiry, in which the employer may participate if it wishes, to determine whether the merger was accomplished through valid procedures and whether the resulting union continues to represent the unit employees. If the Board is satisfied that these criteria are met, it then amends the certification to reflect the merger, and the new union assumes the position of the old. On review, the courts have treated the Board's determination as one of fact, to be upheld if supported by substantial evidence. E.g., NLRB v. Bear Archery, 587 F.2d 812 (6th Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Pearl Bookbinding, 517 F.2d 1108 (1st Cir. 1975); NLRB v. Commercial Letter, Inc., 496 F.2d 35 (8th Cir. 1974).

Here, the record contains no formal petition by the United Food and Commercial Workers,[9] and no evidence of any inquiry by the Board.[10] The Board's action, sua sponte, and without any record support, was irregular. Had the Bank raised a timely objection to this procedure, we think the Board would have had an obligation to afford either the usual procedure or some reasonable equivalent in which the Bank might contest the validity and effect of the merger. Paper and Tanner Co. v. NLRB, 474 F.2d 1256 (6th Cir. 1973). But the Bank failed to do so. The Board was within its discretion in refusing to address the matter when, later, it was raised.

Under the Board's longstanding rule and practice, see 29 C.F.R. § 102.67(f), which the courts have repeatedly endorsed, a party to an unfair labor practice proceeding may not raise an issue which was or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding, in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances. Magnesium Casting Co. v. NLRB, 401 U.S. 137, 141–42, 91 S.Ct. 599, 601, 27 L.Ed.2d 735 (1971); Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 162, 61 S.Ct. 908, 917, 85 L.Ed. 1251 (1941); S.D. Warren Co. v. NLRB, 353 F.2d 494, 497 (1st Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 383 U.S. 958, 86 S.Ct. 1222, 16 L.Ed.2d 300 (1966).

The Bank argues that it had no opportunity to raise the issue in the representation proceeding, since it was unaware of the merger until the Board's order of December 6, at which time the representation proceeding was effectively concluded. The Board determined, however, that the Bank could have raised the issue by way of a motion for reconsideration under Rule 102.65(e)(1), which provides, in part, as follows:

> A party to a proceeding may, because of extraordinary circumstances, move after the close of the hearing for reopening of the record, or move after the decision for reconsideration or rehearing, except that no motion for reconsideration or rehearing will be entertained pursuant to this paragraph by the regional director with respect to any matter which can be raised before pursuant to any other section of the rules in this part, or by the Board with respect to any matter which could have been but was not raised before it pursuant to any other section of the rules in this part.

The rule permits the filing of a motion within ten days after service of the decision in the proceeding. Since the decision in the representation proceeding occurred on December 20, the Board says the [8] The Bank asserts that it raised this issue both in its letter to the Union and in its first answer by stating that it would not recognize the Union as the lawfully certified representative of the bargaining unit. We have examined both these documents, and we find nothing in either to put the Board or the Union on notice that the Bank intended to contest the merger.

[9] Since no Union had yet been certified at the time of the merger, the Union could not have petitioned for amendment of certification. It could, however, have accomplished the same result by moving for amendment of the representation petition filed by the Retail Clerks Union. The record does not indicate whether the Union did so or not.

[10] The Board's present position is that it "did nothing more than amend the name of the Union's international affiliate," and that in doing so it merely chose not to "ignore the realities of life." This position begs the question, however, without any inquiry haveing been conducted, it is impossible to know whether the merger effected a mere change of name or whether its impact was more substantial.

Bank could have filed a motion as many as 24 days after the December 6 order had alerted it, to the merger. The Board also points out that the rule allows a party to request an extension of time for filing a motion, so that the Bank might have requested and obtained additional time. 29 C.F.R. § 102.65(e)(2).[11]

The Bank argues that a motion for reconsideration would not have been appropriate here, or at least that the rule failed to give notice of its applicability to a case such as this. The Bank interprets the rule as limited to claims of factual errors made during the consideration of election objections already raised by the parties. For this, the Bank cites no cases, but relies on language referring to "any finding of material fact" and to "additional evidence sought to be adduced" contained in the following part of the rule:

> A motion for reconsideration shall state with particularity the material error claimed and with respect to any finding of material fact shall specify the page of the record relied on. A motion for rehearing shall specify the error alleged to require a hearing de novo and the prejudice to the movant alleged to result from such error. A motion to reopen the record shall state briefly the additional evidence sought to be adduced, why it was not presented previously, and what result it would require, if adduced and credited. Only newly discovered evidence, evidence which has become available only since the close of the hearing, or evidence which the regional director the Board believes should have been taken at the hearing, will be taken at any further hearing.

We do not think this language necessarily limits motions for reconsideration in the manner claimed. Doubtless most motions relate to errors having their genesis in prior proceedings. A movant is thus told by this part of the rule that in cases of an error of procedure or of law, he must state the error with particularity, while in cases of an error of fact, he must make specific reference to the record. The rule goes on to describe the type of evidence that may be taken at a rehearing, limiting such evidence to newly discovered or previously unavailable material. We read this language as limiting the evidence that may be introduced when the issued reopened is one which has already been considered, but we see nothing to indicate a firm intention to limit the types of issues that may be raised. The cases offer ho hint that the rule is limited in the way the Bank suggests. See Garment Workers v. Quality Manufacturing Co., 420 U.S. 276, 281 n.3, 95 S.Ct. 972, 975, n.3, 43 L.Ed.2d 189 (1975) (employer claims due process violation in Board order based on theory not charged or litigated; Court refuses to consider because of employer's failure to move for reconsideration); NLRB v. Local 345, 612 F.2d 598 (1st Cir. 1980) (Union moved reconsideration of order in which Board sua sponte amended ALJ's proposed order); NLRB v. Beth Israel Hospital, 554 F.2d 477, 482 n.4 (1st Cir 1977), aff'd, 437 U.S. 483, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978) (employer contests Board's sua sponte expansion of litigated issue; failure to seek reconsideration no bar because Board's ruling too ambiguous to provide notice of its scope). See also NLRB v. Maine Sugar Industries Co., 425 F.2d 942 (1st Cir. 1970) (decided before present Rule 102.65; in absence of formal provision for motion for reconsideration, party not barred from raising in unfair labor practice proceeding issue which could not have been raised in representation proceeding because evidence was not yet available).

From the language of Rule 102.65(e)(1) and its treatment in these cases, we hold that the Bank had sufficient notice that it could contest the Board's treatment of this new issue by seeking reconsideration under the rule. Where the Bank had an opportunity and failed to use it, the Board was entitled to apply its rule and policy against relitigation.

The Bank seeks to avoid this result by arguing that a motion for reconsideration "is optional, not mandatory." The Bank cites Rule 102.65's provision that a party "may" seek reconsideration and that "A motion for reconsideration or rehearing need not be filed to exhaust administrative remedies." But the optional language in Rule 102.65(e)(1) might more reasonably be thought to serve other purposes. For example, it serves to recognize that a motion for reconsideration need not be filed in every circumstance—as, for example, where the issue has already been raised and decided. E. g., NLRB v. Mercy Hospitals of Sacramento, 589 F.2d 968 (9th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 910, 99 S.Ct. 1221, 59 L.Ed.2d 458 (1979); see also NLRB v. Annapolis Emergency Hospital, 561 F.2d 524 (4th Cir. 1977). In such a case, reconsideration would be futile—if it were allowed at all in the absence of new evidence. Here, however, the merger issue had not been raised previously, and a motion for reconsideration provided the Bank with an opportunity to raise it in the representation proceeding. Under the rule against relitigation, the Board requires one who has an opportunity to raise an issue to use that opportunity or be barred from contesting the point in the later proceeding. As the motion for reconsideration was such an opportunity, the Board could penalize its disuse by declining to afford another opportunity, later. NLRB v. Sambo's Restaurant, Inc., 641 F.2d 794 (9th Cir. 1981) (section 10(e) bar against raising issues on appeal which could have been but were not presented to the Board applies where party failed to seek reconsideration of action by the Board sua sponte); Amax Coal Co. v. NLRB, 614 F.2d 872, 877 n.13 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. granted, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 917, 66 L.Ed.2d 838 (1981) (same); NLRB v. Allied Products, 548 F.2d 644 (6th Cir. 1977) (same).[12]

[11] At oral argument, the Bank sought to explain its delay by saying that it needed time to question its employees as to their knowledge of the merger before it could determine whether it had grounds to contest the validity of the merger. Were this so, it could have sought an extension of time, which it did not do.

The Bank argues, citing Burns Electronic Security Services, Inc. v. NLRB, 624 F.2d 403 (2d Cir. 1980), that the Board has acted arbitrarily in applying the rule against relitigation because the rule's purposes are not served here. We disagree. Indeed, we think this is a classic instance where the purposes are served. A cardinal purpose of the rule is to prevent delay, and delay is precisely what would have resulted had the Board chosen to consider the merger issue after it had been raised at the eleventh hour in the unfair labor practice proceeding. By the time of that proceeding, a full two years had passed since the Bank's employees voted in favor of Union representation. Through a lengthy series of proceedings contesting the representative status of the Union, the Bank had managed to avoid bargaining during this period. Had the Bank raised the merger issue in December 1979, when it received the Board's decision, the issue could have been considered promptly, as adjunct to or in the context of the representation proceeding. All challenges to the Union's representation would have been settled, and bargaining could have begun.[13] Instead, the Bank remained silent until April, 1980,[14] some four months after the Board's order, when it suddenly asserted its right to contest the merger.[15]

Since the Bank failed to raise the issue in a timely manner, the Board was within its discretion in refusing to afford a hearing.[16] As the Supreme Court observed in United States v. L. A. Tucker Truck Lines, Inc., 344 U.S. 33, 37, 73 S.Ct. 67, 69, 97 L.Ed. 54 (1952), and as we quoted in NLRB v. Rexall Chemical Co., 370 F.2d 363, 366 (1st Cir. 1967),

> Simple fairness to those who are engaged in the tasks of administration, and to litigants, requires as a general rule that courts should not topple over administrative decisions unless the administrative body not only has erred but has erred

[12] The Bank attempts to distinguish these cases by pointing out that the parties involved had failed to present their claims to the Board at all, while the Bank did raise this issue in the unfair labor practice proceeding. The relevance of these cases here, however, is not for their application of section 10e, but for their view of of the significance of the motion for reconsideration: where the failure to use an opportunity to raise an issue operates to bar assertion of that issue at a later time, whether before the Board or in court, the motion for reconsideration is such an opportunity.

[13] The Bank relies on NLRB v. Pearl Bookbinding Co., Inc., 517 F.2d 1108, as a case in which a union merger was contested during an unfair labor practice proceeding. There, however, the merger occurred after the union was certified, so that the employer had no opportunity to contest the merger during the representation proceeding.

[14] The Board now argues that the issue was not properly raised even then, since the Bank failed to seek permission to amend its answer, as required by Rule 102.23. That rule provides that an answer may be amended without permission at any time before the hearing date, but after that date only with permission. Here, the hearing date was set for June 25, 1980. It appears, therefore, that the Bank was entitled under the Board's rules to amend its answer without permission at the time when it did so. Nevertheless, we see no abuse of discretion in the Board's refusal to hear the new issue raised in the amended answer.

[15] The Board, noting the lack of any mention of the merger as a ground for refusing to bargain in the Bank's letter to the Union, as well as the Bank's failure to move for reconsideration, termed the merger issue an "afterthought." The Bank's motives are not determinative, but the Board could consider them in exercising its discretion, and it could reasonably assume that if the Bank seriously questioned the validity of the merger and intended to resist the bargaining on that ground, it would have challenged the merger immediately upon learning of it. We also note that the Bank has apparently not alleged or offered to prove facts which would show that as a result of the merger the Union is "substantially different—other than in name and affiliation—from the prior union." NLRB v. Pearl Bookbinding Co., Inc., 517 F.2d at 1111, a crucial factor in determining the propriety of a union's continued certification as a bargaining representative following a merger. Id., at 1112.

NLRB v. Supreme Bumpers, Inc., d/b/a Precision Plating

648 F.2d 1076 (6th Cir.), May 22, 1981—243 NLRB 230

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before EDWARDS, Chief Judge, KENNEDY, Circuit Judge, and CELEBREZZE, Senior Circuit Judge

PER CURIAM: The National Labor Relations Board seeks enforcement of its order [1] requiring the employer in this case to rehire two employees who were found to have been discharged, in violation of §§ 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. §§ 151–169 (1976).

On consideration of the record before and the opinion of the Administrative Law Judge who heard the evidence, we find a record sharply in conflict as to why the discharges occurred. The company contended that the discharges were due to repeated absenteeism on the part of these two employees, whereas the employees' testimony was to the effect that they were among the strongest of the advocates of a union in the plant and that the discharges took place only after an effort was made on behalf of unionization.

The Administrative Law Judge made an analysis of the credibility of the employee witnesses as compared to that of the management witnesses too lengthy to quote in full. But, three paragraphs we deem appropriate:

> c. The discharges
> In view of the foregoing, I conclude that Respondent had knowledge of the union activities and sympathies of T. Jones and James Burton, and further evinced an animosity toward unionization by its employees of its Detroit plant. The discharges occurred within the context of interrogations and threats. Burton was the prime activist for the Union. His discharge occurred shortly after Fred Jones became aware of the fulfillment of Burton's threat to organize the Union. T. Jones' discharge thereafter occurred subsequent to his continued expressions of support for the Union. In view of the circumstances herein, including Fred Jones' constant presence in the shop and proximity to employees, including carpooling, it can be inferred that in any event, Respondent was well aware of the full extent of the union organizing efforts of its employees. Famet, Inc., 202 NLRB 409 (1973); Wiese Plow Welding Co., Inc., 123 NLRB 616 (1959).
> Respondent contends that Burton and T. Jones were deficient in their work habits. Yet, they were never disciplined for their alleged disruptive activities. Other employees had left priority work undone. There is no evidence that they were disciplined. I do not find the testimony of Fred Jones and Opalewski credible with respect to the extent of the discriminatees alleged deficiencies. Their testimony was inconsistent and puts Respondent in a posture of advancing shifting reasons for the discharges. When Burton was disciplined in November, he was disciplined solely for absenteeism. When he was laid off, no initial reference was made to his deficient work performance. Had his misconduct been as severe as portrayed, surely some reference in Respondent's records would have been made of it. Similarly, the termination notice in the records of each employee refers to no such misbehavior. I credit the testimony of Burton and T. Jones that no reference of work deficiencies was ever mentioned to them upon their terminations.
> With respect to the absenteeism records of both men, such on its face appears excessive. However, in comparison with other polishers, their records are not exceedingly disproportionate, particularly with respect to months of their employment in 1978. I find persuasive Burton's testimony that the critical factor for piece rate production is not so much the hours clocked in, but rather, the number of bumpers that were produced. There was no testimony by Respondent's witnesses of any deficiency with respect to the actual number of bumpers produced by either employee. In this respect, Opalewski characterized these employees as "good" or "very good." Thus, they apparently had the capacity and did produce satisfactorily in view of their facility as qualified and experienced polishers.

The decisive finding of fact on the part of the Administrative Law Judge was: "I conclude that the real reason for the discharges in this case is the union activities and sympathies of the dischargees."

This court, of course, is not retrying the sharp factual dispute presented by this record. All we are required to determine is whether or not there is substantial evidence on the whole record to support the findings of the Board, which accepted the Administrative Law Judge's recommendations. Since we do find such substantial evidence, enforcement is granted in relation to the 1078 order of the National Labor Relations Board.

NLRB v. Circo Resorts, Inc., d/b/a Circus, Circus

646 F.2d 403 (9th Cir.), May 26, 1981; rehearing denied August 10, 1981—244 NLRB 880

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before MERRILL and SCHROEDER, Circuit Judges and EAST, District Judge

SCHROEDER, Circuit Judge: This is a petition by the NLRB to enforce its order following findings of unfair labor practices. The case arises out of alleged unfair labor practices which occurred during efforts to organize the stagehands of the Circus, Circus Hotel & Casino in Reno in the weeks immediately following the completion of construction of the facility and prior to its opening. The Board found that the employer was guilty of unfair labor practices in connection with interrogation of employees concerning union activities, wage increases, threats of reprisals, and the discharge of two employees who were union members. The Board ordered that the employer cease and desist from the practices and bargain with the union.

We are called upon to decide whether the record supports a finding of unfair labor practices, whether the union of stagehands was an appropriate unit, and whether the order was appropriate.

The first unfair labor practice finding is based upon the questioning by the entertainment department supervisor of three of the six stagehands about their union membership. After making the inquiry, the supervisor told one of the employees that it was premature to have a union, and that the company was afraid of "what was happening at MGM," where a union was organizing. On another occasion he told another employee, "We don't want a union in here. The union may come in here in a year or so, but we don't want it in now." While questioning of employees concerning union activities in not a per se violation of § 8(a)(1) (29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1)), Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 721, 725 (9th Cir. 1980), the determination by the Board that interrogation has been coercive is entitled to be upheld so long as there is substantial evidence to support it. NLRB v. Ft. Vancouver Plywood Co., 604 F.2d 596 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 915, 100 S.Ct. 1275, 63 L.Ed.2d 599 (1980). We find that the Board's finding of an unfair labor practice is supported by the evidence.

The next unfair labor practice finding arose out of the firings of two stagehands who were active in obtaining other stagehands' signatures on union authorization cards. The employer contends that the firings were for ecomonic reasons, but the administrative law judge credited testimony that the firings had been followed by statements that the two had been too obvious in their union activities and that more workers would not be employed until "this union thing was over." The conclusion that the company violated §§ 8(a)(1) & 8(a)(3) (29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (a)(3)) by the firings and the threat of reprisal by remaining understaffed are supported by the record. See NLRB v. Bighorn Beverage, 614 F.2d 1238, 1242-43 (9th Cir. 1980).

A closer question is presented by the finding that wage increases granted in late August were unfair labor practices. The increases were granted to two stagehands who discovered a disparity in wages and protested strongly. The immediate dilemma faced by the company was to choose between meeting the protests or risk losing employees at a time when they were badly needed. While wage increases granted prior to an election generally carry a presumption of illegal motive, the employer is entitled to justify the timing of the increase. NLRB v. Anchorage Times Pub. Co., 637 F.2d 1359 (9th Cir. 1981). In this case, given the unusual circumstances, the Board should have considered the justifications offered and should not have based a finding of unfair labor practices solely upon the timing of the increase. See Free-Flow Packaging Corp. v. NLRB, 566 F.2d 1124, 1130 (9th Cir. 1978); Paoli Chair Co., Inc., 213 N.L.R.B. 909 (1974). The order should be modified to delete the reference to wage increases.

The employer's contention that one of the discharged employees, Sorce, was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(11), is without merit. An employee who gives minor orders or directives is not necessarily a supervisor for purposes of the Act. Kaiser Engineers v. NLRB, 538 F.2d 1379, 1383–84 (9th Cir. 1976). There was no evidence, apart from a suggestion for a possible job candidate, that Sorce was engaged in supervisory activities.

Also without merit is the contention that the two discharged employees, Sorce and Bledsoe, were not bona fide employees. The authority relied on by the company relates to employees who are actually on the payroll of the union for organizing purposes. NLRB v. Elias Bros. Big Boy, Inc., 327 F.2d 421 (6th Cir. 1964). There is no suggestion that these employees were working for anyone other than this employer at the time of the discharge.

Although the unit approved by the Board was small, we cannot agree that the Board was required to include all of the manual employees of the hotel and casino complex in the same unit and that its choice of a unit of stagehands was arbitrary and capricious. See Pacific Southwest Airlines v. NLRB, 587 F.2d 1032, 1037 (9th Cir. 1978); Atlas Hotels, Inc. v. NLRB, 519 F.2d 1330, 1334 (9th Cir. 1975) "The critical determinant is whether the employees share a substantial community of interest sufficient to justify their mutual inclusion in a single bargaining unit." Pacific Southwest Airlines v. NLRB, supra at 1038. Here the administrative law judge found that the stagehands were an appropriate unit because they performed identical duties, they all had training or experience in that area, their work was confined to a particular part of the hotel, and they did not work with other maintenance workers. We cannot say that the Board's decision was arbitrary or capricious.

We turn finally to the appropriateness of the order. The company objects to the order as being overly broad and as improperly containing an order to bargain. The injunction against unfair labor practices other than the ones specifically found may be justified where there is a danger of their commission in the future because of the employer's past course of conduct. NLRB v. Express Publishing Co., 312 U.S. 426, 437, 61 S.Ct. 693, 700, 85 L.Ed. 930 (1941); Polynesian Cultural Center, Inc. v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 467, 476 (9th Cir. 1978). With respect to bargaining orders, the standards to be followed are those contained in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), which held that a bargaining order may be warranted where unfair labor practices have tended to undermine union majority strength and would interfere with a fair election. See also Pay'N Save Corp. v. NLRB, 641 F.2d 697, 702–703 (9th Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Bighorn Beverage, 614 F.2d 1238, 1243 (9th Cir. 1980). Although this cannot be viewed as an extreme case clearly warranting an order to bargain as a matter of law, the union here had majority status and this can not be viewed as a "minor case" within the standards laid down in Gissel. In addition, since a small bargaining unit is involved, the need for a bargaining order is greater. Pay'N Save Corp. v. NLRB, supra 641 F.2d at 703. The pattern of activity engaged in by the employer during a short period of time, which included discharges for union activity and the refusal to replace the discharged employees until after an election, indicates a concentrated effort to nip union organization in the bud. The Board's order was warranted.

Order enforced as modified.

Clayton v. International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America

107 LRRM 2385, May 26, 1981—623 F.2d 563

On certiorari to 9th Cir.

Before BURGER, Chief Justice, and BRENNAN, STEWART, WHITE, MARSHALL, BLACKMUN, POWELL, REHNQUIST, and STEVENS, Justices

Justice Brennan delivered the opinion of the Court: An employee seeking a remedy for an alleged breach of the collective-bargaining agreement between his union and employer must attempt to exhaust any exclusive grievance and arbitration procedures established by that agreement before he may maintain a suit against his union or employer under § 301(a) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, 29 U.S.C. § 185(a). Republic Steel Corp. v. Maddox, 379 U.S. 650, 652–653, 58 LRRM 2193 (1965); see Hines v. Anchor Motor Freight, Inc., 424 U.S. 554, 563, 91 LRRM 2481 (1976); Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 184, 64 LRRM 2369 (1967). The question presented by this case is whether, and in what circumstances, an employee alleging that his union breached its duty of fair representation in processing his grievance, and that his employer breached the collective-bargaining agreement, must also attempt to exhaust the internal union appeals procedures established by his union's constitution before he may maintain his suit under § 301.

After eight years in the employ of ITT Gilfillan, Clifford E. Clayton, a member of the United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW) and a shop steward of its Local 509, was dismissed for violating a plant rule prohibiting defined misbehavior. Pursuant to the mandatory grievance and arbitration procedure established by the collective-bargaining agreement between ITT and Local 509. Clayton asked his union representative to file a grievance on his behalf on the ground that his dismissal was not for just cause. The union investigated Clayton's charges, pursued his grievance through the third step of the grievance procedure, and made a timely request for arbitration.[1] It then withdrew the request, choosing not to proceed to arbitration. Clayton was notified of the union's decision after the time for requesting arbitration had expired.[2]

The UAW requires every union member "who feels aggrieved by any action, decision, or penalty imposed upon him" by the union to exhaust internal union appeals procedures before seeking redress from a "civil court or governmental agency." UAW Constitution, Art. 33, § 12. These procedures, established by Arts. 32 and 33 of the UAW Constitution and incorporated into Art. IV of Local 509's bylaws, direct the employee first to seek relief from the membership of his local. Art. 33, § 3. If not satisfied with the result obtained there, the employee may further appeal to the International Executive Board of the UAW, and eventually to either the Constitutional Convention Appeals Committee or to a Public Review Board composed of "impartial persons of good public repute" who are not members or employees of the union. Arts. 32, 33, §§ 3–11.

Clayton did not file a timely internal appeal from his local's decision not to seek arbitration of his grievance.[3] Instead, six months after the union's withdrawal of its request for arbitration, Clayton filed this action under § 301(a) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, 29 U.S.C. § 185(a), in the District Court for the Central District of California. He alleged that the union had breached its duty of fair representation by arbitrarily refusing to pursue his grievance past the third step of the grievance procedure, and that the employer had breached the collective-bargaining agreement by discharging him without just cause.[4]

Both the union and the employer pleaded as an affirmative defense Clayton's failure to exhaust the internal union appeals procedure. Jt. App. 12, 18. The District Court sustained this defense, finding that Clayton had failed to exhaust the internal appeals procedures; that those procedures were adequate as a matter of law; that Clayton had been advised of their existence; and that his failure to ex-

[1] The collective-bargaining agreement between Local 509 and ITT Gilfillan establishes a four-step grievance procedure, with binding arbitration as the fourth step. Art. IX of the agreement provides that if the union wishes to request arbitration, it must do so within 15 working days after completion of the third step of the grievance procedure. Jt. App. 31–36.

[2] Clayton was notified of the union's decision by a letter written by the International Representative responsible for servicing Local 509. Jt. App. 78–79. Neither the union nor the employer contests Clayton's allegation that he received this letter more than 15 working days after completion of the third step of the grievance procedure. See Jt. App. 7, R.T. 88–99.

[3] Under Art. 33, § 3 of the UAW Constitution, Clayton had 30 days from the date the union withdrew its request for arbitration to initiate the internal union appeals procedures.

[4] To prevail in an action under § 301 against either the employer or the union, an employee must ordinarily establish both that the union breached its duty of fair representation and that the employer breached the collective-bargaining agreement. Hines v. Anchor Motor Freight, Inc., 424 U.S. 554, 570–571, 91 LRRM 2481 (1976).

haust could not be excused as futile. R.T. 397–404. Accordingly, the Court dismissed Clayton's suit against both the union and the employer.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the dismissal of Clayton's suit against the union and reversed the dismissal of his suit against the employer. 623 F.2d 563, 104 LRRM 2118 (1980). Focusing on the adequacy of the relief available under the internal union appeals procedure, the Court of Appeals held that Clayton's failure to exhaust was fatal to his claim against the union, because by filing an internal appeal Clayton might have received money damages, the relief he sought in his § 301 suit against the union. Id., at 566. However, the Court held that Clayton's failure to exhaust did not bar his suit against the employer, because the internal appeals procedure could not result in either reinstatement of his job, which was the relief Clayton sought from the employer under § 301, or in reactivation of his grievance. Id., at 569–570.

In No. 80-5049, Clayton argues that his § 301 claim against the UAW and Local 509 should be allowed to proceed despite his failure to exhaust internal union procedures. In No. 80-54, ITT Gilfillan argues that if Clayton's failure to exhaust bars his suit against the union, it must also bar his suit against the employer.

The Courts of Appeals are divided over whether an employee should be required to exhaust internal union appeals procedures before bringing suit against a union or employer under § 301. Some hold that the employee's failure to exhaust internal union procedures may not be asserted as a defense by an employer.[5] Others permit the defense to be asserted by an employer if the internal appeals procedures could result in reactivation of the grievance.[6] With respect to a union, some courts hold that the employee's failure to exhaust is excused if union officials would be so hostile to an employee that he could not hope to obtain a fair hearing.[7] Others would also excuse the employee's failure to exhaust if the substantive relief available through the internal procedures would be less than that available in his § 301 action.[8]

We granted certiorari to resolve the conflict.———U.S.———(1980). We reverse the dismissal of Clayton's suit against the union and affirm the reversal of the dismissal of his suit against the employer. We hold that where an internal union appeals procedure cannot result in reactivation of the employee's grievance or an award of the complete relief sought in his § 301 suit, exhaustion will not be required with respect to either the suit against the employer or the suit against the union.

II

In Republic Steel Corp. v. Maddox, supra, we were asked to decide whether an employee alleging a violation of the collective-bargaining agreement between his union and employer must attempt to exhaust exclusive contractual grievance and arbitration procedures before bringing suit under § 301(a).[9] In deciding that issue we looked to principles of federal common law. See Textile Workers Union v. Lincoln Mills, 353 U.S. 448, 457, 40 LRRM 2113 (1957). Two considerations influenced our decision to require exhaustion. First, Congress had "expressly approved contract grievance procedures as a preferred method for settling disputes and stabilizing the 'common law' of the plant." 379 U.S., at 653.[10] Second, a contrary rule, allowing an employee to bring suit under § 301 without attempting to exhaust the contractual grievance procedures, would "deprive employer and union of the ability to establish a uniform and exclusive method for orderly settlement of employee grievances." Ibid.[11] The rule established by Republic Steel was thus intended to protect the integrity of the collective-bargaining process and to further that aspect of national labor policy that encourages private rather than judicial resolution of disputes arising over the interpretation and application of collective-bargaining agreements. See Hines v. Anchor Motor Freight, Inc., supra, 424 U.S., at 567, 570–571.

These cases compare the relief available through internal procedures with the relief available against the union under § 301.

[9] Section 301(a) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. 29 U.S.C. § 185(a), provides:

> "Suits for violation of contracts between an employer and a labor organization representing employees in any industry affecting commerce . . . may be brought in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties, without respect to the amount in controversy or without regard to the citizenship of the parties."

[10] Section 203(d) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 173(d), provides that "[f]inal adjustment by a method agreed upon by the parties is declared to be the desirable method for settlement of grievance disputes arising over the application or interpretation of an existing collective-bargaining agreement."

The contractual procedures we required the employee to exhaust in Republic Steel are significantly different from the procedures at issue here. In this case, the Court is asked to require exhaustion of internal union procedures. These procedures are wholly a creation of the UAW Constitution. They were not bargained for by the employer and union and are nowhere mentioned in the collective-bargaining agreement that Clayton seeks to have judicially enforced.[12] Nonetheless, Clayton's employer and union contend that exhaustion of the UAW procedures, like exhaustion of contractual and arbitration procedures, will further national labor policy and should be required as a matter of federal common law. Their argument, in brief, is that an exhaustion requirement will enable unions to regulate their internal affairs without undue judicial interference and that it will also promote the broader goal of encouraging private resolution of disputes arising out of a collective-bargaining agreement.

We do not agree that the policy of forestalling judicial interference with internal union affairs is applicable to this case.[13] This policy has been strictly limited to dispute arising over internal union matters such as those involving the interpretation and application of a union constitution. As we stated in NLRB v. Marine Workers, 391 U.S. 418, 68 LRRM 2257 (1968), the policy of deferring judicial consideration of internal union matters does not extend to issues "in the public domain and beyond the internal affairs of the union." Id., at 426, n. 8.[14] Here, Clayton's dispute against his union is based upon an alleged breach of the union's duty of fair representation. This allegation raises issues rooted in statutory policies extending far beyond internal union interests. See United Parcel Service, Inc. v. Mitchell, ——— U.S., ———, ———, n. 2. 107 LRRM 2001 (STEWART, J., concurring); Hines v. Anchor Motor Freight, Inc., supra, 424 U.S., at 562; Vaca v. Sipes, supra, 386 U.S., at 182; Humphrey v. Moore, 375 U.S. 335, 55 LRRM 2031 (1964).

Our analysis, then, focuses on that aspect of national labor policy that encourages private rather than judicial resolution of disputes arising over collective-bargaining agreements. Concededly, a requirement that aggrieved employees exhaust internal remedies might lead to nonjudicial resolution of some contractual grievances. For example, an employee who exhausts internal union procedures might decide not to pursue his § 301 action in court, either because the union offered him a favorable settlement, or because it demonstrated that his underlying contractual claim was without merit. However, we decline to impose a universal exhaustion requirement lest employees with meritorious § 301 claims be forced to exhaust themselves and their resources by submitting their claims to potentially lengthy internal union procedures that may not be adequate to redress their underlying grievances.

[11] We also noted that exhaustion would serve the interests of both the union and the employer.

"[It] complements the union's status as exclusive bargaining representative by permitting [the union] to participate actively in the continuing administration of the contract. In addition, conscientious handling of grievance claims will enhance the union's prestige with employees. Employer interests, for their part, are served by limiting the choice of remedies available to aggrieved employees." 379 U.S., at 653.

Moreover, exhaustion would not adversely affect the employee:

"[I]t cannot be said, in the normal situation, that contract grievance procedures are inadequate to protect the interests of an aggrieved employee until the employee has attempted to implement the procedures and found them so." Ibid.

We concluded that since an employee bringing a § 301 claim is asserting rights created by a collective bargaining agreement, he should also be required to pursue the dispute resolution procedures created by that agreement See Hines v. Anchor Motor Freight, Inc., supra, 424 U.S., at 562–563, Vaca v. Sipes, supra, 386 U.S. at 184.

[12] Indeed, the parties concede that Clayton has exhausted the grievance and arbitration procedures that were expressly created by the collective-bargaining agreement.

[13] This policy has its statutory roots in § 101 (a)(4) of the Landrum-Griffin Act, 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(4), which is part of the subchapter of the Act entitled "Bill of Rights of Members of Labor Organizations." Section 101(a)(4) provides:

"No labor organization shall limit the right of any member thereof to institute an action in any court, * * * Provided, That any such member may be required to exhaust reasonable hearing procedures (but not to exceed a four-month lapse of time) within such organization, before instituting legal * * * proceedings against such organizations or any officer thereof * * *."

[14] In NLRB v. Marine Workers, 391 U.S. 418, 68 LRRM 2257 (1968), we held that respondent union could not discipline one of its members for failing to exhaust internal appeals procedures before filing an unfair labor practice charge with the NLRB, because the unfair labor practices charge was "in the public domain and beyond the internal affairs of the union." Id., at 425. "A proceeding by the [NLRB] is not to adjudicate private rights but to effectuate a public policy," and "[a]ny coercion used to discourage, retard, or defeat * * * access [to those proceedings] is beyond the legitimate interests of a labor organization." Id., at 424. Moreover, "[t]here cannot be any justification to make the public processes wait until the union member exhausts internal procedures plainly inadequate to deal with all phases of the complex problem concerning employer, union, and employee member. If the member becomes exhausted, instead of the remedies, the issues of public policy are never reached and an airing of the grievance never had." Id., at 425. See also 105 Cong. Rec. 17899. 86th Cong., 1st Sess. (1959) (remarks of Sen Kennedy) (§ 101(a)(4) not intended "to eliminate existing grievance procedures established by union constitutions for redress of alleged violations of their internal governing laws").

As we stated in NLRB v. Marine Workers, supra, 391 U.S., at 426, and n. 8, courts have discretion to decide whether to require exhaustion of internal union procedures. In exercising this discretion, at least three factors should be relevant: first, whether union officials are so hostile to the employee that he could not hope to obtain a fair hearing on his claim; second, whether the internal union appeals procedures would be inadequate either to reactivate the employee's grievance or to award him the full relief he seeks under § 301; and third, whether exhaustion of internal procedures would unreasonably delay the employee's opportunity to obtain a judicial hearing on the merits of his claim. If any of these factors are found to exist, the court may properly excuse the employee's failure to exhaust.

Clayton has not challenged the finding of the lower courts that the UAW internal appeals procedures are fair and reasonable. He concedes that he could have received an impartial hearing on his claim had he exhausted the internal union procedures. See Glover v. St. Louis-San Francisco R. Co., 393 U.S. 324, 330–331, 70 LRRM 2097 (1969). Accordingly, our inquiry turns to the second factor, whether the relief available through the union's internal appeals procedures is adequate.

In his suit under § 301, Clayton seeks reinstatement from his employer and monetary relief from both his employer and his union.[15] Although, the UAW Constitution does not indicate on its face what relief is available through the internal union appeals procedures,[16] the parties have stipulated that the Public Review Board can award backpay in an appropriate case, R.T. 35–36, and the two decisions of the Public Review Board reprinted in the Joint Appendix both resulted in awards of backpay. Jt. App. 89–109. It is clear, then, that at least some monetary relief may be obtained through the internal appeals procedure.[17]

It is equally clear that the union can neither reinstate Clayton in his job, see supra n. 158 nor reactivate his grievance. Article IX of the collective-bargaining agreement between Local 509 and ITT Gilfillan provides that the union may obtain arbitration of a grievance only if it gives "notice * * * to the Company in writing within fifteen (15) working days after the date of the Company's decision at Step 3 of the Grievance Procedure." By the time Clayton learned of his union's decision not to pursue the grievance to arbitration, this 15-day time limit had expired. See supra n. 2. Accordingly, the union could not have demanded arbitration even if the internal appeal had shown Clayton's claim to be meritorious. The union was bound by its earlier decision not to pursue Clayton's grievance past the third stage of the grievance and arbitration procedure.[18] For the reasons that [15] Jt. App. 8–9. Reinstatement is available only from the employer, because the union has no power to order reinstatement under the collective-bargaining agreement. Damages, however, can be assessed against both the employer and the union. As we stated in Vaca v. Sipes, supra, 386 U.S., at 197–198, an employee who establishes that the union breached its duty of fair representation in processing his grievance, and that the employer breached the collective-bargaining agreement, may be entitled to an award of damages.

"apportion[ed] * * * between the employer and the union according to the damage caused by the fault of each. Thus, damages attributable solely to the employer's breach of contract should not be charged to the union, but increases if any in those damages caused by the union's refusal to process the grievance should not be charged to the employer."

[16] The UAW Constitution states only that the Constitutional Convention Appeals Committee has "the authority to consider and decide all appeals submitted to it," Art. 33, § 8, and that the Public Review Board has the "authority and duty to make final and binding decisions on all cases appealed to it." Art. 32, § 3(a), and to "dispose of all facets of the appeal." Art. 33, § 11.

[17] The record does not indicate whether this monetary relief includes backpay only, or whether is also may include prospective monetary relief incidental or punitive damages, relief that Clayton is apparently seeking in his § 301 action. See Jt. App. 9.

[18] The parties stipulated at trial that once Local 509 withdrew its request for arbitration, that "was the end of the road so far as remedies under the contract were concerned." R.T. 109; see also R.T. 260, 268. That stipulation is consistent with the collective-bargaining agreement. Although Art. VIII, which establishes time limits for processing grievances, states that "[t]he time limits contained herein may be extended by follow, we conclude that these restrictions on the relief available through the internal UAW procedures render those procedures inadequate.[19]

Where internal union appeals procedures can result in either complete relief to an aggrieved employee or reactivation of his grievance, exhaustion would advance the national labor policy of encouraging private resolution of contractual labor disputes. In such cases, the internal union procedures are capable of fully resolving meritorious claims short of the judicial forum. Thus, if the employee received the full relief he requested through internal procedures, his § 301 action would become moot, and he would not be entitled to a judicial hearing. Similarly, if the employee obtained reactivation of his grievance through internal union procedures, the policies underlying Republic Steel would come into play,[20] and the employee would be required to submit his claim to the collectively-bargained dispute-resolution procedures.[21] In either case, exhaustion of internal remedies could result in final resolution of the employee's contractual grievance through private rather than judicial avenues.

By contrast, where an aggrieved employee cannot obtain either the substantive relief he seeks or reactivation of his grievance, national labor policy would not be served by requiring exhaustion of internal remedies. In such cases, exhaustion would be a useless gesture: it would delay judicial consideration of the employee's § 301 action, but would not eliminate it.[22] The employee would still be required to pursue judicial means to obtain the relief he seeks under § 301. Moreover, exhaustion would not lead to significant savings in judicial resources, because regardless of the outcome of the internal appeal, the employee would be required to prove de novo in his § 301 suit that the union breached its duty of fair representation and that the employer breached the collective-bargaining agreement.[23] As we recently stated, one of the important federal policies underlying § 301 is the "relatively rapid dispostion of labor disputes." United Parcel Service, Inc, v. Mitchell, supra, ——— U.S., at ———, quoting United Auto Workers v. Hoosier Cardinal Corp., 383 U.S. 696, 707, 61 LRRM 2545 (1966). This policy is undermined by an exhaustion requirement unless the internal procedures are capable of either reactivating the employee's grievance or of redressing it.[24] mutual agreement in writing by the parties concerned," there is no comparable waiver provision in Art. IX, which establishes the 15-day time limit for requesting arbitration. See also Tinsley v. United Parcel Services, Inc., supra, 635 F.2d, at 1292; Baldini v. Local Union No 1095, supra, 581 F.2d, at 150; Harrison v. Chrysler Corp., supra, 558 F.2d, at 1279.

Although most collective-bargaining agreements contain similarly strict time limits for seeking arbitration of grievances, there are some exceptions. The UAW informs us that "[s]ome employers and unions have, through collective bargaining, agreed to allow the reinstatement of withdrawn grievances where a union tribunal reverses the union's initial decision. This is true, for example, in the current UAW contracts with the major automobile and agricultural implement manufacturers." UAW Brief 18, n. 40. In such cases, the relief available through the union's internal appeal procedures would presumably be adequate.

[19] Accordingly, we need not discuss the third factor, whether exhaustion of the union's otherwise adequate internal appeals procedures would unreasonably delay the employee's opportunity to obtain a judicial hearing on the merits of his claim.

[20] Allowing a defendant in a § 301 action to demand exhaustion of internal union procedures when those procedures could lead to reactivation of a stalled grievance is wholly consistent with Republic Steel Corp. v. Maddox, 379 U.S. 650, 58 LRRM 2193 (1965). In Republic Steel, we held that an employer may rely on a provision in a collective-bargaining agreement requiring its employees to submit all contractual grievances to arbitration prior to bringing suit under § 301. If a provision in the collective-bargaining agreement also permits reactivation of a grievance after an internal union appeal, an employer or union should also be able to rely on that provision and thus defend the § 301 suit on the ground that the employee failed to exhaust internal union procedures.

[21] In addition, by reactivating the grievance, the union might be able to rectify the very wrong of which the employee complains—a breach of the duty of fair representation caused by the union's refusal to seek arbitration—and the employee would then be unable to satisfy the precondition to a § 301 suit against the employer.

[22] Of course exhaustion might deplete the employee's energy and resources to the point where he chooses not to pursue his § 301 claim in court, but that result is surely inconsistent with federal policy.

[23] Even if the union admitted during the internal appeals procedure that it had breached its duty of fair representation, an admission the UAW has apparently made only once in the 20 years preceding 1977, see Klein, "Enforcement of the Right to Fair Representation: Alternative Forums," in The Duty of Fair Representation 103 (1977), the employee would still not be saved the time and expense of proving that breach in his § 301 suit. While a union's admission that it breached its duty of fair representation is certainly evidence a court can consider, an employer defending a § 301 suit would still be entitled to prove that no such breach had occurred. See Vaca v. Sipes, supra, 386 U.S., at 186–187.

[24] We are also not persuaded by the Court of Appeals' assumption that exhaustion would narrow and focus the issues for ultimate judicial determination. The Court of Appeals stated:

"The UAW's liability (if any) for breach of its duty of fair representation would depend on the reasons for the union's withdrawal of the arbitration request. There is little in the record to indicate why the local official changed his mind and withdrew the arbitration request. But the missing motive is precisely the sort of information that an appellate body within the union would have elicited, compiling a record that would greatly assist the court now." 623 F.2d, at 566 (emphasis added).

Continued

In reliance upon the Court of Appeals' opinion in this case, the UAW contends that even if exhaustion is not required with respect to the employer, it should be required with respect to the union, because the relief Clayton seeks against the union in his § 301 suit is available through internal union procedures. But cf. supra, n. 17. We disagree. While this argument might have force where the employee has chosen to bring his § 301 suit only against the union, the defense should not be available where, as here, the employee has filed suit against both the union and the employer. A trial court requiring exhaustion with respect to the suit against the union, but not with respect to the suit against the employer, would be faced with two undesirable alternatives. If it stayed the action against the employer pending resolution of the internal appeals procedures, it would effectively be requiring exhaustion with respect to the suit against the employer, a result we have held would violate national labor policy. Yet if it permitted the action against the employer to proceed, and tolled the running of the statute of limitation in the suit against the union until the internal procedures had been exhausted, it could very well find itself with two separate § 301 suits, based on the same facts, proceeding at different paces in its courtroom. As we suggested in Vaca v. Sipes, supra, 386 U.S. at 197, this is a result that should be avoided if possible. The preferable approach is for the court to permit the employee's § 301 action to proceed against both defendants, despite the employee's failure to exhaust, unless the internal union procedures can reactivate the grievance or grant the relief that would be available in the employee's § 301 suit against both defendants.

In contrast to contractual grievance and arbitration procedures, which are negotiated by the parties to a collective-bargaining agreement and are generally designed to provide an exclusive method for resolving disputes arising under that agreement, internal union appeals procedures are created by the union constitution and are designed to settle disputes between an employee and his union that arise under that constitution. Because of this distinction, the policies underlying Republic Steel, encouraging private resolution of grievances arising out of the collective-bargaining process, are not directly applicable to the issue whether to require exhaustion of internal union procedures.

We conclude that the policies underlying Republic Steel are furthered by an exhaustion requirement only where the internal union appeals procedures can either grant the aggrieved employee full relief or reactivate his grievance. For only in those circumstances is there a reasonable possibility that the employee's claim will be privately resolved. If the internal procedures are not adequate to effect that relief, the employee should not be required to expend time and resources seeking a necessarily incomplete resolution of his claim prior to pursuing judicial relief. If the internal procedures are inadequate, the employee's failure to exhaust should be excused, and he should be permitted to pursue his claim for breach of the duty of fair respresentation and breach of the collective-bargaining agreement in court under § 301.

There are three reasons why we are not persuaded by this analysis. First, the record does indicate why the union withdrew its request for arbitration of Clayton's grievance. The letter from Local 509's International Representative to Clayton, informing him that the union had withdrawn its request for arbitration, listed five reasons in support of the union's decision. See supra n. 2. Second, since the UAW Constitution does not on its face require any of the decisionmaking panels of the union to explain the reasons underlying their disposition of an employee's internal union appeal, there is no guarantee that exhaustion will result in a useful interpretation of union rules. Third, in many cases the union tribunal is not permitted to consider certain allegations the employee could assert under § 301. In this case, for example, Clayton alleges that the union "acted arbitrarily * * * and discriminatorily" in refusing to seek arbitration of his grievance. Jt App. 6 (emphasis added). The UAW constitution, however, states that the Public Review Board can only consider allegations that the employee's grievance "was improperly handled [by the union] because of fraud, discrimination, or collusion with management." Art. 33, § 8(b) (emphasis added). This standard offers the aggrieved employee less protection than the "arbitrary, discriminatory or in bad faith" standard for breach of the duty of fair representation that we developed in Vaca v. Sipes, supra, at 190. As the General Counsel to the Public Review Board has stated:

> "The UAW acknowledges that it has a duty of fair representation to its members. Moreover, it acknowleges that its members may assert a claim for a breach of the duty of fair representation within the system of internal remedies. It does not concede to its members, however, that arbitrary, perfunctory, or negligent conduct amounts to a breach of the duty of fair representation, nor does it permit them even to assert this type of claim before the PRB, since the standard of review is jurisdictional. That is, unless the requisite claim is made (fraud, discrimination, or collusion) the board may not entertain it." Klein, "Enforcement of the Right of Fair Representation: Alternative Forums," supra, at 99.

See also Johnson v. General Motors, supra, 641 F.2d, at ——. Of course, if an allegation cannot be considered by the Public Review Board, no record helpful to a court will be made with respect to that issue. In sum, we conclude that the prospect that exhaustion would create a record helpful to a court in a subsequent § 301 action is too speculative to be given much weight.

In this case, the internal union appeals panels cannot reactivate Clayton's grievance and cannot grant Clayton the reinstatement relief he seeks under § 301. We therefore hold that Clayton should not have been required to exhaust internal union appeals procedures prior to bringing suit against his union and employer under § 301.

AFFIRMED IN PART, REVERSED IN PART.

JUSTICE POWELL, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE joins, dissenting.

I join Justice REHNQUIST's dissent, and write briefly to emphasize a rationale—suggested by an *amicus curiae—that is consistent both with national labor policy and the relevant precedents.

In briefest summary, I would hold that in the circumstances of this case no issue concerning the breach of the union's statutory duty of fair representation properly can be said to arise at all. The union has not made a final determination whether to pursue arbitration on Clayton's behalf. Clayton should not be able to claim a breach of duty by the union until the union has had a full opportunity to make this determination. No such opportunity exists until Clayton exhausts the procedures available for resolving that question. Thus, as Clayton cannot claim a breach of duty by the union, he cannot bring a breach of contract suit under § 301 against his employer.

In my view, the asserted distinction in a tripartite case such as this one between contractual and internal union remedies, ante, at 7, is immaterial. The situation presented in this case is well within the doctrine, underlying Republic Steel Corp. v. Maddox, 379 U.S. 650, 58 LRRM 2193 (1965), that employees must pursue all procedures established for determining whether a union will go forward with a grievance. Employees must pursue available procedures even if the collective-bargaining agreement contains time limits that appear on their face to bar revival of the grievance. As the Court noted in John Wiley & Sons v. Livingston, 376 U.S. 543, 556, 55 LRRM 2769 (1964), "[q]uestions concerning the procedural prerequisites to arbitration do not arise in a vacuum; they develop in the context of an actual dispute about the rights of the parties to the contract or those covered by it." Therefore, "it best accords with the usual purposes of an arbitration clause and with the policy behind federal labor law to regard procedural disagreements not as separate disputes but as aspects of the dispute which called the grievance procedures into play." Id., at 599. Thus, the question whether such time limits should be waived in a particular case is itself an arbitrable matter.

JUSTICE REHNQUIST, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE, JUSTICE STEWART, and JUSTICE POWELL join, dissenting.

The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that the defense of exhaustion of internal union remedies was available to the union defendant in this § 301 action but not to the employer defendant. The result of this ruling was to put the employer in the unenviable position of having to defend the manner in which the union represented one of its employees (Clayton) during a grievance procedure. The Court's opinion today rights what I view as the principal error in the decision below by requiring the actions against the employer and union to proceed simultaneously. Ante, at 14. The Court reaches this conclusion by holding that in this particular case the exhaustion defense should not be available to either the union or employer. I, however, view differently than does the Court the benefits to be obtained from requiring exhaustion in this case, and would require Clayton to exhaust his intraunion remedies before proceeding against either his union or employer.

The court does not require exhaustion of internal union remedies in this case because it finds the remedies cannot provide Clayton with all the substantive relief he seeks (i.e., money damages and reinstatement) or with reactivation of his grievance. Ante, at 12. The Court, however, concedes that where the internal remedies can provide such relief, the exhaustion defense should be available to the employer and union alike. Id., at 12, and n. 20. Presumably, this would require exhaustion in a § 301 case where the only relief sought was money damages and money damages were obtainable through the internal union procedures. In such a case, the employee would be able to obtain all "the substantive relief he seeks." Ibid.

The Court creates a three prong test for determining when a district court shoud exercise its discretion and require exhaustion of intraunion remedies. Ante at 9. Admittedly, a district court when exercising this discretion should carefully consider the first criterion referred to by the Court—whether union officials are so hostile to the employee that he could not obtain a fair hearing on his claim. Ibid. However, there is no question that this criterion does not come into play in this case. Ante. at 9.

*Brief for the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations. 3–4, 5–14.

The second prong of the Court's test is "whether the internal union appeals procedures would be inadequate either to reactivate the employee's grievance or to award him the full relief he seeks under § 301 * * *." Ibid. Exhaustion is not required in this case, the Court says, because the UAW's internal union appeals procedures cannot provide Clayton with reinstatement or reactivation of his grievance.

However, no prior case of this Court has held that exhaustion should not be required unless the internal union remedies can provide all the substantive relief requested or reactivation of the grievance. The principal difficulty with the Court's opinion lies in its framing of this second criterion which reflects much too narrow a view of the purposes of the exhaustion defense and the benefits which will likely result from requiring exhaustion in a case where a union has established a means for reviewing the manner in which it has represented an employee during a grievance. It is worth noting that neither NLRB v. Marine Workers, 391 U.S. 418, 68 LRRM 2257 (1968), on which the Court so heavily relies, nor any other case of this Court, supports the language used by the Court in the second prong of its test. In fact, Marine Workers simply states exhaustion should not be required "when the administrative remedies are inadequate." Id., at 426, n. 8. Our focus therefore should be on the adequacies of the union remedies when viewed in the context of the underlying purpose of the exhaustion defense—which is, to encourage private rather than judicial resolution of disputes.

The exhaustion of intraunion remedies, even where those remedies cannot provide reinstatement or reactivation of a grievance, does promote private resolution of labor disputes. Resort to the intraunion appeals procedures provides the union with its first opportunity to focus on the issue of fair representation—as opposed to the alleged breach of the collective-bargaining agreement. Resort to the union appeals procedures gives the union an opportunity to satisfy the employee that its decision not to pursue a grievance was correct. If successful on this score, litigation is averted. Where a union determines through its appeals procedure that it mishandled an employee's grievance, litigation may also be averted because at that point both the union and the employer have a strong incentive to pursue private resolution of the grievance. Even where a collective-bargaining agreement does not provide for reactivation of a grievance, it is reasonable to assume that many employers, when confronted with both a determination by a union that it had breached its duty of fair representation and the immediate prospect of an employee commencing litigation, would seriously consider voluntarily reactivating the grievance procedure to avoid the additional burden and costs of litigation. Should litigation nonetheless occur, exhaustion may well have narrowed the factual and legal issues to be decided and thus result in a savings of judicial resources. A fact that should also not be discounted is that the conscientious handling by a union of an employee's intraunion appeal cannot help but enhance the union's prestige with its employees. Cf. Republic Steel Corp. v. Maddox, 379 U.S. 650, 653, 58 LRRM 2193 (1965). Exhaustion promotes union democracy and self-government as well as the broader policy of non-interference with internal union affairs. A union's incentive to maintain internal procedures which provide substantial procedural protection and which can afford significant substantive relief will be greatly undermined if an employee can simply bypass the procedures at will.

The error in the Court's analysis results in part from its apparent belief that intraunion remedies must provide a complete substitute for either the courts or the contract grievance procedure in order to be deemed "adequate." The purpose of intraunion remedies, however, is quite different. These remedies are provided to facilitate or encourage the private resolution of disputes, not to be a complete substitute for the courts. Intraunion remedies can serve this purpose so long as they have the capacity to address whether the union wrongfully handled the grievance. Obviously, if a union appeals procedure cannot address this question, exhaustion should not be required.

An additional question which is also of great importance is whether a union should ever be found to have breached its duty of fair representation when a union member shuns an appeals procedure which is both mandated by the union constitution and established for the purpose of allowing the union to satisfy its duty of fair representation. It seems to me not at all unreasonable to say that a union should have the right to require its members to give it the first opportunity to correct its own mistakes. Responsible union self-government demands a fair opportunity to function. This is especially true in a situation such as here where exhaustion of the union remedies could eliminate the need to litigate altogether. Congress has recognized the importance of these values in § 101(a)(4) of the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(4). This section provides in part:

> No labor organization shall limit the right of any member thereof to institute an action in any court, or any proceeding before any administrative agency * * *. Provided, That any such member may be required to exhaust reasonable hearing procedures (but not to exceed a four-month lapse of time) within such organization, before instituting legal or administrative proceedings against such organizations or any officer thereof * * *."

In § 101(a)(4), Congress has restricted the power of unions to limit the rights of their members to resort to the courts. At the same time, however, Congress gave the judiciary the discretion to require union members to exhaust hearing procedures. As this Court explained in Marine Workers, the language in § 101(a)(4) is:

> "* * * a statement of policy that the public tribunals whose aid is invoked may in their discretion stay their hands for four months, while the aggrieved person seeks relief within the union. We read it, in other words, as installing in this labor field a regime comparable to that which prevails in other areas of law before the federal courts, which often stay their hands while a litigant seeks administrative relief before the appropriate agency." 391 U.S., at 426.

Section 101(a)(4) reflects what I believe to be the reasonable compromise Congress reached when trying to balance two somewhat competing interests—furtherance of the national labor policy in favor of private resolution of disputes on the one hand and the desire not to unduly burden or "exhaust" an individual employee with time-consuming procedures on the other. It is fair to say that § 104(a)(4) represents Congress' judgment that limiting access to the courts for at least 4 months is not an unreasonable price to pay in exchange for the previously mentioned benefits exhaustion may provide.

The language of § 104(a)(4) also goes a long way to satisfy the third prong of the test set forth by the Court today. Exhaustion of internal union procedures should not be required where such would unreasonably delay an employee's opportunity to obtain a judicial hearing on the merits of his claim. Ante, at 9. Intraunion procedures which take years to complete serve no worthwhile purpose in the overall scheme of promoting the prompt and private resolution of claims. But a requirement that an employee not be permitted to go to court without first having pursued an intraunion appeal for at least 4 months does substantially further this national labor policy without placing any unfair burden on an employee. As such, I think all interested parties would be well served by a requirement that employees exhaust their intraunion procedures for this limited period of time prescribed by Congress.

H.A. Artists & Associates, Inc. v. Actors' Equity Assn., et al.

107 LRRM 2394, May 26, 1981—622 F.2d 647

On certiorari to 2d Cir.

JUSTICE STEWART delivered the opinion of the Court: The respondent, Actors' Equity Association (Equity), is a union representing the vast majority of stage actors and actresses in the United States. It enters into collective-bargaining agreements with theatrical producers that specify minimum wages and other terms and conditions of employment for those whom it represents. The petitioners are independent theatrical agents who place actors and actresses in jobs with producers. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that the respondents' [1] system of regulation of theatrical agents is immune from antitrust liability by reason of the statutory labor exemption from the antitrust laws, H.A. Artists & Associates, Inc. v. Actors' Equity Assn., 622 F.2d 647, 104 LRRM 2801.[2] We granted certiorari to consider the availability of that exemption in the circumstances presented by this case. —— U.S. ——.

Equity is a national union that has represented stage actors and actresses since early in this century. Currently representing approximately 23,000 actors and actresses, it has collective-bargaining agreements with virtually all major theatrical producers in New York City, on and off-Broadway, and with most other theatrical producers throughout the United States. The terms negotiated with producers are the minimum conditions of employment (called "scale"); an actor or actress is free to negotiate wages or terms more favorable than the collectively bargaining minima.

Theatrical agents are independent contractors who negotiate contracts and solicit employment for their clients. The agents do not participate in the negotiation of collective-bargaining agreements between Equity and the theatrical producers. If an agent succeeds in obtaining employment for a client, he receives a commission based on a percentage of the client's earnings. Agents who operate in New York City must be licensed as employment agencies and are regulated by the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs pursuant to New York law, which provides that the maximum commission a theatrical agent may charge his client is 10% of the client's compensation.

In 1928, concerned with the high unemployment rates in the legitimate theater and the vulnerability of actors and actresses to abuses by theatrical agents,[3] including the extraction of high commissions that tended to undermine collectively bargained rates of compensation, Equity unilaterally established a licensing system for the regulation of agents. The regulations permitted Equity members to deal only with those agents who obtained Equity licenses and thereby agreed to meet the conditions of representation prescribed by Equity. Those members who dealt with nonlicensed agents were subject to union discipline.

The system established by the Equity regulations was immediately challenged.[4] In Edelstein v. Gillmore, 35 F.2d 723, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit concluded that the regulations were a lawful effort to improve the employment conditions of Equity members. In an opinion written by Judge Swan and joined by Judge Augustus N. Hand,[5] the court said:

"The evils of unregulated employment agencies (using this term broadly to include also the personal representative) are set forth in the defendants' affidavits and are corroborated by common knowledge * * *. Hence the requirement that, as a condition to writing new business with Equity's members, old contracts with its members must be made to conform to the new standards, does not seem to us to justify an inference that the primary purpose of the requirement is infliction of injury upon plaintiff, and other personal representatives in a similar situation, rather than the protection of the supposed interests of Equity's members. The terms they insist upon are calculated to secure from personal representatives better and more impartial services, at uniform and cheaper rates, and to improve conditions of employment of actors by theater managers. Undoubtedly the defendants intend to compel the plaintiff to give up rights under existing contracts which do not conform to the new standards set up by Equity, but, as already indicated their motive in so doing is to benefit themselves and their fellow actors in the economic struggle. The financial loss to plaintiff is incidental to this purpose." 35 F.2d at 726 (emphasis added).[6]

The essential elements of Equity's regulation of theatrical agents have remained unchanged since 1928.[7] A member of Equity is prohibited, on pain

[2] The basic sources of organized labor's exemption from federal antitrust laws are §§ 6 amd 20 of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 731 and 738, 15 U.S.C. § 17 and 29 U.S.C. § 52, and the Norris-LaGuardia Act, 47 Stat. 70, 71, and 73, 29 U.S.C. §§ 104, 105, and 113.

[3] Such vulnerability was, and still remains, particularly acute for actors and actresses without established professional reputations, who have always comprised the overwhelming majority of Equity's members.

[4] The challenge was grounded on allegations of common law tortious interference with business relationships.

[5] Judge Manton dissented without opinion.

[7] The petitioners do not dispute this. The regulations have undergone revision in some details, largely as a result of negotiations between Equity and Theatrical Artists Representatives Associates (TARA), which until shortly before this litigation began was the only association voicing of union discipline, from using an agent who has not, through the mechanism of obtaining an Equity license (called a "franchise") agreed to comply with the regulations. The most important of the regulations requires that a licensed agent must renounce any right to take a commission on an employment contract under which an actor or actress receives scale wages.[8] To the extent a contract includes provisions under which an actor or actress will sometimes receive scale pay—for rehearsals or "chorus" employment, for example—and sometimes more, the regulations deny the agent any commission on the scale portions of the contract. Licensed agents are also precluded from taking commissions on out-of-town expense money paid to their clients. Moreover, commissions are limited on wages within 10% of scale pay,[9] and an agent must allow his client to terminate a representation contract if the agent is not successful in procuring employment within a specified period.[10] Finally, agents are required to pay franchise fees to Equity. The fee is $200 for the initial franchise, $60 a year thereafter for each agent, and $40 for any subagent working in the office of another. These fees are deposited by Equity in its general treasury and are not segregated from other union funds.

In 1977, after a dispute between Equity and Theatrical Artists Representatives Associates (TARA)—a trade association representing theatrical agents, see n. 7, supra—a group of agents, including the petitioners, resigned from TARA because of TARA's decision to abide by Equity's regulations. These agents also informed Equity that they would not accept Equity's regulations, or apply for franchises. The petitioners instituted this lawsuit in May 1978, contending that Equity's regulations of theatrical agents violated §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2.

B

The District Court found, after a bench trial, that Equity's creation and maintenance of the agency franchise system were fully protected by the statutory labor exemptions from the antitrust laws, and accordingly dismissed the petitioners' complaint. H.A. Artists & Associates Inc. v. Actors' Equity Assn., 478 F.Supp. 496, 104 LRRM 2794 (SDNY). Among its factual conclusions, the trial court found that in the theatrical industry, agents play a critical role in securing employment for actors and actresses:

2397

> "As a matter of general industry practice, producers seek actors and actresses for their productions through agents. Testimony in this case convincingly established that an actor without an agent does not have the same access to producers or the same opportunity to be seriously condsidered for a part as does an actor who has an agent. Even principal interviews, in which producers are required to interview all actors who want to be considered for principal roles, do not eliminate the need for an agent, who may have a greater chance of gaining an audition for his client.
> Testimony confirmed that agents play an integral role in the industry; without an agent, an actor would have significantly lesser chances of gaining employment." 478 F.Supp., at 497, 502.

The court also found "no evidence to suggest the existence of any conspiracy between Actors' Equity and TARA or between Actors' Equity and the concerns of agents with regard to their representation of Equity members. Until their voluntary resignation in late 1977, most of the petitioners were members of TARA. The petitioners are now members of the National Association of Talent Representatives (NATR). Unlike TARA, which functions only in the legitimate theater field, NATR also functions in the field of motion pictures and television. In those fields, agents operate under closely analogous agent regulations maintained by the Screen Actors Guild and the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists.

The history of the negotiations and disputes between Equity and TARA are described in the opinion of the District Court in the present case H.A. Artists & Associates, Inc. v. Actors' Equity Assn., 478 F.Supp. 496, 498, 104 LRRM 2794 (SDNY).

[8] The minimum, or "scale" wage varies. In August 1977, for example, the minimum weekly salary was $335 for Broadway performances, and $175 for performances off-Broadway. Scale wages are set by a collective-bargaining agreement between Equity and the producers, to which the agents are not parties. When an agent represents an actor or actress whose professional reputation is not sufficient to demand a salary higher than scale, the agent hopes to develop a relationship that will become continually more remunerative as the performer's professional reputation grows, and with it the power to demand an ever higher salary. No agent is required to represent an actor or actress whom he does not wish to represent.

[9] It is Equity's view that commissions in the industry are not necessarily related to efforts by the agents, and that an agent often functions as little more than an "order taker," who is able to collect a percentage of a client's wages for the duration of a show for doing little more than answering a producer's telephone call. Indeed, an agent may collect a commission on the salary of an actor or actress he represents even if the client obtains the job without the agent.

[10] Equity argues that this restriction is necessary because there is an incentive for agents to represent as many actors and actresses as possible and not necessarily to serve them all well—because an agent receives a commission whenever his client is employed at a salary higher than scale, regardless of the extent of his involvement in obtaining employment for the client.

Producers," and concluded that "[t]he Actors Equity franchising system was employed by Actors Equity for the purpose of protecting the wages and working conditions of its members." Id., at 499.

The Court of Appeals unanimously affirmed the judgment of the District Court. It determined that the threshold issue was, under United States v. Hutcheson, 312 U.S. 219. 232, 7 LRRM 267, whether Equity's franchising system involved any combination between Equity and any "non-labor groups" or persons who are not "parties to a labor dispute." 622 F.2d 647, 648–649, 104 LRRM 2801. If it did, the court reasoned, the protection of the statutory labor exemption would not apply.

First, the Court of Appeals held that the District Court had not been clearly erroneous in finding no agreement, explicit or tacit, between Equity and the producers to establish or police the franchising system. Ibid. Next, the court turned to the relationship between the union and those agents who had agreed to become franchised, in order to determine whether those agreements would divest Equity's system of agency regulation of the statutory exemption. Relying on American Federation of Musicians v. Carroll, 391 U.S. 99, 68 LRRM 2230, the court concluded that the agents were themselves a "labor group," because of their substantial "economic inter-relationshp" with Equity, under which "the union could not eliminate wage competion among its members without regulation of the fees of the agents." 622 F.2d, at 650, 651. Accordingly, since the elimination of wage competition is plainly within the area of a union's legitimate self-interest, the court concluded that the exemption was applicable.[11]

After deciding that the central feature of Equity's franchising system—the union's exaction of an agreement by agents not to charge commission on certain types of work—was immune from antitrust to challenge, the Court of Appeals turned to the petitioner's challenge of the franchise fees exacted from agents, Equity had argued that the fees were necessary to meet its expenses in administering the franchise system, but no evidence was presented at trial to show that the costs justified the fees actually levied. The Court of Appeals suggested that if the exactions exceeded the true costs, they could not legally be collected, as such exactions would be unconnected with any of the goals of national labor policy that justify the labor antitrust exemption. Despite the lack of any cost evidence at trial, however, the appellate court reasoned that the fees were sufficiently low that a remand to the District Court on this point "would not serve any useful purpose." 622 F.2d, at 651.

Labor unions are lawful combinations what serve the collective interests of workers, but they also possess the power to control the character of competition in an industry. Accordingly, there is an inherent tension between national antitrust policy, which seeks to maximize competition, and national labor policy, which encourages cooperation among workers to improve the conditions of employment.[12] In the years immediately following passage of the Sherman Act, courts enjoined strikes as unlawful restraints of trade when a union's conduct or objectives were deemed "socially or economically harmful." Duplex Printing Press Co. v. Deering, 254 U.S. 443, 485 (Brandeis, J., dissenting).[13] In response to these practices, Congress acted, first in the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 731, and later in the Norris-LaGuardia Act, 47 Stat. 70, to immunize labor unions and labor disputes from challenge under the Sherman Act.

Section 6 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 17, declares, that human labor "is not a commodity or article of commerce," and immunizes from antitrust liability labor organizations and their members "lawfully carrying out" their "legitimate objectives." Section 20 of the Act prohibits injunctions against specified employee activities, such as strikes and boycotts, that are undertaken in the employees' self-interest and that occur in the course of disputes

[11] The Court of Appeals recognized that even if there had been an agreement between Equity and a "non-labor group," the agreement might still have been protected from the antitrust laws under the "non-statutory" exemption. 622 F.2d, at 649, n. 1. See Connell Construction Co. v., Plumbers Local 100, 421, U.S. 616, 622, 89 LRRM 2401. See n. 19, infra.

"concerning terms or conditions of employment," and states that none of the specified acts can be "held to be [a] violation * * * of any law of the United States." 29 U.S.C. § 52. This protection is re-emphasized and expanded in the Norris-LaGuardia Act, which prohibits federal court injunctions against single or organized employees engaged in enumerated activities,[14] and specifically forbids such injunction notwithstanding the claim of an unlawful combination or conspiracy. While the Norris-LaGuardia Act's bar of federal court labor injuctions is not explicitly phrased as an exemption from the antitrust laws, it has been interpreted broadly as a statement of congressional policy that the courts must not use the antitrust laws as a vehicle to interfere in labor disputes.[15]

In United States v. Hutcheson, 312 U.S. 219, 7 LRRM 267, the Court held that labor unions acting in their self-interest and not in combination with non-labor groups enjoy a statutory exemption from Sherman Act liability. After describing the congressional responses to judicial interference in union activity, id., at 229–230, the Court declared that

> "[s]o long as a union acts in its self-interest and does not combine with non-labor groups, the licit and the illicit under § 20 [of the Clayton Act] are not to be distinguished by any judgement regarding the wisdom or unwisdom, the rightness or wrongness, the selfishness or unselfishness of the end of which the particular union activites are the means," Id., at 232 (footnote omitted).

The Court explained that this exemption derives not only from the Clayton Act, but also from the Norris-LaGuardia Act, particularly its definition of a "labor dispute," see n. 14, supra, in which Congress "reasserted the original purpose of the Clayton Act by infusing into it the immunized trade union activities as redefined by the later Act." 312 U.S., at 236. Thus under Hutcheson, no federal injunction may issue over a "labor dispute," and "§ 20 [of the Clayton Act] removes all such allowable conduct from the taint of being a 'violation of any law of the United States' including the Sherman Act." Ibid.[16]

The statutory exemption does not apply when a union combines with a "non-labor group." Hutcheson, 312 U.S. at 232. Accordingly, antitrust immunity is forfeited when a union combines with one or more employers in an effort to restrain trade. In Allen Bradley v. Electrical Workers, 325 U.S. 797, 16 LRRM 798, for example, the Court held that a union had violated the Sherman Act when it combined with manufacturers and contractors to erect a sheltered local business market in order "to bar all other businessmen from [the market], and to charge the public prices above a competitive level." Id., at 809.[17] The Court indicated that the union efforts would, standing alone, be exempt from antitrust liability, ibid., but because the union had not acted unilaterally, the exemption was denied.[18] Congress "intended to outlaw business monopolies. A business monopoly is no less such because a union participates, and such participation is a violation of the Act." Id., at 811.[19]

[14] As is true under the Clayton Act, the specified activities are protected only in the context of a labor dispute. The Norris-LaGuardia Act defines a labor dispute to include "any controversy concerning terms or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating fixing maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether or not the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee. 29 U.S.C. § 113.

[15] In Milk Wagon Drivers' Union v. Lake Valley Farm Prod., 311 U.S. 91 103. 7 LRRM 276, the Court stated: "For us to hold, in [the face of the Norris-LaGuardia Act], that the federal courts have jurisdiction to grant injunctions in cases growing out of labor disputes, merely because alleged violations of the Sherman Act involved would run counter to the plain mandate of the Act and would reverse the declared purpose of Congress."

[16] See also Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader. 310 U.S. 469.6 LRRM 647. There, in the Term preceding that in which the Hutcheson case was decided, the Court reasoned that the Sherman Act prohibits only restraints on "commercial competition," id., at 497, 499, 510–511—or those market restraints designed to monopolize supply, control prices, or allocate product distribution—and that unions are not liable where they merely further their own goals in the labor market.

[17] In Hunt v. Crumboch, 325 U.S. 821. 16 LRRM 808, decided the same day as Allen Bradley, the Court ruled that the labor exemption protected a union's boycott of a truck hauler through successful secondary pressure on purchasers of the hauler's services with whom the union had contracts, because of the absence of union participation in a conspiracy with the hauler's competitors. See 325 U.S. at 824: Meltzer, supra n. 12. at 677. and n. 74.

[18] United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657. 59 LRRM 2369, also dealt with a union combination with employers, but the grounds of decision were unrelated to the antitrust exemption.

[19] Even where there are union agreements with nonlabor groups that may have the effect of sheltering the nonlabor groups from competition in product markets, the Court has recognized a "nonstatutory" exemption to shield such agreements if they are intimately related to the union's vital concerns of wages, hours and working conditions. See, e.g., Meat Cutters v. Jewel Tea, 381 U.S. 675, 59 LRRM 2376. This nonstatutory exemption was described as follows in Connell Construction Co. v. Plumbers & Steamfitters, 421 U.S. 616, 622, 89 LRRM 2401:

> "The Court has recognized * * * that a proper accommodation between the congressional policy favoring collective bargaining under the NLRA and the congressional policy favoring free competition in business

The Court of Appeals properly recognized that the threshold issue was to determine whether or not Equity's franchising of agents involved any combination between Equity and any "non-labor groups," or persons who are not "parties to a labor dispute." 622 F.2d at 649 (quoting Hutcheson, 312 U.S., at 232).[20] And the court's conclusion that the trial court had not been clearly erroneous in its finding that there was no combination between Equity and the theatrical producers [21] to create or maintain the franchise system is amply supported by the record.

The more difficult problem is whether the combination between Equity and the agents who agreed to become franchised was a combination with a "non-labor group." The answer to this question is best understood in light of American Federation of Musicians v. Carroll, 391 U.S. 99, 68 LRRM 2230. There, four orchestra leaders, members of the American Federation of Musicians, brought an action based on the Sherman Act challenging the union's unilateral system of regulating "club dates," or one-time musical engagements. These regulations, inter alia enforced a closed shop; required orchestra leaders to engage a minimum number of "sidemen," or instrumentalists; prescribed minimum prices for local engagements;[22] prescribed higher minimum prices for traveling orchestras; and permitted leaders to deal only with booking agents licensed by the union.

Without disturbing the finding of the Court of Appeals that the orchestra leaders were employers and independent contractors, the Court concluded that they were nonetheless a "labor group" and parties to a "labor dispute" within the meaning of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, and thus that their involvement in the union regulatory scheme was not an unlawful combination between "labor" and "non-labor" groups. The Court agreed with the trial court that the applicable test was whether there was "job or wage competition or some other economic interrelationship allecting legitimate union interests between the union members and the independent contractors." 391 U.S., at 106.

The Court also upheld the restrictions on booking agents, who were not involved in job or wage competition with union members. Accordingly, these restrictions had to meet the "other economic interrelationship" branch of the disjunctive test quoted above. And the test was met because those restrictions were "at least as intimately bound up with the subject of wages '* * * as the price floors.' " Id., at 113. The Court noted that the booking agent restrictions had been adopted, in part, because agents had "charged exorbitant fees, and booked engagements for musicians at wages * * * below union scale."[23]

The restrictions challenged by the petitioners in this case are very similar to the agent restriction upheld in the Carroll case.[24] The essential features markets requires that some union-employer agreements be accorded a limited non-statutory exemption from antitrust sanctions * * *.

"The nonstatutory exemption has its source in the strong labor policy favoring the association of employees to eliminate competition over wages and working conditions. Union success in organizing workers and standardizing wages ultimately will affect price competition among employers, but the goals of federal labor law never could be achieved if this effect on business competition were held a violation of the antitrust laws. The Court therefore has acknowledged that labor policy requires tolerance for the lessening of business competition based on the differences in wages and working conditions." (Citation omitted.)

Neither the District Court nor the Court of Appeals in this case decided whether the nonstatutory exemption would independently shield the respondent from the petitioners antitrust claims. See n. 11, supra.

[20] Of course, a party seeking refuge in the statutory exemption must be a bona fide labor organization and not an independent contractor or entrepreneur. See Los Angeles Meat Division Local 626 v. United States 371 U.S. 94, 51 LRRM 2448; Columbia River Packers Assn. v. Hinton 315 U.S. 143, 9 LRRM 403. See generally 1 Areeda & Turner, Antitrust (1978) § 229c, at 195–198. There is no dispute about Equity's status as a bona fide labor orgnization.

[21] As the employers of Equity's members, producers are plainly a "non-labor group." Employers almost always will be a "non-labor group," although an exception has been recognized, for example, when the employer himself is in job competition with his employees. See American Federation of Musicians v. Carroll, 391 U.S. 99, 68 LRRM 2230 (orchestra leaders who both lead an orchestra and play an instrument).

[22] These consisted of a minimum scale for sidemen, a "leader's fee," which was twice the sidemen's scale in orchestras of at least four, and an additional 8% for social security, unemployment insurance, and other expenses. In addition, if a leader did not appear but designated a subleader, and four or more musicians performed, the leader was required to pay from his leader's fee 1.5 times the sidemen's scale to the subleader.

[23] The Court did not explicitly determine whether the second prong of the Hutcheson test for the statutory exemption had been met, i.e., whether the union had acted in its "self-interest." But given its various finding that the challenged restrictions were designed to cope with job competition and to protect wage scales and working conditions. 391 U.S. at 108, 109, 110, 113, it clearly did so sub silentio.

[24] Several cases before Carroll also upheld union regulation of the practices of independent entrepreneurs affecting the wages or working of the regulatory scheme are identical: members are permitted to deal only with agents who have agreed (1) to honor their fiduciary obligations by avoiding conflicts of interest, (2) not to charge excessive commissions and (3) not to book members for jobs paying less than the union minimum.[25] And as in Carroll, Equity's regulation of agents developed in response to abuses by employment agents who occupy a critical role in the relevant labor market.[26] The agent stands directly between union members and jobs, and is in a powerful position to evade the union's negotiated wage structure.

The peculiar structure of the legitimate theater industry, where work is intermittent, where it is customary if not essential for union members to secure employment through agents, and where agents' fees are calculated as a percentage of a member's wage, makes it impossible for the union to defend even the integrity of the minimum wages it has negotiated without regulation of agency fees.[27] The regulations are "brought within the labor exemption * * * [because they are] necessary to assure that scale wages will be paid * * *." Carroll, 391 U.S. at 112. They "embody at direct frontal attack upon a problem thought to threaten the maintenance of the basic wage structure." Teamsters Union v. Oliver, 358 U.S. 283, at 294, 43 LRRM 2374. Agents must therefore, be considered a "labor group," and their controversy with Equity is plainly a "labor dispute" as defined in the Norris-LaGuardia Act: "representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether or not the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee." 29 U.S.C. § 113.

Agents perform a function—the representation of union members in the sale of their labor—that in most nonentertainment industries is performed exclusively by unions. In effect, Equity's franchise system operates as a substitute for maintaining a hiring hall as the representative of its members seeking employment.[28]

Finally, Equity's regulations are clearly designed to promote the union's legitimate self-interest. Hutcheson, 312 U.S. at 232. In a case such as this, where there is no direct wage or job competition between the union and conditions of union members. See Milk Wagon Drivers Union v. Lake Valley Co., 311 U.S. 91, 7 LRRM 276; Teamsters Union v. Oliver, 358 U.S. 283, 43 LRRM 2374 (Oliver I); Teamsters Union v. Oliver, 362 U.S. 605, 46 LRRM 2180 (Oliver II). In Milk Wagon Drivers, the Court held that the union had engaged in a "labor dispute" within the meaning of the Norris-LaGuardia Act when it attempted to organize independent "vendors" who supplied milk to retail stores. There the union feared that the "vendor system" was designed to escape the payment of union wages and the assumption of union-imposed working condition. In Oliver I, the Milk Wagon Drivers decision was invoked to protect from state antitrust challenge a union's successful efforts to prescribe through collective-bargaining agreements a wage scale for truck drivers, and minimum rental fees for drivers who owned their own trucks. The union feared that driver-owners, whose fees included not only an entreprenurial component but also a "wage" for the labor of driving, might undercut the union scale by charging a fee that effectively included a sub-scale wage component. The Court's stated that "[t]he regulations embod[ied] * * * a direct frontal attack upon a problem thought to threaten the maintenance of the basic wage structure established by the collective bargaining contract" (358 U.S. at 294. See also Oliver II, 362 U.S., at 606 after remand to the state court).

[25] Indeed, the District Court in Carroll, whose judgment was "affirmed by this Court * * * in its entirety," 391 U.S., at 114, drew parallels with the restrictions at issue in the present case. The court noted that "[a]pparently, similar abuses by booking agents existed in other fields, too. Edelstein v. Gillmore, 35 F.2d 723, 726 (2d Cir. 1929) (actors)." 241 F.Supp., at 892.

The petitioners argue that theatrical agents are indistinguishable from "numerous other groups of persons who merely supply products and services to union members" such as landlords, grocers, accountants, and lawyers. But it is clear that agents differ from these groups in two critical respects the agents control access to jobs and negotiation of the terms of employment. For the actor or actress, therefore, agent commissions are not merely a discretionary expenditure of disposable income, but a virtually inevitable concomitant of obtaining employment.

[26] See Carroll v. AFM, 241 F.Supp., at 881–882; Harding, supra n. 6, at 319–325.

[27] The Court of Appeals found that "the union cannot eliminate wage competition among its members without regulation of the fees of the agents." 622 F.2d 647, 651, 104 LRRM 2801 (emphasis added). Wage competition is prevented not only by the rule precluding commissions on scale jobs. Actors and actresses could also compete over the percentage of their wages they were willing to cede to an agent subject only to the restrictions imposed by state law.

[28] In many industries, unions maintain hiring halls and other job referral systems, particularly where work is typically temporary and performed on separate project sites rather than fixed locations. By maintaining halls, unions attempt to eliminate abuses such as kickbacks, and to insure fairness and regularity in the system of access to employment. In a 1947 Senate Report, Senator Taft explained: "The employer should be able to make a contract with the union as an employment agency. The union frequently is the best employment agency. The employer should be able to give notice of vacancies, and in the normal course of events to accept men sent to him by the hiring hall" S. Rep. No. 1827, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., 13, quoted in Teamster v. NLRB, 365 U.S. 667, 673–674, 47 LRRM 2906.

The National Labor Relations Board and the Courts have ruled that union demands for hiring halls are a mandatory subject of collective bargaining and that strikes to obtain such provisions are protected activity. See, e.g., Houston Chapter Assoc. General Contractors, 143 NLRB 409, 53 LRRM 1299, enforced, 349 F.2d 449, 59 LRRM 3013 (CA5); NLRB v. Tom Joyce Floors, Inc., 353 F.2d 768, 771, 60 LRRM 2334 (CA9). Cf. Teamsters v. NLRB, 365 U.S., at 672–673, 676.

the group it regulates, the Carroll formulation to determine the presence of a non-labor group—whether there is "some * * * economic interrelationship affecting legitimate union interests * * *" 391 U.S., at 106—necessarily resolves this issue.

D

The question remains whether the fees that Equity levies upon the agents who apply for franchises are a permissible component of the exempt regulatory system. We have concluded that Equity's justification for these fees is inadequate. Conceding that Carroll did not sanction union extraction of franchise fees from agents,[29] Equity suggests, only in the most general terms, that the fees are somehow related to the basic purposes of its regulations: elimination of wage competition, upholding of the union wage scale, and promotion of fair access to jobs. But even assuming that the fees no more than cover the costs of administering the regulatory system, this is simply another way of saying that without the fees, the union's regulatory efforts would not be subsidized—and that the dues of Equity's members would perhaps have to be increased to offset the loss of a general revenue source.[30] If Equity did not impose these franchise fees upon the agents, there is no reason to believe that any of its legitimate interests would be affected.[31]

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed in part and reversed in part, and the case is remanded for preceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Justice BRENNAN, with whom the Chief Justice and Justice MARSHALL join, concurring in part and dissenting in part

I join all but Part II-D of the Court's opinion. That part holds that respondents' exaction of a franchise fee is not a "permissible component of the exempt regulatory system." Ante, at 17. Rather, I agree with the Court of Appeals that the approximately $12,000 collected annually in fees is not "incommensurate with Equity's expenses in maintaining a full-time employee to administer the system," 622 F.2d 647, 651, 104 LRRM 2801 (CA2 1980), and thus is not "unconnected with any of the goals of national labor policy which justify the antitrust exemption for labor," ibid.

The Court justifies its conclusion by suggesting that, since the union could increase its dues to offset the revenue lost from invalidation of the fee system, "there is no reason to believe that any of [the union's] legitimate interests would be affected," if the fee system were found to violate the antitrust laws. Ante, at 17. The union could of course raise its dues, but the issue here is whether the conceded antitrust immunity of the franchising system includes the franchise fee.

I find somewhat incongruous the Court's conclusion that an incident of the overall system constitutes impermissible regulation, but that agents in general may be significantly regulated because they are not a "non-labor group." This incongruity is highlighted by the similarity between union hiring halls and the franchising system, a similarity which the Court itself acknowledges: "Equity's franchise system operates as a substitute for maintaining a hiring hall as the respresentative of its members seeking employment." Ante, at 16. The Court disregards this similarity in concluding that the franchising system does not "directly benefit" the agents who are required to pay the fees. Ante, at n. 31. It reaches this conclusion by incorrectly assuming that the only parties who directly benefit from the hiring hall and the franchising system are employers and employees and producers and actors, as the case may be. But surely the agents also benefit

[29] See Carroll, 241 F.Supp., at 881. We have, in fact, found no case holding that a union may extract such fees from independent agents who represent union members.

[30] As already indicated, the franchise fees are not segregated in any manner but merely deposited in the union's general fund.

[31] The respondents offer union hiring hall fees as an analogy in support of Equity's collection of franchise fees. In that context, the respondents argue, without citation, a union may impose reasonable fees upon employers to meet the costs of maintaining a union-run hiring hall. But even if the respondents' statement of labor law is correct, the analogy would not be persuasive. Assuming that hiring hall fees are so imposed, the fees are borne by parties who directly benefit from the employment services of the hiring halls and are collected by the entities that provide them. That is not true in the present case.

The view expressed in the separate opinion filed today as to who are the beneficiaries of the franchising system will undoubtedly surprise the agents who brought this lawsuit. Post. at———.

from the franchising system, which provides an orderly and protective mechanism for pairing actors who seek jobs with producers who seek actors. The system is thus the means by which the agents ultimately receive their commissions; it is as much the source of their livelihood as it is that of the actors.

Because the fee is an incident of a legitimate scheme of regulation and because it is commensurate in amount with the purpose for which it is sought, I would also affirm this holding of the Court of Appeals.

NLRB v. Nixon Gear, Inc.

649 F.2d 906 (2d Cir.), May 26, 1981—251 NLRB 1392

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before LUMBARD, MANSFIELD and MESKILL, Circuit Judges

907

MESKILL, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board ("the Board") seeks enforcement of an order issued against Nixon Gear, Inc. ("the Company") on August 27, 1980, directing the Company to bargain in good faith with District Lodge No. 137, International Association of Machinists & Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO ("the Union"). Following the Union's narrow victory in a representation election, the Company filed objections to certain pre-election conduct on the part of the Union. Without holding an evidentiary hearing upon the Company's objections, the Board granted certification to the Union and subsequently issued the order, enforcement of which is requested here. We deny enforcement of the Board's order.

908

BACKGROUND

The Company manufactures and sells custom gears at its facility in Syracuse, New York, where the representation election was held. After the Union filed a petition for certification as the collective bargaining representative for eligible employees at the Company's Syracuse facility, the Board conducted a representation election on December 19, 1979. Of the 45 eligible employees, 44 voted. The result was 23 to 21 in favor of the Union. No ballots were challenged, but the Company filed timely objections to conduct affecting the results of the election. The Company objected, inter alia, that the Union had circulated campaign literature containing material misrepresentations to which the Company did not have adequate time to respond and that the Union had made improper financial and job-related inducements to eligible employees. The Company requested a hearing on its objections.

The Regional Director conducted an investigation of the objections pursuant to section 102.69 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, 29 C.F.R. § 102.69 (1980), but did not hold a hearing.[1] Based upon his investigation, the Regional Director recommended to the Board that all of the Company's objections be overruled and that the Union be certified. His investigation revealed the following.

The Company's first two objections alleged that the Union had distributed campaign literature which contained material misrepresentations. At issue were statements made in a handwritten notice captioned "Ask Yourselves Why." The Company contended that the following four paragraphs of this handbill contained material misrepresentations:

> Ask yourselves why the company:
> B. Has awarded pay raises to certain individuals and most notably not to known pro-union persons? This smacks of discrimination.

[1] Section 102.69 provides in pertinent part:

> (d) The action of the regional director in issuing a report on objections or challenged ballots, or both, following proceedings under § 102.62(b) or § 102.67, or in issuing a decision on objections or challenged ballots, or both, following proceedings under § 102.67, may be on the basis of an administrative investigation or, if it appears to the regional director that substantial and material factual issues exist which, in the exercise of his reasonable discretion, he determines may more appropriately be resolved after a hearing, he shall issue and cause to be served on the parties a notice of hearing on said issues before a hearing officer. If the regional director issues a report on objetions and challenges, the parties shall have the rights set forth in paragraphs (c) and (f) of this section; if the regional director issues a decision, the parties shall have the rights set forth in § 102.67 to the extent consistent herewith.

29 C.F.R. § 102.69(d) (1980).

C. Offered $10 hourly to pro-union man to campaign against union? He refused.

D. Would not inform the wife of an injured employee of procedures to follow for benefit of medical coverage, state disability, etc.?

E. Will pay for only 4 days this shutdown instead of 5 days? This surely proves they care for you.

A. 22 (emphasis in original). Copies of the handbill were distributed by the Union to employees who attended the Union meeting held on December 15, 1979 and were further distributed at the plant early on the morning of December 18. The Company contended that it first became aware of the literature on December 18, the day before the election.

The Regional Director listed the "testimony" concerning the truthfulness of each paragraph.[2] The Company produced evidence that the allegedly discriminatory pay raises denounced in Paragraph B were actually awarded pursuant to the Company's established practice of scheduling raises to coincide with employees' anniversary dates with the firm. Furthermore, the Company pointed out that some of the employees who received rasies appeared to be actively supporting the Union by, for example, wearing Union buttons. With respect to Paragraph C, the Regional Director apparently misunderstood the Company's position. He stated that the Company admitted that the $10 per hour bribe was offered, but the company claims that it has consistently denied the bribe attempt.[3] With respect to Paragraph D, the Company conceded that an employee's wife had not been informed of procedures to follow to obtain benefits for her injured husband, but explained that this had occurred more than 2½ years earlier under the Company's previous owners. With respect to Paragraph E, the Company conceded that that year there had been four paid shut-down days instead of five, but explained that the reduction was caused by the different way holidays fell in those years. The Regional Director concluded that none of the alleged misrepresentations warranted holding a hearing or overturning the election.

Turning to the Company's objection that the Union had made improper financial and job-related inducements to eligible employees, the Regional Director first reviewed statements from employee witnesses who claimed to have heard rumors that Larry Darling, a co-worker, had been promised more favorable employment at a local unionized plant of the Miller Brewing Company ("Miller") in return for his efforts on behalf of the Union at Nixon Gear. The testimony of those who had spoken with Darling showed that he was confident that he would obtain employment at Miller, where his wife already was employed. It appeared that Darling's activities on behalf of the Union had been limited to attending one or two Union meetings. The investigation failed to reveal that the Union itself told employees that it had offered a job to Darling or that Darling was an agent of the Union. Moreover, at least once early in campaign, Darling denied the rumor. Based on all of the above, the Regional Director concluded that this portion of the Company's objection did not warrant a hearing and recommended that it be overruled.

The Regional Director was equally unmoved by another example of alleged improper financial and job-related inducements by the Union. The Company's complaint arose out of events at a Union organizational meeting held in late November. At that meeting, the Union presented a Union steward or official from Miller who compared the Nixon Gear benefits with those available at a Union plant where he had worked prior to obtaining employment at Miller. Witnesses who attended the meeting stated that they formed the impression that the Union had helped the speaker obtain his job at Miller, but conceded that neither the Union nor the speaker ever said this explicitly. The Regional Director dismissed their "testimony" as specu-

[2] The record does not clearly set forth the methodology of the investigation. The Regional Director's repeated references to the "testimony" of the Company and employees, however, probably should not be taken to imply that anyone offered sworn oral testimony respecting the objections. The record contains written affidavits, but does not contain any transcripts. The Regional Directors' conclusions apparently were drawn primarily from his review of the record submitted to him including the sworn statements of witnesses, documentary evidence, and the parties' statements of position, A. 11.

[3] In its exceptions to the Regional Director's findings, the Company denied that such a bribe was ever offered and stated that it had consistently denied this allegation throughout the Regional Director's investigation. The Company requested that the Regional Director contact the former Company officer who allegedly had made the bribe, and provided the Regional Director with the information needed to contract him, A 29 n.l, but apparently the Regional Director did not pursue the matter.

lative and, also without a hearing, recommended that this portion of the objection be overruled. After rejecting other Company objections not at issue here,[4] the Regional Director recommended that the Company's objections be overruled in their entirety and that a Certification of Representation be issued.

The Board declined to order a hearing and adopted the Regional Director's findings and recommendations with one change. Although the Regional Director found that the Company had admitted that its vice president had offered the $10 per hour bribe, the Board concluded that even if the accusation were false, such a misrepresentation would be insufficient, in the circumstances of this case, to warrant setting aside the election. On April 3, 1980 the Board certified the Union as the exclusive representative of the eligible employees at the Company.

After the Board's decision, the Union requested that the Company commence collective bargaining, but the Company refused. In response to the ensuing unfair labor practices complaint, the Company admitted its refusal to bargain, but raised the invalidity of the election as a defense. The Board granted the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment against the Company, finding that the Company's refusal to bargain violated §§ 8(1)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(5) and (1) (1976), and issued the order which it now seeks to enforce.

DISCUSSION

The Company argues that the evidence submitted by it in support of its objections was sufficient to require the Board to direct that an evidentiary hearing be conducted. As the party seeking a hearing, the Company bears a heavy burden, see Bausch & Lomb Inc. v. NLRB, 404 F.2d 1222, 1226 (2d Cir. 1968). "The conduct of representation elections is the very archetype of a purely administrative function, with no quasi about it, concerning which courts should not interfere save for the most glaring discrimination or abuse," NLRB v. Olson Bodies, Inc., 420 F.2d 1187, 1189 (2d Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 954, 91 S.Ct. 966, 28 L.Ed.2d 237 (1971), lest appellate interference threaten the essential functioning of a system that governs, according to well-settled standards, the conduct of nearly 10,000 elections annually. Henderson Trumbull Supply Corp. v. NLRB, 501 F.2d 1224, 1228 (2d Cir. 1974). Nevertheless, according to those well-settled standards the Company was entitled to a hearing if "by prima facie evidence, it demonstrate[d] the existence of 'substantial and material factual issues' which, if resolved in its favor, would require the setting aside of the representation election." NLRB v. Bristol Spring Manufacturing Co., 579 F.2d 704, 706–07 (2d Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Newton-New Haven Co., 506 F.2d 1035, 1036 (2d Cir. 1974); Polymers, Inc. v. NLRB, 414 F.2d 999, 1004–05 (2d Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 1010, 90 S.Ct. 570, 24 L.Ed.2d 502 (1970); NLRB v. Joclin Manufacturing Co., 314 F.2d 627, 631–32 (2d Cir. 1963). With these general considerations in mind, we examine the Company's claim that the Board erred by not directing a hearing into the Union's alleged misconduct.

A. The Misrepresentations

In this proceeding the Company raises two independent grounds for requiring a hearing: the Union's alleged misrepresentations and its improper inducements to eligible employees. With regard to the Union's alleged misrepresentations, the Company presses upon us the impropriety of the Union's charge that the Company had "[o]ffered $10 hourly to [a] pro-union man to campaign against [the] union." The Board assumed arguendo that this charge was false, but, as the Board recognized, not every misrepresentation made in the course of a campaign requires the setting aside of the election. "A certain degree of inaccuracy and ambiguity is recognized as indigenous to campaign propaganda," Baumritter Corp. v. NLRB, 386 F.2d 117, 120 (1st Cir. 1967), because [4] The Company does not challenge the Board's decision overruling these other two objections. In one of these objections, the Company alleged that the Union threatened eligible employees with physical harm, damage to personal property, and adverse changes in their working conditions if the Union failed to win the election. The Board overruled this objection because the Company presented no evidence in support of it and would not or could not provide the names of any potential witnesses. In its final objection, the Company alleged that "[b]y the foregoing, as well as other acts and conduct, [the Union] interfered with the employees' free choice in the election and with the laboratory conditions under which Board elections are to be conducted." The Board overruled this objection because it raised no specific allegations of misconduct other than those already made in the first four objections.

911

"[p]rattle rather than precision is the dominating characteristic of election publicity," Oslon Rug Co. v. NLRB, 260 F.2d 255, 257 (7th Cir. 1958). We generally rely upon the parties themselves to correct inaccurate, untruthful statements, for when opposing parties publicly debate the merits of their positions we may confidently leave to the common sense of the voters the appraisal of the positions. Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers, 383 U.S. 53, 60, 86 S.Ct. 657, 661, 15 L.Ed.2d 582 (1966). Nevertheless, where a misrepresentation arises under circumstances which effectively preclude the voters from ascertaining its falsity, we do not hesitate to set aside the result of the representation election.

The principal factors which guide our inquiry into the effect of the misrepresentation are well-known and are derived from the Board's decision in Hollywood Ceramics Co., 140 N.L.R.B. 221, 224 (1962).[5] These factors are (1) whether the other party had adequate opportunity to reply and correct the misrepresentation; (2) the extent to which the declarant could reasonably be viewed by the employees as being in a position to know the facts; (3) the ability of the employees to evaluate the statement on the basis of their own independent knowledge of the facts; and (4) the influence it might reasonably have had upon the employees. Henderson Trumbull Supply Corp. v. NLRB, supra, 501 F.2d at 1229. The Board found that, even if the Union's bribery charge was false, the election would not have to be set aside under these standards and, hence, refused to direct an evidentiary hearing to determine whether the charge was false. We now review whether that refusal to order a hearing exceeded the Board's discretion.

The Company argues persuasively that it did not have a reasonable opportunity to reply to the Union's misrepresentation. The Company stated that it first learned of the misrepresentation on December 18, 1979, the day before the election. It is unlikely that the Company could have replied adequately before the election. Time would have been needed to learn the specifics behind the Union's charge, check their accuracy, and issue a denial. Even had this process been completed, the Company might well have been unable to contact all of the voters. Some of them may not have been at the plant that day and, under the Board's own rules, the Company could not order its employees to attend a meeting held for the purpose of rebutting the Union's charge. Such a "captive audience" meeting held by an employer within twenty-four hours of an election constitutes a per se ground for setting aside an election won by the employer. Peerless Plywood Co., 107 N.L.R.B. 427, 429 (1953). Thus, the Company had demonstrated by prima facie evidence that it did not have an adequate opportunity to respond to the misrepresentation. The second and third factors of the Hollywood Ceramics test are also satisfied. The employees could reasonably have expected that the Union's charge was directly based on testimony from the employee who was offered the bribe and, since the charge did not specify which employee was bribed, the employees could not independently investigate the charge's truthfulness.

Therefore, the Board's refusal to order a hearing must rest on the basis that the false charge did not have a significant influence on the employees and, hence, on the election. The Board characterized the misrepresentation as "immaterial," reasoning that the allegation of bribery was wholly unrelated to wages and benefits or any other overriding issue in the campaign. "Rather the thrust of the Union's statement [was] that the Company strongly opposed the Union and was willing to wage a vigorous campaign to keep the Union out, a fact presumably already known by the Company's employees." NLRB Brief at 16. We reject this view of the effects of the Union's charge. The Union charged that the Company had stooped to bribery in order to win the election. An employee undecided about Union representation who believed the charge to be true might well be indignant enough at this underhanded tactic to show his protest at the polls by voting for the Union. He might feel a greater need for a union to protect him against his unscrupulous employer. Furthermore, the entire credibility of the Company's campaign might be undermined by the implication that a Company supporter had been bribed. Thus, the fourth factor of the Hollywood Ceramics test is satisfied and, assuming that the charge was false, the election would have to be set aside. We shall discuss our disposition of the petition following our review of the Company's claim that the Board improperly refused to direct an evidentiary hearing into whether the Union offered financial and job-related inducements to eligible employees.[6]

B. Improper Inducements

The Company offered evidence tending to show that the Union promised to obtain employment at Miller for Larry Darling, a current Company employee, if Darling supported the Union and the Union prevailed in the election; that the Union helped Company employees to obtain Miller employment application forms; and that a speaker at a Union meeting created the impression that the Union had helped him obtain employment at Miller. From the record, it appears that the Company's employees might have believed that the Union, which represented Miller's employees, was able to exert a significant influence over Miller's hiring decisions.

The Company was entitled to a hearing if its evidence demonstrated that there was a substantial and material factual issue which, if resolved in its favor, would require the setting aside of the representation election. NLRB v. Bristol Spring Manufacturing Co., supra, 579 F.2d at 706–07. We conclude that the Company's allegations, if true, required the Board to set aside the election. In NLRB v. Madisonville Concrete Co., 552 F.2d 168 (6th Cir. 1977), an election was set aside when the Union paid the fine and attorney's fees of an employee who received a $5 traffic ticket. And in NLRB v. Bristol Spring Manufacturing Co., supra, this court indicated that it would have set aside an election if the Union had improperly made payments of $5 and $20 to several employees. The alleged misconduct by the Union here is far more serious than in the above instances where petty sums of cash were at stake and the Union did not explicitly condition its beneficence on the employee's support in the election. Here the Union is charged with promising to obtain improved employment for an employee on the express conditions that the support the Union in the campaign and the Union prevail in the election. Since the Union would have lost the election had a single pro-Union voter changed his mind and his vote, a tainted Darling vote for the Union would be sufficient by itself to change the result of the election. The effects of the alleged misconduct, however, might be far more broad than this. The plant was abuzz with rumors about the Union's offer to Darling. Furthermore, employees who attended a Union organizational meeting thought that the speaker implied that he got his job at Miller with the help of the Union. The Company's employees could reasonably have concluded that their support of the Union would help them obtain more attractive employment at Miller whereas their support of the Company would hurt their chances of ever obtaining employment at Miller. Thus, the Company's allegations, if true, required the election to be set aside and the Company was entitled to a hearing if it demonstrated, by prima facie evidence, the existence of substantial and material factual issues supporting its allegations.

Our review of the affidavits in the record[7] reveals the following evidence tending to support the Company's allegations. One affiant stated that when he asked Darling if "he had gotten the union involved at Nixon because the union had promised him a job at Miller Brewing in return," Darling indicated that this was true, and that only later in the campaign did Darling deny it. Another affiant claimed that Darling said that he was "quite confident of obtaining a job at Miller because he had the number one and number two men from the Union to get him in." Rumors that the Union had promised Darling a job were all over the shop and several affiants stated that Darling obtained Miller employment application forms for them through his Union connections. One affiant wrote that she had tried, without success, to obtain a Miller employment application form for three or four months, but that Darling obtained one for her the day after she told him about her problem. He told her that "he had gotten both his job and my application through union officials at Miller Brewing." Several affiants stated that the speaker at a Union organizational meeting attended by about seventeen employees gave the impression that he had received a job at Miller through the Union.

[6] Because the Company did not press in this proceeding its objections to the Board's handling of the alleged misrepresentations in Paragraphs B, D, and E of "Ask Yourselves Why," it is unnecessary for us to review them.

[7] The Board argues on technical procedural grounds that several of these affidavits were not part of the formal record in the initial proceeding before the Regional Director. NLRB Brief at 25 n.19. We do not attach significance to this alleged technical defect in the record. The Board's Field Examiner witnessed the depositions and, thus, we assume that the Regional Director considered them when he stated, "All evidence adduced during the investigation, including sworn statements of witnesses, documentary evidence, and the parties' statements of position, have been fully and carefully considered. * * *" A. 11.

Despite this evidence strongly indicating that the Union offered improper inducements to eligible employees, the Board denied that the Company had raised substantial and material factual issues respecting the Union's conduct to warrant a hearing. Apparently, the Board reached this conclusion because the Company did not produce nonhearsay testimony directly showing that the Union had promised Darling a job at Miller, that the Union had intended to spread rumors that it could help employees obtain employment at Miller, or that the Union's speaker at the organizational meeting had intended to create the impression that the Union had helped him to obtain employment at Miller.

By taking this position, the Board placed far too high a burden on an employer who seeks a hearing to prove that improper inducements were offered by a union. Firsthand testimony establishing that the Union intended the improper conduct could come only from Darling or Union officials. But it was impossible for the Company to obtain their testimony because without a hearing an employer must rely upon the voluntary cooperation of witnesses to develop its case, see Johnnie's Poultry Co., 146 N.L.R.B. 770, 775 (1964). The Board wrongly penalized the Company for failing to produce evidence which at that point could have been discovered only through the voluntary cooperation of those whom the Company had charged with misconduct. "Given the very limited discovery permitted in cases of this type, it is only when parties are given an opportunity to introduce evidence and examine witnesses that improprieties in the conduct of an election may be revealed." NLRB v. Bristol Spring Manufacturing Co., supra, 579 F.2d at 707; Home Town Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 379 F.2d 241 (5th Cir. 1967). Thus, the Board's insistence upon a stronger showing of improper Union conduct was wholly unreasonable in this case. For the Board to hold, despite the Company's strong prima facie case, that there was not even a substantial and material factual issue respecting the Union's conduct, was an abuse of its discretion.

The Board's abuse of its discretion was exacerbated by the circumstances of this case. The election result was extremely close. We have previously admonished the Board that "[t]he need for a hearing is particularly acute when * * * an election is close, for in such a situation, 'even minor misconduct cannot be summarily excused on the ground that it could not have influenced the election.' " NLRB v. Bristol Spring Manufacturing Co., supra, 579 F.2d at 707, quoting Henderson Trumbull Supply Corp. v. NLRB, supra, 501 F.2d at 1230. We conclude that the Board's failure to direct a hearing into the Company's objections to the Union's alleged misrepresentations and improper inducements was arbitrary and capricious. See Ithaca College v. NLRB, 623 F.2d 224, 229 (2d Cir. 1980).

The only question remaining is how we should dispose of this matter. Although we are empowered to remand the proceedings for a hearing, we are not required nor are we inclined to do so. We will grant the relief that furthers the equitable principles which govern judicial action. See Ithaca College v. NLRB, supra. The Company urges us not to remand the proceedings. It points to the great expense and delay to which it has been needlessly subjected by the Board's refusal to order a hearing. The Company fears to order a hearing. The Company fears that the delay has decreased its prospects of prevailing at a hearing because witnesses' memories fade and some key witnesses' memories fade and some key witnesses may be unavailable. Other factors also encourage us to avoid any further delay in the disposition of this proceeding. The Union's election victory was very narrow, the labor force at the Company has undoubtedly changed since the election, and there is no way of knowing at this time if the Union enjoys a majority of support. In light of these factors, we conclude that a remand would be inappropriate. See Ithaca College v. NLRB, supra, 623 F.2d 230; NLRB v. Producers Cooperative Association, 457 F.2d 1121, 1126–27 (10th Cir. 1972). Accordingly, the Board's petition for enforcement is denied.

United Scenic Artists, Local 829, Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO v. NLRB

655 F.2d 1267 (D.C. Cir.), May 26, 1981—243 NLRB 27

On petition to review Board Order

Before TAMM, WALD and MIKVA, Circuit Judges

Opinion for the court filed by Circuit Judge TAMM

TAMM, Circuit Judge: In this case a labor union challenges the finding by the National Labor Relations Board that the union violated section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act. Because we find that the result reached by the Board is not supported by substantial evidence, we reverse, and remand for further proceedings.

I. BACKGROUND

Theater Techniques, Inc. (TTI) is a general contractor that supplies theatrical settings, props, and draperies for Broadway productions, motion pictures, and television programs. Nolan Scenery Studios, Inc. (Nolan) is similarly involved in the manufacture of settings, although primarily in the painting [1] of scenery and props. Although Nolan has on occasion acted as a general contractor, its usual contractual relationship with TTI from January of 1977 to June of 1978 was that of subcontractor for the painting of scenery and props provided by TTI.

Nolan is a party to a collective bargaining agreement with United Scenic Artists, Local 829 of the Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO (Local 829 or Union). This agreement contained the following relevant clause:

> For the purpose of clarification, it is specifically provided herein that the jurisdiction of the Union shall include all Scenic Artists' work for Broadway Production, "Off-Broadway," Resident and Regional Theatres . . . etc. This includes painting and application of all decorative material when applied by any means including all scenic creative art work, whether applied by painting or otherwise. It is agreed between the parties that the jurisdiction of the Union with regard to sculpturing shall include drawings, pounces and application of pounces, modeling or sculpturing over and above the rough blocking, in accordance with past practice.

Joint Appendix (J.A.) at 321. Nolan's president, Arnold Abramson, stated his understanding that this agreement prohibited his company from subcontracting out any sculpturing work that had been assigned to it. J.A. at 150.

The alleged unfair labor practice at issue here involved the painting of scenery for a show entitled "Stop the World I Want to Get Off." TTI entered into a contract with Nolan on April 26, 1978 for the painting of certain elements for this show. Exhibit 3A, J.A. at 308–09. Other elements were added by a separate contract dated April 28, 1978. Exhibit 3B, J.A. at 310–11. TTI shipped the necessary props and materials to Nolan on May 3 and 8. Included within the last shipment were the design sketches and materials necessary to construct the "environment unit." At least four pieces of sculpture had to be created as a part of this unit. Nolan fabricated two of these pieces while two props, a dragon's head and an airplane, arrived at Nolan already fabricated.

On May 9, Abramson telephoned the president of TTI, Peter Feller, to inform him that Nolan employees refused to work on those two prefabricated props. Abramson informed Feller later that day that a Union representative would visit the Nolan plant and that Abramson would see that the props were painted. Doug LeBrecht, assistant business representative for the Union, visited the plant on May 9 and spoke separately with Abramson, Nolan employees, and the designer for the show in question.

Abramson testified that he informed LeBrecht that the props had come from TTI. United Scenic Artists, Local 829, 243 N.L.R.B. No. 7 (June 25, 1979) (Board Decision), J.A. at 6.

On May 10, Abramson telephoned the Union business representative, Domingo Rodriguez, about the two prefabricated props. Rodriguez gave his permission for the painting of the props by Nolan employees but told Abramson that Nolan had violated the collective bargaining agreement which, Rodriguez asserted, entitled Nolan's employees to all of the sculpturing work. Rodriguez also informed Abramson that Nolan would be assessed a certain monetary amount based upon an estimate of the amount of time it would have taken Nolan employees to fabricate the props. Feller testified that

[1] The meaning of the term "painting" was disputed in this case. E.g., Joint Appendix (J.A.) 257–59, 273–74. Unless otherwise stated, the term is used in its ordinary meaning in this opinion.

Abramson subsequently informed him that the Union planned to charge Nolan in the future for painting props fabricated elsewhere as if Nolan employees had actually executed them. On May 11, Rodriguez sent a telegram to Abramson that stated:

> It has come to our attention that you intend to paint sculpture which has not been produced by scenic artists employed by you. Painting of such sculpture constitutes a flagrant violation of Section 1 of the collective bargaining agreement between United Scenic Artists Local 829 and Theatrical Contractors Association Inc. to which you are a party. We demand that any and all work on such sculpture be stopped immediately and that you immediately comply with your contractual commitments.
> It has also come to our attention that Nolan has entered into an illegal conspiracy with Theatre Techniques, Inc. [TTI] to deprive scenic artists of work opportunities. Please be advised that this Union will take appropriate action to the maximum extent permitted by law to counteract the effects of your improper activities.

J.A. at 320

TTI filed charges before the Board on May 12, alleging that the Union had encouraged the refusal of Nolan employees to paint certain props sent by TTI to Nolan and that the Union had threatened Nolan with a financial penalty should it continue to paint props from TTI; a complaint issued on June 7. The Administrative Law Judge, after hearing evidence and considering the parties' briefs, found that the Union had induced or encouraged a work stoppage in violation of section 8(b)(4)(i)(B) and violated the secondary boycott provision, section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B). National Labor Relations Act (Act), 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(b)(4)(i)(B) & (ii)(B) (1976). United Scenic Artists, Local 829, Case 2–CC–1553, Decision of the Administrative Law Judge (Sept. 22, 1978) (ALJ Decision), J.A. at 15–30. A Board panel, after evaluating exceptions to this decision, reversed the ALJ's decision as to the work stoppage violation, but upheld his finding of a violation of the secondary boycott provision. Board Decision, J.A. at 4–14. The Union petitioned for review of this decision and order; the Board cross-petitioned for enforcement.

II. DISCUSSION

The "secondary boycott" provision of the Act, states simply that it shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents "to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce" where "an object thereof is—forcing or requiring any person to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer, or to cease doing business with any other person * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4)(ii)(B) (1976). The Union attacks the Board's decision that it violated this provision on two fronts. First, the Union argues that it possessed no "secondary" objective but was concerned only with the preservation of work for its members. Second, the Union contends that the conduct of its business representative did not amount to threats, coercion, or restraint within the meaning of the Act.

The Supreme Court has made clear that section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B), despite its broad language, does not ban all union actions that may cause a cessation of business between employers. Instead, only union activity with a "secondary" objective is prohibited. NLRB v. Enterprise Association of Pipefitters, Local 638, 429 U.S. 507, 510, 97 S.Ct. 891, 894, 51 L.Ed.2d 1 (1977); National Woodwork Manufacturers Association v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612, 87 S.Ct. 1250, 18 L.Ed.2d 357 (1967). The evaluation of activity as primary or secondary depends upon whether the activity was " 'addressed to the labor relations of the contracting employer vis-a-vis his own employees,' National Woodwork, supra, at 645, 87 S.Ct. at 1268, and is therefore primary conduct, or whether the [activity] was 'tactically calculated to satisfy union objectives elsewhere', 386 U.S., at 644, 87 S.Ct. at 1286, in which event the [activity] would be prohibited secondary activity." Enterprise, 429 U.S. at 511, 97 S.Ct. at 894–95. The secondary objective need not, however, be the union's sole objective for the activity to be prohibited. Enterprise, 429 U.S. at 530 n.17, 97 S.Ct. at 904 n.17; Local 644, United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. NLRB, 533 F.2d 1136, 1149 (D.C.Cir.1975).

The Board began its analysis of the union activity here by pointing out the well-established principle that "Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) is violated where a union employs unlawful pressure to claim work that the immediate employer is not in a position to award." J.A. at 10. In Enterprise the Supreme Court upheld the Board's determination that the union of steamfitters had violated the statutory provision at issue here when it refused to install climate-control units because the factory-installed internal piping on the units violated its collective bargaining agreement which provided that the piping be done by the steamfitters. There, similar to the case at hand, the general contractor had specified the installation of particular units and the subcontractor, the employer organized by the union, had no contractual right to select other units. The Court held that the Board's emphasis upon this "right to control" was a matter within its discretion and did not constitute "a departure from the totality-of-the-circumstances test recognized in National Woodwork." 429 U.S. at 524, 97 S.Ct. at 901.

The Union argues in this court that Enterprise is distinguishable because here Rodriguez, the Union representative, possessed a reasonable, good faith belief that Nolan, rather than TTI, had the right to control the disputed work. Rodriguez testified that be believed that Nolan had the painting contract for the show in question and therefore control over whatever sculpting was to be done. J.A. at 231–32, 257. The ALJ found the whole of Rodriguez's testimony "unreliable," however, J.A. at 20, and the Board found no reason to overturn credibility determinations made by the ALJ. J.A. at 4 n.1. Were this merely a question of credibility, we would agree that it is properly left to the ALJ and the Board. Amalgamated Clothing Workers v. NLRB, 527 F.2d 803, 806 (D.C.Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 426 U.S. 907, 96 S.Ct. 2229, 48 L.Ed.2d 832 (1976).

Resolution of credibility questions does not provide us, however, with the necessary record evidence to support the foundation upon which the Board apparently based its decision. An examination of that decision suggests that the Board, ignoring Rodriguez's discredited testimony, assumed the Union knew the terms of this particular contractual relationship and therefore the locus of the "right of control." As the record now stands, substantial evidence cannot be found to support this unstated assumption. Even apart from Rodriguez's direct testimony that he had no knowledge of TTI's contractual control over the sculpturing work in question, J.A. at 231, 237, 265, much of the evidence on this point suggests that the Union did not know the provisions of the contract. For example, record evidence suggests that Local 829 had no way of knowing the existence of subcontractual arrangements on particular shows. J.A. at 84, 149. In this case, moreover, Rodriguez testified that the shop report filed on Nolan made no mention of any involvement by TTI. J.A. at 213–15.

Record evidence upon which the Board might have based its unstated inference includes the apparent understanding by Abramson of TTI's absolute right of control, J.A. at 125, and the visit by the assistant union representative LeBrecht to Nolan during which LeBrecht spoke with scenic artists, Abramson, and the designer of the show. J.A. at 18, 129. Although Abramson stated that he informed LeBrecht that the props had come from TTI, J.A. at 130, nothing in the record before us contradicts Rodriguez's assertion that Abramson told him only that the designer "had requested" that TTI execute the pieces in question rather than Nolan. J.A. at 232. This record is therefore inadequate to support an unstated assumption drawn by the Board that the Union had knowledge of TTI's complete control over the disputed work. NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672, 691, 100 S.Ct. 856, 867, 63 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980); NLRB v. General Telephone Directory Co., 602 F.2d 912, 920 (9th Cir. 1979).

Underlying the Board's decision in this case, however, may be an implicit holding that the Union's mistaken belief as to the locus of the right of control fails to constitute an adequate defense to the charged 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) violation. Because the Board's decision does not reveal that it explicitly addressed this issue,[2] we will not decide this troublesome question. We note in passing, however, that to allow a good-faith but mistaken belief that the pressured employer had the contractual right of control in such a situation to constitute a defense to an alleged violation of section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) would appear to comport best with the statutory requirement of a secondary "object." But see General Truck Drivers, Local 85, 243 N.L.R.B. No. 94 (1979); National Association of Broadcast Employees,

---

[2] As appellate counsel for the Board noted at oral argument, the Board seemingly did not "address the situation of a bona fide belief that Nolan had controlled it all from the beginning and subcontracted a part away."

Local 31, 237 N.L.R.B. 1370, 1379 (1978), enforced, 631 F.2d 944 (D.C. Cir. 1980).

Because we reverse and remand for futher proceedings, we have no occasion to reach two further troubling questions raised by this case. First, unlike Enterprise, the economic "pressure" exerted by the Union in this case was in the form of a request for estimated hours for the purpose of calculating a monetary assessment. In essence, the Union made known its request for "premium pay" for painting the prefabricated props. The Union contends that such a request of an immediate employer, even where the employer is powerless to award the disputed work, constitutes primary activity. See Local 742, United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. NLRB, 533 F.2d 683 (D.C.Cir. 1976), vacated and remanded in light of Enterprise, 430 U.S. 912, 97 S.Ct. 1322, 51 L.Ed.2d 590 (1977). But see Local 742, United Brotherhood of Carpenters, 237 N.L.R.B. 564 (1978) (Board action upon remand). The Union also contends, moreover, that the mere request for an estimate of hours in this case, without more, does not rise to the level of "coercion" made unlawful by section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B). We intimate no position on these issues.

III. CONCLUSION

Our statutory duty in this case is to examine the administrative record to determine whether the result reached by the Board is "supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole," 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976). Taking care not to substitute our own view of the facts, we cannot discover adequate record evidence supporting the apparent, albeit unstated, assumption made by the Board that the Union in this case knew that TTI possessed absolute contractual control over the disputed work. Upon remand the Board must at least develop adequate evidentiary support, for this assumption. Should some alternative rationale underlie the Board's decision here, however, fuller explication of such a rationale is required. Only after the basis of the Board's decision is made clear can meaningful judicial review occur. The decision of the Board is therfore reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

NLRB v. Moving Picture and Projection Machine Operators Union, Local No. 143, affiliated with the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and Moving Picture Machine Operators of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO

649 F.2d 610 (8th Cir.), May 27, 1981—248 NLRB 1245

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before HEANEY and HENLEY, Circuit Judges, and PECK,* Senior Circuit Judge

610

HEANEY, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board found that the Motion Picture and Machine Operators Union, Local No. 143, had violated Sections 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(b)(1)(A) & (b)(2) by refusing to refer David Brueske for employment through its exclusive hiring hall because he was not a member of the Union. It entered an order requiring the Union to cease and desist from refusing, for discriminatory reasons, to register or refer Brueske or other employment applicants and from maintaining an exclusive hiring arrangement or practice with any employer in which Union members receive preference in hiring or referral over nonmembers. The Board also ordered the Union to register Brueske for referral, to refer him for employment on a nondiscriminatory basis, to make him whole for loss of earnings and to post appropriate notices. The Board now asks this Court to enforce its order. We modify the Board's order and enforce it as modified.

611

The Union has a collective bargaining agreement with the movie theaters in the St. Louis area. Under that agreement, employees are required to become and remain members of the Union on and after the 30th day following the beginning of their employment. While the agreement does not provide for an exclusive hiring arrangement, the Union does operate a hiring hall and, as a matter of practice, the theater operators hire only those persons who are referred to them for employment by the Union. It is thus clear that the Union operated an exclusive hiring hall and is obligated to comply with Sections 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the Act.[1]

*John W. Peck, U.S. Senior Circuit Judge, United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, sitting by designation.

The Union maintains a card file with a card for each theater in the St. Louis area. Each card notes the name of each projectionist who has been referred by the Union to that theater and the time he has spent training or working there. The Union also maintains a list of projectionists which states the amount of time that each projectionist has spent working or training at the theaters to which he or she has been referred. Those who are on the list are either members of the Union or in the training programs sponsored by the Union. Vacancies in permanent positions are posted at the Union Hall for two weeks. Anyone who is on the projectionist list can bid for the vacancy and the bidder who is shown by the list to have worked the longest period of time is referred to the employer for the job if he or she is qualified.

Referrals to temporary jobs are made from the same list. Only those who have worked or trained at the theater making the request are considered and selection from among those eligible is based on an attempt to equal out their yearly earnings.

The Union conducts a training program through which persons are placed at various theaters without pay to become proficient at running the equipment—usually for a period of one to four weeks. After a trainee has worked at a theater for the required period of time, he or she may be referred to that theater for paid employment. Meanwhile, training at other theaters continues. After a trainee has completed the training program at each of the theaters with whom the Union has an agreement, the trainee is requested to join the Union.

Anyone is eligible to apply for training. Applications are screened by a committee of the Union which selects a number of candidates to be interviewed and evaluated when there are openings. The committee makes recommendations to the membership of the Union which accepts or rejects the selections by a majority vote.

Questions about the legality of the Union's referral system were brought to the Board's attention by David Brueske. Brueske had worked as a projectionist in New York from 1971 until 1975 and was a member of the New York Local Union during much of that period. In late 1975, Brueske withdrew from the Local and moved to East St. Louis, where he enrolled in Southern Illinois University. While at the University, Brueske did additional work with projection equipment. On April 19, 1979, Brueske contacted the business agent of Local No. 143 about obtaining work as a projectionist. He was told about the Union's training program. Thereafter, Brueske, along with sixty others, made application to be included in that program. He was interviewed by the committee but was not accepted. Eleven others were. On July 19, 1979, he filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Union. The Board concluded that the Union's referral system was operated in an unlawful manner because referrals were based on Union membership considerations. It entered the order described in the first paragraph of this opinion.

In our view, substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the Board's finding that the Union operated an exclusive hiring hall. While the collective bargaining agreement did not require the employers to hire only those persons recommended by the Union, the fact is that they consistently followed this practice over a number of years. See N.L.R.B. v. International Union of Operating Engineers, 279 F.2d 951 (8th Cir. 1960). Something more is required, however, before a violation of Sections 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the Act can be found. The Board must prove that the Union refused to refer applicants who were not members of the Union because they were not members. N.L.R.B. v. Local 542, 542A and 542B, Int'l Union of Operating Engineers, 485 F.2d 387 (3d Cir. 1973); N.L.R.B. v. Hod Carriers, Local 300, 336 F.2d 459 (9th Cir. 1964), or that the Union allowed only Union members access to its hiring hall, N.L.R.B.

[1] (b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—

(1) to restrain or coerce (A) employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title: Provided, That this paragraph shall not impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership therein; * * *

(2) to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of subsection (a)(3) of this section or to discriminate against an employee with respect to whom membership in such organization has been denied or terminated on some ground other than his failure to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership * * *.

v. Local 269, IBEW, 357 F.2d 51 (3d Cir. 1966); Local 138, Int'l Union of Operating Engineers v. N.L.R.B., 321 F.2d 130 (2d Cir. 1963). Our question then is whether the Board carried its burden. We think that it did in part. Substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that only Union members were referred to employers for permanent jobs. Brueske testified that the Union's business agent told him that he "could not qualify for permanent jobs without being a union member, having two years seniority and then permanent jobs would go out on a bid basis and the employer would have some preference among men who knew the booths." While there is evidence to the contrary in the record, we accept the Board's credibility findings on this matter.

Substantial evidence does not support the Board's finding, however, that the Union refused to refer non-Union members to temporary jobs. To the contrary, the record shows conclusively that trainees who were not members of the Union were frequently referred to temporary jobs. Moreover, it shows that applicants were accepted for the training program without regard to Union memberships or affiliation. Furthermore, there is no evidence that the Union committee or membership gave preference to the relatives or friends of Union members or for that matter that they applied any standard other than the stated standard of availability, reliability and competence in selecting persons for the training program. There is, finally, no evidence that the Union gave preference to Union members over trainees in referring persons for temporary employment.

It follows from what we have said that the Union violated Sections 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the Act by refusing to refer nonmembers of the Union for permanent employment. The Board order must be enforced insofar as it relates to permanent employees but cannot be insofar as it relates to temporary employees or trainees. Paragraphs 1(a) and 1(b) of the Board's order will, therefore, be amended to read as follows:

> Moving Picture and Projection Machine Operators Union, Local No. 143, affiliated with the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and Moving Picture Machine Operators of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:
> 1. Cease and desist from:
> (a) Refusing to register for referral or refer David Brueske, or any other applicant, for permanent employment by theaters in the St. Louis, Missouri, area, for discriminatory reasons.
> (b) Maintaining, enforcing, or otherwise giving effect to an exclusive hiring arrangement or practice with any employer pursuant to which Union members receive preference in hiring or referral over nonmembers for permanent employment.

One additional matter requires consideration. The Board's order requires the Union to register David Brueske for referral and to refer him for employment on a nondiscriminatory basis and make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered from the discrimination against him. The Board's order must, on the basis of what we have heretofore said, be enforced insofar as it requires the Union to register David Brueske for referral for permanent employment and refer him for permanent employment[2] on a nondiscriminatory basis; i.e., if he is as well qualified as others on the list, he must be referred for permanent employment on the same basis as those who are members of the Union. The Board's order as to back pay must also be enforced, subject to one qualification. An evidentiary hearing must be held to determine whether Brueske was in fact as well qualified as others on the referral list. If he was as well qualified, then a determination will have to be made as to the earnings he lost by not being referred on a nondiscriminatory basis. If he was not, he is not entitled to such remuneration. This hearing can, of course, be a part of the compliance conference.

The Board's order is reforced as modified. Costs will be taxed to the Union.

[2] The Board's order does not speak to the issue of whether Brueske should be admitted to the training program. Indeed, the Board conceded at oral argument that the training program was not violative of the Act if selections are made on the basis of objective criteria and there is no basis in the record to suggest that they were not.

NLRB v. Kiawah Island Company, LTD

650 F.2d 485 (4th Cir.), May 27, 1981—247 NLRB 307

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before WINTER, SPROUSE and ERVIN, Circuit Judge

SPROUSE, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board petitions for enforcement of its decision and order that the respondent, Kiawah Island Co., Ltd., violated sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act), 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (3),[1] by interfering with their employees' rights to organize a union and by terminating two kitchen employees who were responsible for initiating the organizational effort at the Company's resort.

We grant enforcement of the Board's order finding an 8(a)(1) violation, but conclude that there is not substantial evidence to sustain the Board's finding of an 8(a)(3) violation. We, therefore, deny enforcement of that part of the Board's order.

I.

Kiawah operates a 10,000-acre resort on Kiawah Island, South Carolina. It includes a 160-room oceanfront hotel, the Inn, which contains restaurant facilities. The Inn commenced operation in May 1976, and from the beginning had difficulty with maintaining proper standard of cleanliness in its food storage, preparation and service facilities. The State of South Carolina, through its Health and Environmental Agency, makes regular inspections of such facilities. There are three standards ratings: "A," "B" and "C". A grade of "C" indicates an unsatisfactory inspection and denotes an inferior operation.

The first inspection of the Inn's kitchen was made on June 1, 1976, immediately before the facility opened, and resulted in a "C" rating. At a follow-up inspection on June 4, an "A" rating was awarded. A "C" rating was again received on July 20, an "A" rating on July 27, and a "C" rating on November 30.[2]

Kiawah made a number of personnel changes from June 1, 1976 through the early part of 1977, in an attempt to rectify the situation and maintain a satisfactory rating for the food facilities. The general manager, Forrest, established a regular kitchen cleanup crew on June 2 or 3, with James Hymes as supervisor, and instituted a crash cleaning program. After the July 20 "C" rating, Forrest was discharged and the chief night auditor was assigned to retrain the kitchen cleaning crew and develop procedures for them to follow. After the November 30 "C" rating, the vice-president of resort operations, Taylor, concluded that the separate kitchen cleanup crew, with Hymes as a working foreman, was inefficient and turned the total responsibility for cleanliness over to the chef, Charvet. Hymes was demoted to a nonsupervisory leadman position and his pay was reduced. Shortly thereafter, Hymes and Robert Murray (the latter had been employed as a member of the cleaning crew since November 3), contacted a representative of the Union.[3] Hymes and Murray were given authorization cards and ultimately obtained signatures from 40-50 coworkers.

Although there is some conflict in the testimony, it is apparent that Kiawah became aware of the Union's attempts to organize in early December and contacted labor counsel for advice in countering the union effort. On January 22, 1977, the senior vice-president assembled the employees and delivered a speech which contained, among other things, the following statements: "[I]f you sign that card, I think you will be sorry" and "The company is not going to let the union mess things up without a fight. I can tell you right now that the company will fight the union just as hard as the law permits and that is pretty darn hard. Unfortunately for you, when a company and a union get into a fight it is the employees who get hurt." The Administrative Law Judge and the Board found that this action threatened employees with retaliatory action for exercising their section 7[4] rights.

[1] Sections 158(a)(1) and (3) provide:

(a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the excercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title; * * *

(3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *.

[2] The Company was permitted to post a "B" rating following this inspection, however.

[3] Hotel, Motel, Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local 270, Hotel & Restaurant Employees & Bartenders International Union, AFL-CIO.

[4] 29 U.S.C. § 157.

On March 7, 1977, the Union filed a representation petition with the Board. The following week, Kiawah held a meeting of its supervisors and instructed them to explain to the employees the benefits they were currently being provided, that a union was unnecessary and that the Company was opposed to it. Supervisors Cheshire and Clifton met with employee Haywood on or about March 22, 1977, to disseminate the Company's antiunion message. Haywood asked Cheshire why she had not received a previously promised raise. She testified that he replied, "on account of the union," and that the increase would be considered a "bribe" because the Union had filed a representation petition.

On April 25, 1977, supervisor Smythe told employee Cohen he "didn't know if [Cohen] was involved with the union or not * * * but the union probably could get [the employees] in trouble." Cohen then asked Smythe about a raise he was supposed to get; Smythe responded that Cohen had not received it because the Union had them "in a hole." Sometime after April 25, Smythe approached a group of employees. When one said something about the Union Smythe replied, "You might get a lot of people in trouble." The Administrative Law Judge found all these actions by Kiawah to have threatened employees in violation of 8(a)(1).

II.

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 617, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1941, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), the Supreme Court expressed a now familiar rule on section 8(a)(1) coercion:

> Any assessment of the precise scope of employer expression, of course, must be made in the context of its labor relations setting. Thus, an employer's rights cannot outweigh the equal rights of the employees to associate freely, as those rights are embodied in § 7 and protected by § 8(a)(1) and the proviso to § 8(c). And any balancing of those rights must take into account the economic dependence of the employees on their employers, and the necessary tendency of the former, because of that relationship, to pick up intended implications of the latter that might be more readily dismissed by a more disinterested ear.

It is for the Board to make these determinations and where substantial evidence supports its conclusions an appellate court will not substitute its own judgment for that of the Board. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp. v. NLRB, 407 F.2d 1357 (4th Cir. 1969).

Here, Kiawah, after consulting with counsel, exhibited an explicit antiunion animus in its activities countering the Union's attempts to organize. Considering all the evidence, there is substantial evidence that the vice-president's speech and the contacts made by supervisors had the effect of coercing the involved employees from exercising protected rights. We therefore grant enforcement to that part of the Board's order relating to the 8(a)(1) violations.

III.

We reach a different conclusion, however, with respect to the Board's findings that Kiawah discharged employees Hymes and Murray for their union organizational activities in violation of sections 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. We therefore deny enforcement of that part of the Board's order.

It is true Kiawah knew of the Union's attempt to organize when it fired Hymes and Murray. It is also true, however, that valid reasons for their discharges existed prior to, and independent of, any union activities. After the initial inspection of the Inn's food facilities, which resulted in a "C" rating, Kiawah's vice-president of resort operations, Taylor, reprimanded the general manager, Forrest. Forrest instituted a crash program to correct the deficiencies, established a regular kitchen cleanup crew and promoted a housekeeping department employee (Hymes) as supervisor. Despite these actions, however, Kiawah subsequently received "C" as well as "A" ratings and continued its efforts to improve.

After the second "C" rating was received (July 20, 1976), Forrest was discharged. Taylor temporarily assumed responsibility for managing the Inn, and the chief night auditor was assigned to retrain the kitchen cleaning crew and develop procedures for them to follow. On November 30, 1976, an inspection by the state agency again resulted in a "C" rating. Sometime between November 30 and December 2, chef Charvet recommended that Hymes and Murray be terminated. On December

2, Taylor sent a memo to certain supervisors expressing his feeling that the November 30 "C" rating was totally unacceptable and "in direct correlation to management effectiveness." He concluded that the separate kitchen cleanup crew was not going to work and ordered Charvet to assume total responsibility for the kitchen's cleanliness.

Charvet's recommendations that Hymes and Murrary be terminated were submitted to food and beverage director Scott and personnel director Smith; Scott rejected the recommendations, deciding to give them another opportunity to improve their job performance, but demoted Hymes to a nonsupervisory position.

Although Hymes and Murray contacted the Union shortly after Hymes' demotion, and the Company soon became aware of their organizational efforts, Kiawah continued its efforts to obtain and maintain satisfactorily clean food facilities. Scott conducted an inspection of the kitchen facilities on February 18 and found them unsatisfactory in terms of cleanliness. Hymes and Murrary, who apparently worked the evening before the inspection, were suspended for three days. The executive vice-president, Brumley, inspected the kitchen on February 26, as part of a series of inspections of all departments, and found the kitchen to be unclean. He sent a memo with specific inspection observations to Scott. Based on this, Hymes and Murray were terminated for unsatisfactory performance; the manager of the dining room was demoted; the third member of the cleaning crew and two dishwashers were issued disciplinary warnings; and Scott was reprimanded.[5] Subsequent to Hymes and Murray's discharges, Kiawah continued to receive unsatisfactory ratings from the South Carolina Halth and Environmental Agency, and Charvet, Scott, a subsequent food and beverage director and a subsequent chef were terminated.

A discharge, of course, violates the Act only if precipitated by a discriminatory motive or unlawful intent. NLRB v. Consolidated Diesel Electric Co., 469 F.2d 1016 (4th Cir. 1972). Where the evidence can support inferences of both discriminatory and nondiscriminatory reasons for the discharge, the rule announced in Neptune Water Meter Co. v. NLRB, 551 F.2d 568 (4th Cir. 1977), still controls in this circuit.[6] "It is settled in this circuit, and most of the others, that 'it is enough [to find an unfair labor practice] that a discriminatory motive was a factor in the employer's decision' " Id. at 569 (footnote omitted).

Neptune emphasizes, however, that it need be determined that the improper motive is a factor in the discharge.

> In the end after weighing all relevant factors including particularly the gravity of the offense, an unfair labor practice may be found only if there is a basis in the record for a finding that the employee would not have been discharged, though he may have been subjected to a milder form of punishment for the offense, except for the fact of his union activity.

Id. at 570; American Thread Co. v. NLRB 631 F.2d 316, 320 (4th Cir. 1980). See NLRB v. Appletree Chevrolet, Inc., 608 F.2d 988 (4th Cir. 1979).

Language in our cases indicates a "shifting" burden of proof were there is evidence of both discriminatory and valid reasons for the discharge. See, e.g., Appletree, supra. If initial evidence of union membership and employer animus is unrebutted by evidence of proper employer motive, the Board may well rest on that evidence to find an 8(a)(3) violation. The introduction by the employer of evidence of proper motive casts a greater responsibility on the Board—to weigh all the evidence; and, in this sense, a shifting burden concept might be useful. More accurately, however, the burden is on the General Counsel throughout to show that a discriminatory motive retaliative against the exercise of protected activity was a factor for the discharge. NLRB v. Patrick Plaza Dodge, Inc., 522 F.2d 804 (4th Cir. 1975).

In weighing conflicting evidence of good and bad employer motive, we have directed the Board to find a violation if the bad motive was a "factor." American Thread, supra; Neptune, supra. We have also directed the Board to "find and identify 'an affirmative and persuasive reason why the employer rejected the good cause and chose a bad one,' that is, why he rejected the 'supportable' cause and 'chose a cause intended to discourage union activity.'" Appletree, 608 F.2d at 993. Any apparent tension between the Neptune language and that of Appletree is eased when the basic proof of structure under the NLRA is considered. An appellate court must affirm the Board-determined unfair labor practices when they are supported by substantial evidence. Universal Camera Corp., supra; Owens-Corning Fiberglass Corp., supra. In determining whether there is substantial evidence to support a Board finding that bad motive was a "factor" in an employment discharge, we, of course, must look to all the evidence, including the employer's evidence of proper motivation. Should the Board have failed to identify and weigh the latter evidence, it will have failed its mission as a fact-finder.

[5] There was conflicting evidence on who terminated Hymes and Murray and the reasons given them. The Board made several credibility findings supporting the testimony of Hymes and Murray. We make no determination as to the validity of these findings; assuming they are valid, however, we still find no substantial evidence to support the finding that Hymes and Murray were discharged for their union activities.

[6] A suggestion for rehearing en banc was denied, with Judges Russell, Widener and Hall dissenting.

This does not mean that an employer qua employer is entitled to any greater evidentiary consideration than an employee qua employee. Giving evidentiary preference to either in this context would be contrary to the purpose of the Act. But, as stated in Neptune, supra, mere union membership does not insulate a worker from being discharged for just cause—there must be evidence demonstrating it was a factor. Likewise, an employer's antiunion animus in and of itself does not destroy his right to discipline for just cause—it must have been a reason for the discharge. If both good and bad motives are involved, the evidence must demonstrate why the good motive was not the sole reason for the discharge. Where the employer has a legitimate business motive but would not have discharged the employee for that reason except for his union membership or antiunion animus on the part of the employer, the discharge is unlawful. Amercian Thread, supra; Neptune, supra. A mere declaration by the Board that the reason advanced for the discharge was pretextual, however, is not sufficient to overcome a showing of bona fide reasons by an employer. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. NLRB, 539 F.2d 1335, 1337 (4th Cir. 1976). The "burden cannot be sustained by evidence that rises no higher than conjecture or suspicion." Appletree, 608 F.2d at 993. The ultimate reason, perhaps overly simply stated, is that a plaintiff or complainant has the affirmative burden of proving his case.

Kiawah presented cumulative and uncontradicted direct evidence that Hymes and Murray were fired for considerations having nothing to do with the Union. Kiawah experienced continued difficulty in maintaining satisfactorily clean food facilities immediately prior to its opening and continuing long after Hymes and Murray were discharged. It made continuous attempts to rectify the problems. It disciplined and discharged numerous employees, both supervisory and nonsupervisory. It expressed disapproval with the quality of the performances of Hymes and Murray proceeding their contact with the Union.

As we said in Neptune, supra:

> The rule is that if the employee has behaved badly it won't help him to adhere to the Union, and his employer's anti-union animus is not of controlling importance.

Id. at 570.

Direct evidence strongly inferring that Kiawah was motivated by sound business reasons, so completely overcomes the circumstantial evidence of the timing of the discharges cited by the Board that the latter cannot be considered substantial. The union membership of Hymes and Murray alone does not serve to shield them from discharge for just cause, and under these circumstances their employer's antiunion animus does not control.

We conclude, therefore, that the order of the Board finding that Hymes and Murray's discharges were motivated by their union activities is not supported by substantial evidence.

ENFORCEMENT GRANTED IN PART AND DENIED IN PART.

WINTER, Circuit Judge, concurring and dissenting: While I concur in the majority's conclusion that substantial evidence supports the Board's finding of § 8(a)(1) violations, I think that substantial evidence in the record as a whole also supports the Board's conclusion that Kiawah discriminatorily discharged Hymes and Murray in violation of § 8(a)(3) of the Act because of their efforts to bring about union representation at the Inn. I therefore respectfully dissent from that portion of the majority's opinion setting aside the finding of a § 8(a)(3) violation and declining to enforce the portion of the Board's order based thereon.

The record reflects the difficulties experienced by Kiawah in maintaining health standards in its dining facilities. The essential question before us is whether those difficulties were the sole motivation for Kiawah's discharge of Hymes and Murray, or whether the Board has met it burden of demonstrating that an unlawful discriminatory motive was a factor in the decision. See Neptune Water Meter Co. v. NLRB, 551 F.2d 568, 569–70 (4 Cir. 1977). The direct evidence in the record of discriminatory motive is relatively slight, but, to my mind, the circumstantial evidence is sufficiently compelling to support the Board's conclusion.

The discharges did not occur until March 2, 1977, over three months after the last state health inspection, conducted on November 30, 1976, but only thirty-nine days after Kiawah began its campaign to forestall union representation at the Inn. The majority apparently agrees that there is substantial evidence to support the Board's finding that Kiawah was well aware of unionizing activities. As I view the record, Hymes and Murray were the prime movers to organize the employees and Kiawah was well aware of their role. In any event, the state inspector testified that his November 30 review of the Inn's kitchen revealed deficiencies not only in the cleanliness of the kitchen and its equipment but also in the handling of food, an activity for which Hymes and Murray had no responsibility. Even subsequent to the discharges of Hymes and Murray the state health authorities continued to find serious deficiencies in the Inn's kitchen operations, and Kiawah offered evidence that it fired the Chief Chef, the Food and Beverage Director, and their respective successors as a result. Their terminations are entirely consistent with the conclusion of Kiawah vice-president Taylor's memorandum responding to the November 30 inspection in which he stated that: "The grade of the restaurant is in direct correlation to management effectiveness." But Kiawah's discharges of Hymes and Murray cannot be said to be entirely consistent with the memorandum, because Kiawah significantly terminated only Hymes and Murray among its kitchen employees despite the continuing health problems with the kitchen operations. Except for the discharges of Hymes and Murray, the evidence shows that Kiawah held its kitchen managers accountable for the deficiencies. It is noteworthy that the discharges of Hymes and Murray did not lead to any improvement in the kitchen cleaning, despite the testimony in the record suggesting that Hymes and Murray performed their tasks poorly.

The immediate circumstances of the discharges of Hymes and Murray appear particularly suspect when viewed in light of all of the evidence of Kiawah's efforts to upgrade sanitary standards in the Inn's kitchen and its campaign against union representation. Kiawah restructured its kitchen cleaning operations in early December 1976, relieving Hymes of his supervisory duties and allegedly placing full responsibility for cleanliness with Chief Chef Charvet. Kiawah clearly did not hold Hymes responsible for its previous difficulties with the state health authorities. Although Charvet apparently sought to terminate Hymes, Kiawah officially stated that its reason for the demotion was managerial error in establishing the supervisory position and that Hymes would be considered for a comparable post were one to become available. After Kiawah became aware of pro-union activity among the employees at the Inn, it established a formal Disciplinary Action Policy on January 25, 1977, which, according to the company, merely documented the "essence" of prior disciplinary "practice." The policy provided for suspension and possible discharge in the event of repeated reprimands. Hymes and Murray never received a reprimand. Kiawah first suspended them and eventually discharged them.

On February 16, Kiawah issued its first disciplinary suspension to Hymes for allegedly falsely punching in Murray's time card on February 12 when he was absent. It took this action despite the fact that Hymes not only denied this infraction but notified a company supervisor of Murray's absence at the time and admitted a day later that he left work during the shift to bring Murray to work. Morever, Kiawah disciplined him without investigating the possibility that another of the four or five employees in the area punched Murray's card.

On February 18, after an inspection of the kitchen by the Food and Beverage Director, Kiawah suspended Hymes and Murray for three days because of the unsatisfactory cleanliness of the kitchen. It took this action solely against Hymes and Murray without disciplining the apparently absent third member of the night-cleaning crew, one Solomon Stanley, despite the inspection report's notations of "accumulations" of grease and dirt. In addition, Chief Chef Charvet attributed other deficiencies noted in the report to dishwashers and cooks who were similarly not disciplined. Finally, the suspension was the first disciplinary action taken by Kiawah against cleaning employees after seven months of problems. Previously, these problems had been addressed on an ad hoc basis and corrected. The employees had received no disciplinary warnings and Kiawah conceded that the problems noted in the February 18 inspection were of the same character as problems previously noted.

Another inspection was conducted by another Kiawah officer on February 26, and it revealed unsatisfactory conditions in the kitchen. On March 2, Kiawah discharged Hymes and Murray, but the third night-cleaning crew member, Stanley, merely received a warning, as did two dishwashers.

These circumstances, demonstrating a gross disparity of treatment between Hymes and Murray and other kitchen employees responsible for cleaning, amply support the Board's conclusion that Kiawah's asserted motivation for the discharges was a pretext and that in fact the disciplinary sanctions against Hymes and Murray which were begun in February were pursued to the point of discharge because of their active solicitation of employees of the Inn on behalf of the union. As we explained in Neptune Meter, the rule articulated in Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v NLRB, 539 F.2d 1335, 1337 (4 Cir. 1976), requiring the Board to find "an affirmative and persuasive reason why the employer rejected the good cause and chose a bad one * * *":

> is not to be read to mean that there is a dichotomy between good and bad reasons. It does not change the rule in this circuit that discriminatory motivation need be only a factor in the discharge. Rather, [Firestone] made clear that where there is evidence of a proper motive for dismissal, the Board's mere characterization of the Company's assigned reason as "pretextual," without citation of evidence indicating invidious purpose, will not suffice.

551 F.2d at 569. I think that substantial evidence in the record supports the Board's finding that Kiawah would not have singled out Hymes and Murray for the extraordinary disciplinary action of discharge except for the in pro-union activity. I accordingly would enforce the Board's order to reinstate these two men.

NLRB v. Martins Ferry Hospital Association

Martins Ferry Hospital Association v. NLRB

649 F.2d 445 (6th Cir.), May 27, 1981; certiorari denied November 30, 1981

On appeal from S.D. Ohio

Lively and Merritt, Circuit Judges, and Phillips, Senior Circuit Judge

446

Harry Phillips, Senior Circuit Judge: Case No. 79-3408 is before the court on the appeal of Martins Ferry Hospital Association of Martins Ferry, Ohio, (the Hospital) from the order of District Judge Robert M. Duncan, requiring the Hospital to obey a subpoena duces tecum issued by the Board. Judge Duncan directed the Hospital to turn over to the Board the original or copies of 447

IRS W-4 forms [1] of its employees, for use by the Board in connection with the General Counsel's investigation of Board Case No. 8-CA-10755. The stated purpose of the Board is to compare the signatures on the W-4 forms with purported signatures of employees on union membership authorization cards now in the Board's possession to determine whether a union is authorized to represent a majority of certain employees of the Hospital.

Case No. 79-3409 is before the court on the appeal from the summary judgment of District Judge Duncan refusing to order the Board to disclose to the Hospital the membership authorization cards purportedly signed by certain Hospital employees.

On September 25, 1979, this court entered a stay order in case No. 79-3408 and consolidated the two cases for hearing on appeal.

We affirm the decision of the district court in case No. 79-3409. We dissolve the September 25, 1979, stay order entered by this court in case No. 79-3408, modify the judgment of the district court in that case and affirm it as modified.

On September 15, 1976, the Licensed Practical Nurse and Skilled Employees Professional and Economic Security Program, Inc. (LPN–SHEP), a labor organization, filed with the Board a petition requesting that an election be held among the Hospital's technical employees. LPN–SHEP claimed to represent at least 30 per cent of the technical employees. Authorization cards purportedly signed by employees designating LPN–SHEP as their collective bargaining representative were submitted to the Board.

Another labor organization, Local 1199, National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees (Local 1199), also filed three petitions seeking representation of three separate units of the Hospital's employees. Two of these three petitions claimed that 30 per cent or more of the employees in the requested unit supported Local 1199 as their collective bargaining representative. The third petition averred that a substantial number of employees supported Local 1199. On September 30, 1976, LPN–SHEP, in connection with a third labor organization, intervened with respect to one of Local 1199's petitions.

The Regional Director ordered elections in the three voting units petitioned for by the labor organizations. On December 16, 1978, elections conducted by the Board were held at the Hospital. A majority of the eligible voters in each unit voted against representation by any labor organization. Local 1199 filed 27 objections to the election, alleging pre-election misconduct by the Hospital. On January 24, 1977, Local 1199 filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Hospital, averring various acts allegedly 448 rendering a fair election impossible. Local 1199 also claimed that it represented a majority of the Hospital's employees, as demonstrated by signed authorization cards, and that the Hospital unlawfully refused to bargain with this Union. The Board was asked to issue an order requiring the Hospital to bargain with Local 1199 as the exclusive representative of its employees in the respective units.

At the request of the General Counsel, the Board issued a subpoena duces tecum requiring the Hospital to produce IRS W–4 forms, or if such forms were unavailable, other documents bearing signatures of all employees in the involved units covering the period from June through October 1976. On June 1, 1978, the Board denied the Hospital's petition to revoke the subpoena, stating that the "information sought appear[ed] to be relevant to the matter under investigation." The Hospital refused to comply with the subpoena.

On August 1, 1978, the Board filed an application in the district court for an order requiring that the Hospital obey its subpoena duces tecum. The appeal from the decision of the district court granting the relief prayed by the Board is case No. 79–3408.

On June 5, 1978, the Hospital filed its complaint in the district court under the Freedom of Information Act praying an injunction requiring the Board to make available to the employer the membership authorization cards allegedly executed by its employees. The district court granted the Board's motion for summary judgment, holding that the membership application cards are exempt from the Freedom of Information Act. The appeal from this judgment is case No. 79-3409.

II

It is well settled that a subpoena issued by the Board pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 161(1) should be enforced if "the matter under investigation is within the jurisdiction of the Board and . . . the evidence subpoened is related to that matter and is described with 'sufficient particularity.' " N.L.R.B. v. ITT Telecommunications, 415 F.2d 768, 769 (6th Cir. 1969); United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 652, 70 S.Ct. 357, 368, 94 L.Ed. 401 (1950). See also Goodyear Tire and Rubber v. N.L.R.B., 122 F.2d 450 (6th Cir. 1941). This rule includes IRS W-4 forms signed by employees of a company against which a charge of unfair labor practice is pending before the Board. N.L.R.B. v. Playskool, Inc., 431 F.2d 518, 519 (7th Cir. 1970).

Section 10057, N.L.R.B. Casehandling Manual (Part One), Unfair Labor Practice Proceedings, contains this statement of Board policy:

> Authorization Cards: Establishing Authenticity
> In all proceedings before the Board, the General Counsel offers only evidence which he has reason to believe is true and authentic. It is mandatory upon Regions to establish the authenticity of authorization cards before issuance of complaint. (Emphasis added.)

In his order requiring the Hospital to obey the subpoena duces tecum issued by the Board, District Judge Duncan emphasized that the Board is attempting to determine the asserted majority status of Union 1199 and needs to use IRS W-4 forms or other documents in the employer's possession bearing employee signatures in order to determine the validity of signatures on authorization cards. The Union is seeking a bargaining order pursuant to N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 614, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1940, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), which held that the Board may issue a bargaining order to remedy employer unfair labor practices which have undermined the majority strength of the Union to such an extent as to prevent the holding of a fair election "where there is a showing that at one point the union had a majority."

The Hospital contends that the subpoena unnecessarily interferes with the right of privacy of hospital employees. It is true that Form W-4 contains personal information concerning employees which could be of no interest to or concern of the Board, such as marital status, number of income tax allowances claimed, amount desired to be deducted each payday, exemptions from withholding claimed and the ground for the exemptions. To avoid this disclosure of private information, this court modifies the order of the district court so as to permit the Hospital, in lieu of furnishing the original W-4 forms to the Board, at the option of the Hospital to provide legible copies of W-4 forms of its employees during the period specified in the subpoena, made by a coping machine, obliterating all information on the form except the full name and address, social security number and signature of the employee and the date the W-4 form was signed. With this modification, the judgment of the district court in case No. 79-3408 is affirmed.

The district court correctly held that the union authorization cards sought by the Hospital are exempt from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552. N.L.R.B. v. Robbins Tire and Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978); Howard Johnson Co. v. N.L.R.B., 618 F.2d 1 (6th Cir. 1980); Madeira Nursing Center, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 615 F.2d 728 (6th Cir. 1980); N.L.R.B. v. Hardeman Garment Corp., 557 F.2d 559 (6th Cir. 1977). Authorization cards, like the witness statements in Robbins Tire, are investigatory records in the possession of the Board for enforcement purpose. Authorization cards are not discoverable by an employer under the rules of the Board, and discovery cannot be attained under the Freedom of Information Act.

The Hospital contends that the district court failed to protect the Hospital's fifth amendment right to substantive due process by permitting the Board to engage in pre-trial discovery while denying the Hospital equal discovery. We hold this contention to be without merit. N.L.R.B. v. Valley Mold Co., 530 F.2d 693, 695 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 824, 97 S.Ct. 77, 50 L.Ed.2d 86 (1976).

If the current investigation conducted by the General Counsel should result in the filing of a complaint, the Hospital will be entitled to a due process hearing, including an opportunity to compare signatures an authorization cards with signatures on the W-4 forms, and to introduce evidence in opposition to any effort on the part of the General Counsel to obtain a Gissel bargaining order. Any failure on the part of the Board to conduct a due process hearing can be challenged in proceedings before the Board and, if necessary, by petition to review filed in this court. ITT v. Electrical Workers, 419 U.S. 428, 448, 95 S.Ct. 600, 612, 42 L.Ed.2d 558 (1975); N.L.R.B. v. Valley Mold Co., Inc., supra, 530 F.2d 693 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 824, 97 S.Ct. 77, 50 L.Ed.2d 86 (1976).

The judgment of the district court in case No. 79-3408 is modified as hereinabove set forth, and affirmed as modified. The judgment of the district court in case No. 79-3409 is affirmed. No costs are taxed. Each party will bear its own costs in this court.

NLRB v. Allen's I.G.A. Foodliner

651 F.2d 438 (6th Cir.), May 28, 1981—244 NLRB 202

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before LIVELY and JONES, Circuit Judges, and GILMORE, District Judge*

439

NATHANIEL R. JONES, Circuit Judge. The Board petitions for enforcement of its Order that Allen's I.G.A. Foodliner (Allen's) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (3), by discharging an employee for his union activity. The Board also found that Allen's violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by announcing improved benefits in order to undermine a union and by sponsoring and participating in the circulation of a petition among employees withdrawing support from a union 244 NLRB No. 25. For the reasons set forth below, we grant enforcement.

EMPLOYEE DISCHARGE

Allen's, a Kentucky corporation, operates retail grocery establishments in Morehead, Kentucky. In the fall of 1976, the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, Local 227 (the Union) began an organizational campaign among Allen's employees. Lowell Ray Adkins became actively involved in the Union's organizational campaign. He distributed union authorization cards and solicited employees to join the Union. An election was held on January 20, 1977, which the Union lost. Based upon the Union's objections to the election, a second election was ordered.

During the period between the two elections, Adkins assisted Union officials by arranging and participating in organizational meetings and visits. At a meeting of the meat and produce department employees, store manager Hub Moore stated that Allen's had "kept quiet long enough," and announced a new benefit plan. Adkins inquired from the floor whether the plan was similar to a company benefit plan in Louisville. Moore replied that the plans were similar, at least as to time-and-a-half for overtime pay. Adkins challenged Moore's statement, asserting that the Louisville plan called for double overtime pay, and produced a copy of the Louisville plan to support his assertion. On other occasions, Moore accused Adkins of "spreading lies" by telling employees he could get them improved wages and benefits; charged Adkins with having "more control over the employees" than Moore did; asked Adkins why he supported the Union; and, told Adkins that he (Moore) had "people in the store" that would tell Moore anything he wanted to know and "anything that was happening."

A second election was held on August 12, 1977. After the Union's victory had been announced, Moore angrily stated to Adkins and two other employees, "Well, I guess you all think you won. Well, you didn't win. You lost."

Moore continued to harass Adkins about his union involvement. Moore told Adkins that he would fire Adkins if he caught him "talking union on the job or on company property." Moore admonished Adkins for "costing the people of the store money" and told him that Allen's had a plan that would improve benefits for the employees, but that it couldn't be put into effect at this time "because of the [Union] problem" they had. Moore be-rated Adkins for a pro-union slogan written on the restroom wall, and told him he wanted it stopped.

*Honorable Horace W. Gilmore, District Judge, United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, sitting by designation.

Approximately two weeks after the second election, Moore discharged night manager Billy Snipes. Moore told Snipes that he (Moore) had been instructed to fire Snipes if he was "for the Union." Moore then interrogated Snipes concerning a converation Snipes had had with Adkins a few days earlier. Moore offered Snipes a second chance provided he realized that there were "certain people you can talk to at work here." Moore also told Snipes to "stay away from the boys in produce and around back." Snipes refused and was fired.[1]

Several months after the second election, Adkins was elected shop steward and a member of the Union's negotiating committee. Moore told Adkins about a shop steward in Louisville that Moore had "thrown out of his office more times than he could count." Moore also told Adkins that the company had "finally" made the Louisville shop steward an assistant manager, and that he became the "best" assistant manager they had ever had. On April 7, 1978, Moore notified Adkins that he was being laid off "due to lack of business" and because he "rated below" his fellow employees.

It is well settled that an employer is prohibited from discharging an employee because of his union activities. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc. 395 U.S. 575, 618, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1942, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969); Vic Tanney Intern. Inc. v. NLRB, 622 F.2d 237 (6th Cir. 1980). The Board determined that Allen's discharged Adkins in violation of the Act. In this appeal Allen's asserts that Adkins was discharged because of a "business retrenchment" and because of his poor performance. Substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that Allen's proffered reasons for Adkins' discharge were pretextual. Although a subsequent increase in business necessitated the hiring of several new employees and the promotion of others from part time to full time, Adkins was never recalled. Allen's announcement of an increased wage and benefit plan are inconsistent with an economic retrenchment. Additionally, by Allen's own admission, Adkins was a "good" and "dependable" worker for eight of his nine years. Only within the year proceeding Adkins' discharge did Allen's begin to find fault with Adkins' attitude. Consequently, we hold that substantial evidence supports the Board's determination that Adkins' union activities were the sole reason for his discharge. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 150 (1980).

BENEFIT PLAN/EMPLOYEE PETITION

It is a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act for an employer to sponsor and participate in the circulation of a petition among employees withdrawing support from a union. There are "few more specific methods of interfering with employees' rights freely to choose or not to choose a bargaining representative than to have each summoned to the office of the employer and there to be asked to sign a prepared statement withdrawing from the Union." NLRB v. H. W. Elson Bottling Co., 379 F.2d 223, 225 (6th Cir. 1967).

The granting or withholding of benefits in order to discharge union activity is proscribed by Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 409, 84 S.Ct. 457, 459, 11 L.Ed.2d 435 (1964), the Supreme Court stated: "The danger inherent in well-timed increases in benefits is the suggestion of a fist inside a velvet glove. Employees are not likely to miss the inference that the source of benefits now conferred is also the source from which future benefits must flow and which may dry up if it is not obliged." Applying these principles, we hold that substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that Allen's violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by sponsoring and participating in the circulation of the petition among employees withdrawing support from the Union and by announcing improved benefits in order to undermine the Union.

In May 1978, employee Ivan Connolly approached at least two other employees with a petition which stated, in effect, that "we, the employees of Allen's IGA, do not wish to have the Amalgamated Meat Cutters represent us." Neither employee wished to sign the petition immediately although several other employees had signed the petition. Employee Paula Henderson sought the advice of assistant manager Harold Chapman. He told her that it would be "wise" to sign the petition and she did. The other employee, Donna Withrow, was called to assistant manager Wavell DeHart's office to explain her reasons for not signing. She replied that she wished to remain uninvolved and would wait until after a scheduled store meeting before making up her mind. DeHart said it would be "better" if she signed at once, whereupon she did sign.

[1] Snipes' discharge is not an issue in this appeal.

The day after the DeHart-Withrow incident, store owner Hubert Allen held a meeting for Allen's employees. He announced the institution of a profit-sharing plan for employees and a raise in their wages. Allen apologized for not instituting these changes sooner, explaining that if he had, he "could have gotten into trouble." Allen stated he was glad it was "all over now" and the company and its employees would be "one big, happy family again."

Allen's sole contention concerning its sponsoring of the anti-union petition and announcement of benefits is a procedural one: that the allegations as to the Board's findings are barred by Section 10(b) of the Act. Section 10(b) of the Act states, in part:

> Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, the Board * * * shall have power to issue * * * a complaint stating the charges in that respect * * * provided, that no complaint shall issue based upon any unfair labor practices occurring more than six months prior to the filing of the charge with the Board.

Allen's sponsored the anti-union petition and announced increased benefits in May of 1978. The original charge filed by the Union on July 10, 1978 did not specifically rely on Allen's anti-union petition and announcement of benefits. It only alleged that Allen's violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging employees and "by other acts." Nor did the Board's original complaint allege that Allen's anti-union petition and announcement of increased benefits violated the Act. However, on February 2, 1979, two weeks before the administrative hearing, an amended complaint issued by the Board specifically alleged that Allen's anti-union petition and announcement of increased benefits contravened Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Thus, Allen's argues that the findings of 8(a)(1) violations are not pursuant to a charge filed with the Board. We disagree.

As was aptly stated in NLRB v. Central Power & Light Co., 425 F.2d 1318 (5th Cir. 1970):

> The charge is thus not intended to be a detailed pleading or to specify the issues ultimately to be raised before the [Administrative Law Judge]; the Board's complaint serves that function. All that the requirement is really concerned about is that the instigation of an investigation and complaint proceed under a formal charge made by the party aggrieved and not from the Board's own initiative. Accordingly, general allegations such as > that the employer "by other acts and conduct * * * interfered with, restrained and coerced its employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act," * * * are legally sufficient to cause inclusion of other acts if they are sufficiently related to the specific acts alleged. And sufficient relation has generally been found between acts that are part of the same course of conduct, such as a single compaign against a union.

Id. at 1320 (citations and footnotes omitted). Accord, NLRB v. Bin-Dicator Co., 356 F.2d 210, 214 (6th Cir. 1966). In this case, the Union's charge was legally sufficient to include Allen's sponsorship of the anti-union petition and its announcement of benefits. Both of these were part of Allen's single course of conduct to undermine the union and as such they were sufficiently "related to" Adkins contemporaneous discharge to be raised by the union's charge.[2] Absent this relationship between the particular acts and "other acts" alleged in a charge, a party's allegations must be pled with factual detail and specificity.

Accordingly, the Board's order in ENFORCED.

Nissin Foods (USA) Company, Inc. v. NLRB

515 F. Supp. 1154 (E.D. Penn.), May 29, 1981

On petition for injunctive relief

TROUTMAN, District Judge: THE COURT: Good morning. Because this is an emergency matter requiring immediate attention, we shall dispose of it from the bench without the niceties of what sometimes is called a formal opinion.

The plaintiff, engaged in the business of food producing, seeks injunctive relief, namely, a temporary restraining order staying an administrative hearing to be held May 26, 1981, pending resolution of the issues here presented. Plaintiff contends that the defendant National Labor Relations Board, NLRB, is prosecuting unfair labor practices against plaintiff notwithstanding the fact that an administrative assistant has asserted that several of the cases upon which the labor complaint is based are without merit.

The Regional Director of the NLRB filed unfair labor practices against plaintiff as a result of a representation election held in June, 1980. The union had filed and subsequently withdrew objections to the election in Sepbember of 1980. The union also filed a series of unfair labor practice charges against the plaintiff upon which the Regional Director of the NLRB acted. The administrative hearing scheduled for May 26, 1981, will determine the representation and unfair labor practice issues.

Plaintiff fears that, absent grant of the requested relief, it will be prevented from receiving a full and fair administrative hearing and will, as a result suffer substantial economic harm. Plaintiff contends that litigation of the case, in light of the alleged admission that some of the charges lack merit, violates the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C., Section 151 et seq., as well as 29 C.F.R., Code of Federal Regulations, No. 101.8. Plaintiff further complains that defendants have refused and continue to refuse to permit NLRB employees to testify and/or produce documents essential to the plaintiff's defense at the administrative hearing. Plaintiff considers this withholding of information violative of its right of due process under the Fifth Amendment. Plaintiff asks this Court to decide which of the charges have merit, if any, and to order production of documents deemed necessary by plaintiff for a fair administrative hearing.

Preliminarily, defendants question the power of this Court to hear plaintiff's compliant. The action of the NLRB regarding representation and unfair labor practice claims cannot be challenged in an independent suit in federal district court unless the Board violates a clear statutory mandate. See Leedom v. Kyne, 358 U.S. 184, 79 S.Ct. 180, 3 L.Ed.2d 210 (1958), or the plaintiff asserts the deprivation of a constitutional right which is not obviosuly frivolous. Fay v. Douds, 172 F.2d 720 (Second Circuit 1949). Thus, plaintiff relies not wholly, of course, but heavily upon Leedom v. Kyne and Fay v. Douds.

Interestingly, Fay v. Douds has been criticized or questioned and at least not followed in various cases and under various situations. We here call attention to the case of Grutka v. Barbour, 549 F.2d 5 (Seventh Circuit), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 908, 97 S.Ct. 1706, 52 L.Ed. 2d 394 (1977); Amalgamated Meat Cutters v. Allen, 423 F.2d 267 (Eighth Circuit 1970), Greensboro Hosiery Mills, Inc. v. Johnston, 377 F.2d 28 (Fourth Circuit 1967); Boire v. Miami Herald Publishing Company, 343 F.2d 17 (Fifth Circuit), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 824, 86 S.Ct. 56, 15 L.Ed.2d 70 (1965); Utica Mutual Insurance Co. v. Vincent, 375 F.2d 129 (Second Circuit), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 839, 88 S.Ct. 63, 19 L.Ed.2d 102 (1967). Also, see NLRB v. Interstate Dress Carriers, Inc., 610 F.2d 99 (Third Circuit 1979).

The plaintiff, attempting to fit the circumstances of this case into the latter mold, claims that defendants are prosecuting plaintiff for pursuing the issues involved in this case with knowledge that some or all of the charges lack merit in violation of the National Labor Relations Act and the regulations issued thereunder. Defendants' failure to supply plaintiff with requested information, argues plaintiff, will result in the deprivation of plaintiff's property rights in violation of the Fifth Amendment by exposing the plaintiff to substantial fines, penalties, fees, costs and expenses.

As the plaintiff logically contends, the situation is not unlike that existing in NLRB vs. Capitol Fish Company, 48 LRRM, 3067 (Fifth Circuit 1961). Now, in that case, Capitol Fish Company case, the respondent contended that the findings of the examiner were not supported by substantial evidence. That case involved a petition by the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of its order. There the moving party contended that it had been denied the right to introduce material evidence based upon the contention that the general counsel's refusal to permit the attorney who investigated the case to testify and the trial examiner's quashing of the subpoena issued to the attorney constituted a violation of due process. There, the report shows, that "At the outset of the hearing the respondent moved that the hearing be posponed 'until such time as the General Counsel grants permission for Mr. Miller to testify.' The trial examiner denied the motion on the ground that the general counsel had already denied the request. The investigating attorney was present and represented the general counsel at the hearing. Another Board attorney moved to quash the subpoena on the grounds that 'the permission to testify had been denied and the material is irrelevant anyway.' The trial examiner granted the motion and revoked the subpoena."

"The unrebutted testimony of one Robert Poole, who voluntarily left Capitol Fish Company for a better paying job, supported the respondent's contention that the investigating attorney's testimony would have an important bearing on the credibility of all of the witnesses who testified against Capitol Fish."

The court there noted in remanding the record for further proceedings as follows: "The record indicates that the trial examiner did not consider whether the General Counsel was right or wrong in refusing to allow the investigating attorney to testify."

Now, in Capitol Fish, the court was asked to look back and determine whether due process had been afforded the plaintiff. Here we are asked to look forward and assume that due process will be denied.

Notwithstanding grave doubts concerning the continuing vitality of the Fay exception, as reflected in the cases cited above, and notwithstanding some doubts as to plaintiff's characterization of the process due it under the Fifth Amendment, the Court will assume jurisdiction for the purpose of this hearing and, in order to expedite consideration of this matter, will excuse the so-called exhaustion requirement.

To obtain preliminary injunctive relief, the plaintiff must demonstrate, one, that irreparable injury will occur if relief is not granted until a final adjudication on the merits can be made; two, that there is a reasonable probability of success on the merits; three, that the possibility of harm to the nonmoving party, as well as to any other interested party, will be minimal; and, four, that harm to the public, when relevant, will not be likely. See Continental Groups, Inc. v. Amoco Chemical Corp., 614 F.2d 351 (Third Circuit 1980). Accord, Kennecott v. Smith Corp., 637 F.2d 181 (Third Circuit 1980), Fitzgerald v. Mountain Laurel Racing Corp., 607 F.2d 589 (Third Circuit 1979).

To prove "irreparable injury" plaintiff must show an "imminent threat" rather than the mere "possibility of remote future injury." Again, see Continental Group, Inc. v. Amoco. And also see generally Perkins v. Wagner, 513 F.Supp. 904 No. 81-484 (E.D.Pa. 1981); and Kocker Coal Co. v. Marshall, 497 F.Supp. 73 (E.D.Pa. 1980).

Thus, as stated, the burden in this proceeding rests upon the plaintiff to show irreparable injury, and this must be in the nature of an imminent threat as opposed to a possibility of remote injury in the future.

We conclude on the basis of the pleadings filed, there having been no testimony produced, that the plaintiff has failed to meet this burden. Plaintiff asserts or finds "irreparable harm" in that it may be prevented from receiving a full and fair administrative hearing, that it may be denied an adequate administrative remedy and suffers "substantial economic harm" by loss of goodwill, may suffer a temporary plant shutdown during the hearing, loss of sales, loss of profit and suffer legal costs and expenses. Plaintiff also fears, and understandably asserts, that defendants' refusal to permit employees to testify and to produce documentary evidence will irreparably harm plaintiff for the reason that plaintiff has no means of obtaining this information.

Clearly, the economic harm which the plaintiff asserts, however substantial, will not support the issuance and the granting of injunctive relief such as is sought in the case. See Oburn v. Shapp, 521 F.2d 142 (Third Circuit 1975); nor will litigation expenses or substantial and unrecoupable costs justify the grant of such extraordinary relief. See Renegotiation Board v. Banercroft Clothing Co., 415 U.S. 1, 94 S.Ct. 1028, 39 L.Ed.2d 123 (1974). Likewise, and most importantly, internal appellate procedures within the Board framework, as well as opportunity for review by the Court of Appeals, will provide and should provide the plaintiff with adequate remedies for any deprivation or violations of its right to a full and fair administrative hearing.

Accordingly, we find and conclude that plaintiff has failed to demonstrate irreparable harm. This finding alone suffices to warrant denial of the requested injunctive relief. See Commonwealth of Pennsylvania ex rel. Creamer v. United States Department of Agriculture, 469 F.2d 1387 (Third Circuit 1972).

An appropriate order will therefore be entered denying the injunctive relief. This conclusion renders moot the remainder of plaintiff's claims given an immediate hearing as scheduled, and the complaint will accordingly be dismissed sua sponte. See Bryson v. Brand Insulators, Inc., 621 F.2d 556 (Third Circuit 1980).

In reaching our conclusion, we assume that the plaintiff will pursue its contentions before an impartial Administrative Law Judge with the vigor and the vitality evident in these emergency proceedings before this Court in which event the administrative abuses alleged will surely surface and become the subject of correction and appropriate remedy either by the Administrative Law Judge or the appellate court. Further intrusion by this Court into the administrative and appellate procedures mandated by Congress is not warranted. An appropriate order will therefore be entered.

And finally, I desire to express our appreciation to counsel for their sacrifice in giving us this, the first day of a long holiday weekend, to accommodate the disposition of this emergency hearing. Thank you very much, gentlemen, and unless there is something further, court is adjourned.

(Whereupon, at 10:37 a.m. court was adjourned.)

ON MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION

THE COURT: Let the record show that the plaintiff has again presented its position in support of its motion for reconsideration. This has been done in this emergency hearing in the absence of defense counsel, and we have, as we have advised plaintiff's counsel, reached a ruling in the case which, after telephone conversation with defense counsel, indicates no need for their appearance either today, if that were possible, and it is not, or on a later date.

Although the Court, within the confines of its schedule could indeed hear the matter further next week, there seems to be no need to further postpone it. Rather it appears to the Court that the plaintiffs are indeed entitled to an early decision by this Court so that the plaintiff may exercise its remedies either before the NLRB or before the Circuit Court of Appeals or both. Accordingly, we shall, as we did on Saturday, dispose of the motion for reconsideration by way of this bench opinion, and we shall at this time rule directly and specifically on the question of jurisdiction.

As to jurisdiction, the Court on Saturday assumed jurisdiction and then did dispose of the case on the basis of other questions involved. Today, we shall reach the issue of jurisdiction as well as other matters.

Now, as we previously noted in our bench opinion on Saturday, the action of the NLRB cannot be challenged in an independent suit in federal district court unless the Board violated a clear statutory mandate. Leedom v. Kyne, 358 U.S. 184, 79 S.Ct. 180, 3 L.Ed.2d 210 (1958), or the plaintiff asserts the deprivation of a constitutional right which is not obviously frivolous. Fay v. Douds, 172 F.2d 720 (2d Cir. 1949).

To invoke the jurisdiction of this Court, plaintiff must, therefore, show that the Board "clearly breached the bounds of its proper authority as a matter of law." Machinery, Scrap Iron, etc. Employees Local 714 v. Madden, 343 F.2d 497 (7th Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 822, 86 S.Ct. 53, 15 L.Ed.2d 69 (1966), or plaintiff must show that the Board patently disregarded the bounds of its statutory jurisdiction. Grutka v. Barbour, 549 F.2d 5 (7th Cir.) cert. denied, 431 U.S. 908, 97 S.Ct. 1706, 52 L.Ed.2d 394 (1977).

In the case at bar, the plaintiff originally alleged that, without the requested relief, it would be prevented from receiving a full and fair administrative hearing and would suffer substantial economic harm. Plaintiff contended that the prosecution of this case, in light of the alleged admission that some of the charges lacked merit, violated the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. 151 et seq., as well as 29 C.F.R. 101.8. Plaintiff also complained that defendant's refusal to permit NLRB employees to testify and/or produce documents essential to plaintiff's defense at the administrative hearing constituted a violation of rights secured by the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.

Today, after one day of hearing before the Administrative Law Judge, which hearing is presently on-going, plaintiff further argues that the Administrative Law Judge has ruled that he lacks power to overrule general counsel of the NLRB, and he, therefore, revoked the subpoenas in question, that he refused to consider or even read the plaintiff's motion for a pretrial ruling concerning the supposedly meritless charges to which Hoeber, H-o-e-b-e-r, adverted, and that plaintiff cannot sue the NLRB for abuse of process because of the Federal Tort Claims Act, and hence, they suffer irreparable harm.

These additional contentions do not, in our judgment, warrant an exercise of jurisdiction permitted by the narrow exception created by Leedom v. Kyne.

Alternatively, under the Fay doctrine, plaintiff could establish jurisdiction by alleging the deprivation of a constitutional right which is not obviously frivolous. However, the Fay doctrine never gained wide or strong support among the circuit courts. See, for example, Grutka v. Barbour, supra, Amalgamated Meat Cutters v. Allen, 423 F.2d 267 (8th Cir. 1970); Greensboro Hoisery Mills, Inc. v. Johnston, 377 F.2d 28 (4th Cir. 1967); Boire v. Miami Herald Publishing Co., 343 F.2d 17 (5th Cir.); cert. denied, 382 U.S. 824, 86 S.Ct. 56, 15 L.Ed.2d 70 (1965). In fact, even the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, which originally promulgated the Fay doctrine has now questioned its vitality. See Utica Mutual Insurance Co. v. Vincent, 375 F.2d 129 (2d Cir.); cert. denied, 389 U.S. 839, 88 S.Ct. 63, 19 L.Ed.2d 102 (1967).

In the Third Circuit, the Court of Appeals does not appear to have ever adopted this rule, particularly where, as here, the employer, the party seeking to invoke the court's jurisdiction, can bring to the attention of the appellate court all the alleged procedure irregularities of which it complains. See NLRB v. Interstate Dress Carriers, Inc., 610 F.2d 98 (3rd Cir. 1978).

In light of these considerations and legal principles, exercise of jurisdiction by this Court under these circumstances would be inappropriate. Moreover, even if we had assumed jurisdiction previously, that is, in connection with Friday and Saturday's proceedings, plaintiff has not demonstrated any intervening events justifying or warranting reconsideration of the order denying the requested relief.

As we explained in our bench opinion on Saturday, neither the economic harm which plaintiff fears nor the substantial and unrecoupable costs expended will support the issuance of an injunction. Here we call attention to the case of Borden, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 495 F.2d 785 (7th Cir. 1974), where at page 789 the court, in discussing this issue, used the following very strong language: "Finally, the district court properly recognized that Borden's claim of irreparable injury based upon the cost and inconvenience of defending itself in administrative proceedings is not alone sufficient to justify judicial intervention in the administrative process."

Citing Myers v. Bethlehem Corporation, 303 U.S. 41, 58 S.Ct. 459, 82 L.Ed. 638, and Renegotiation Board v. Bannercroft Clothing Co., 415 U.S. 1, 94 S.Ct. 1028, 39 L.Ed.2d 123, both of which were cited in our bench opinion on Saturday. The Court further expressly reaffirms the rule of Myers stating that—and we quote—"Mere litigation expense, even substantial and unrecoupable costs, does not constitute irreparable injury." Furthermore, the internal appellate procedures within the Board framework and the opportunity for review by the Court of Appeals provide plaintiff, under the law, with what has been described as an adequate remedy at law.

Accordingly, we find and conclude that the Court lacks jurisdiction and, therefore, plaintiff's motion for reconsideration of the order entered May 26 1981, will be denied.

Today, the following order will be entered: AND NOW, this 28th day of May 1981, plaintiff's motion for reconsideration is denied, and plaintiff's complain is dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

If there is nothing further, court will be adjourned.

(Whereupon, at 3:41 p.m. court was adjourned.)

NLRB v. Savin Business Machines Corporation

649 F.2d 89 (1st Cir.), May 29, 1981–242 NLRB 435

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Coffin Chief Judge, Bownes Circuit Judge, Wyzanski, District Judge*

*Of the District of Massachusetts, sitting by designation.

Coffin, Chief Judge: The National Labor Relations Board petitions for enforcement of its order directing the respondent, Savin Business Machines Corporation, to reinstate with back pay its former employee, Stuart Portner. The Board adopted the findings of the Administrative Law Judge and held that Savin had discharged Portner because of his union organizing activity in violation of §§ 8(a)(1) & (3) of the National Relations Act. Because this decision is supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, we will enforce the order as modified.

The undisputed facts cover a relatively short compass. Portner was actively engaged in soliciting authorization cards for the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America several months before his discharge. Portner's job responsibilities were to service and repair business machines sold or leased to Savin customers, usually at the customer's place of business. In terms of technical proficiency, Portner was acknowledged by the company to be not merely good, but excellent. Supervisor

Pena testified that Portner "was probably the most technically competent person I have ever met." Several months before his discharge, Portner received a letter of commendation from Savin's corporate president and a cash prize for his suggestion for improving a company product, the third such suggestion of Portner's accepted by the company. Despite these signs of success, Portner was dissatisfied with working conditions at Savin. He expressed his discontent to other employees and sometimes protested his job assignments. In particular, Portner frequently failed to comply with the company's dress code, notwithstanding promises of improvement.

Beyond these facts, the company's version of events departs radically from that advanced by the General Counsel and adopted by the ALJ. The company maintains that it discharged Portner for an accumulation of offenses and misdeeds, in themselves minor, which, when taken together, demonstrated a "bad attitude" and insubordination. The company's position is that it was willing to tolerate Portner's shortcomings because of his technical excellence during its earlier, leaner years, but that by 1977 the Boston office's outlook had improved, and its staff of technicians had increased to the point where Portner's expertise became expendable. The final straw, according to the company, came on December 14, 1977 when Portner called the office to report that his car was disabled and he could not make his service calls. Portner had called earlier in the morning to notify the office dispatcher that he was trying to have the car repaired. Service technicians are required to provide their own transportation on service calls. The second time Portner called, supervisor Pena spoke with him and asked that he come to the company's Brighton facility, Portner replied that he could not obtain transportation and an argument ensued. Pena could not remember the argument in any detail, except that it generally concerned Portner's inability to get transportation and lasted 20–30 minutes. Pena ended the conversation by discharging Portner.

The company does not rely on this incident alone, but on the combined effect of this and several other preceding infractions of company rules. Several company witnesses testified to customer complaints about Portner's dress and "attitude", although no written record was made of them. The company also relies on an incident occurring sometime in September or October 1977 when supervisor Pena observed Portner apparently stealing switches from a company parts room. Once again no written record was made of the event. Plant manager Raffa testified that he would have fired Portner for this, but he felt that the evidence was insufficient. Finally, the company asserts that Portner "moonlighted" by accepting pay directly from customers for after-hours work. Portner, according to the company, charged two customers directly after he had been denied permission to do so. The company denies any knowledge that Portner was engaged in organizational activity.

The General Counsel presented testimony by Portner, credited by the ALJ, that on or about August 17, 1977, supervisor Pena had observed Portner distributing union authorization cards in the company parking lot [1] and later that same day had threatened Portner with loss of his job if he continued "making trouble" and "leading a revolution". Thereafter, in late August or early September, employee Mendes testified that supervisor Pena told him and several other technicians that "a union wouldn't do anybody any good" and asked the rhetorical question "what [is] Mr. Portner * * * trying to prove by starting a union here"? In September, after the union organizing campaign had fizzled out, Portner testified that he began receiving "bogus calls"—service calls to a location where there was no repair work to be done. Before his union activities, Portner testified that he received one or two such calls a week; afterwards he received as many as four in one day. "Bogus calls" waste time and make the technician appear less productive. Portner testified that when he questioned a dispatcher about the problem, the dispatcher replied that the calls had been placed in his assignment box by supervisor Pena.

[1] We fail to understand the significance of the discrepancy asserted by the company between Portner's testimony that Pena saw him in the parking lot and the ALJ's summary statement that Portner saw Pena. Obviously, Portner watched Pena watch him. Moreover, the ALJ's "version", if different at all, was more favorable to the company than Portner's.

This evidence was sufficient to establish a prima facie case of anti-union motivation for Portner's discharge. NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Ref'g Corp., 598 F.2d 666 (1st Cir. 1979). Portner's credited testimony, corroborated in important part by that of Mendes, showed that the company's supervisors knew of Portner's union activity, warned him to stop it, and, when that failed, attempted to harass him and possibly to lay a foundation for his discharge. The prima facie showing shifts the focus of inquiry to the company's proferred legitimate business justification for the discharge. Id., 589 F.2d at 671.

The General Counsel's evidence in rebuttal cocentrated on the events leading up to the telephone conversation during which Portner was discharged, thus meeting the company's theory that this apparently minor incident was in fact the crowning blow of a long-standing pattern of misbehavior. As to the customer complaints, company dispatcher Johnston testified that customers complained about other technicians as well. Johnston also testified that Portner was given an average of 7 to 8 assignments daily, or between 1,750 and 2,000 annually in a fifty-week work year. Of this number, company witnesses could recall only three instances where customers had complained about Portner and in none of those instances was Portner warned or disciplined in any way. Nor was Portner disciplined after his alleged theft of parts from the company supply store. Supervisor Pena testified that when he found Portner in the parts room, a "restricted area", and demanded an explanation, Portner replied that he was picking up switches to repair a customer's equipment. Employee Mendes testified that it was common practice for technicians to sign out parts on their own when no supervisory personnel were present. As to Portner's alleged "moonlighting", there is no dispute that the company permits such "moonlighting" with prior approval. Portner testified that he was given explicit approval; the company witnesses denied this. The ALJ resolved the credibility dispute in favor of Portner. Finally, there is also no dispute that Portner had been a sloppy dresser during his entire eight year tenure with the company and that the company had never pressed him beyond his periodic assurances that he would try to improve his appearance.

Based on this evidence the ALJ concluded that Portner's misdeeds took on importance only after his discharge. On this view, even assuming as true the company's version of the discharge incident, the ALJ decided that Portner's inability to satisfy Pena's demand that he find alternate transportation on this single occasion could not have been the true reason for his discharge. He therefore concluded that "but for " Portner's union activities, he would not have been discharged. We find the ALJ's finding of pretext to be supported by substantial evidence. The ALJ was entitled to discredit the company's story that despite its mounting frustration with Portner's performance, it never once disciplined him or even placed a reprimand in his personnel file for any of his alleged acts of misconduct. Particularly damning in this regard is the company's policy, stated in its Branch Office Procedure manual:

> "Whenever unsatisfactory performance or behavior occurs, the supervisor or manager should deal with the situation promptly, constructively and in a tactful manner in order to: * * * d. Assure that documentation is available to support management's position in the event of discrimination or labor claim charges."

The company's principal objection to the ALJ's decision is his crediting of employee Mendes' testimony going to the General Counsel's prima facie showing of improper motivation. This contention is not without some force. Mendes admitted to being a friend of Portner's and to having been denied a wage increase by the company shortly before a Board agent took his statement. He showed some sign of bias in Portner's favor by failing to recall on cross-examination that Portner sometimes dressed in jeans. Mendes' testimony regarding supervisor Pena's anti-union remarks was contradicted by company employees Larner and Dubeau as well as by Pena.

The ALJ noted this credibility conflict and expressly decided in favor of Mendes' version. The reasons given for this determination were that Mendes appeared to be a candid and forthright witness, Mendes testified against the respondent's interest while still employed (the same was not true for Larner, Dubeau, and Pena, also currently employed) and Mendes would not likely have fabricated the incident based on his friendship with Portner by placing two other technicians, still employed, at the site of the conversation. Within the bounds of reason, it is the ALJ's judgment, not ours, that is controlling on issues of credibility. See, e.g., NLRB v. Yale Mfg. Co., 356 F.2d 69, 72 74 (1st Cir. 1966). Mere numerical superiority of witnesses, or the possibility of bias is not sufficient to put the question beyond the realm of reasonable dispute. We see no basis to upset the ALJ's credibility determination in this instance.[2]

We have considered the company's other contentions and, with one exception, find them to be without merit. The ALJ properly could deny the company's motion to reopen the record to admit, on the issue of Portner's credibility, evidence that Portner had participated in a robbery at the company almost a year after his discharge. To the extent this evidence was at all relevant to credibility, the ALJ was not bound to open the record on that issue alone. NLRB v. Jacob E. Decker and Sons, 569 F.2d 357, 365 (5th Cir. 1978). We note, as did the Board, that the company's allegations, if true, would obviously have a great bearing on Portner's right to reinstatement and back pay and may yet be introduced on those issues at the compliance stage of these proceedings.

The company's contention that the broad cease and desist order entered against it is not supported by the evidence is sound. All union activity ceased several months before Portner's discharge, apparently by voluntary choice of the employees. There is no evidence of continuing organizational activities at Savin or that Savin has engaged in broad scale unlawful activity. Accordingly we will modify the order and notice of the Board by eliminating the catch-all paragraph 1(b) of the order and substituting the form of notice proposed by the ALJ for that entered by the Board. See, e.g., NLRB v. Beth Israel Hospital, 554 F.2d 477, 483 (1st Cir. 1977), aff'd, 437 U.S. 483, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978).

As so modified, the order will be enforced.

NLRB v. First Termite Control Co., Inc.

646 F.2d 424 (9th Cir.), May 29, 1981—247 NLRB 684

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before PREGERSON, ALARCON, NELSON, Circuit Judges

425

ALARCON, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) has applied for enforcement of its order requiring First Termite Control Co. (Termite) to cease and desist in unfair labor practices. The NLRB failed to establish the juridictional requirement of interstate commerce by admissible evidence. We must deny the enforcement order.

---

[2] Nor will we disturb the ALJ's acceptance of Portner's version of his conversation with Pena based in part on demeanor evidence and in part on a transcript of a surreptitious tape recording of the conversation prepared by Portner. The policy argument in favor of banning such recorded evidence of collective bargaining—its inhibiting effect on free bargaining discourse, see Carpenter Sprinkler Corp., v. NLRB, 605 F.2d 60, 66 (2d Cir. 1979)—is greatly diminished, if applicable at all, in the context of a single employee-supervisor conversation. The Board is entrusted with wide discretion in evidentiary decisions. Id. It is not required to apply automatically the rules of evidence applicable in the federal courts. 29 U.S.C. § 160(b). We think that under the circumstances present here it was not error for the ALJ to admit the tape and transcript for the limited purpose of verifying credibility. Although the transcript was less than a model of clarity, we note that the company was offered the opportunity during a continuance of the hearing to inspect the tape for authenticity and to compare it with the transcript for accuracy.

FACTS

Termite, an Oakland, California, company, provides termite and pest control services to private residences. Five percent of Termite's customers are individual home owners who directly contact the company. The remaining 95 percent of Termite's business comes from real estate agents who contact Termite on behalf of their clients.

The specifics of the unfair labor practices alleged here are irrelevant to our disposition. It is sufficient to note that unfair labor practice proceedings were instituted by the NLRB. In a hearing before an administrative law judge (ALJ), it was found that Termite violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), by discharging a number of employees for engaging in protected concerted activity. The ALJ issued an order requiring Termite to cease and desist from unfair labor practices. The order also required Termite to offer the discharged employees full and immediate reinstatement in their former jobs, or in substantially equivalent jobs if those jobs no longer existed. The Board affirmed.

Termite contends that the enforcement order should be denied because: (1) the evidence used to establish the jurisdictional requisite of interstate commerce was improperly admitted; (2) the retail business standard was improperly applied to Termite; and (3) the order requiring Termite to offer reinstatement was improper. Our disposition of the first issue makes it unnecessary for us to reach the other two issues.

ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE

Under the NLRA, the NLRB has jurisdiction over all cases "affecting commerce." 29 U.S.C. § 160(a). To satisfy this statutory standard, it must be shown that the business in question generates an amount of interstate commerce that rises above the level of "de minimis." NLRB v. Fainblatt, 306 U.S. 601, 607, 59 S.Ct. 668, 672, 83 L.Ed. 1014 (1939).

To establish the necessary amount of interstate commerce, the NLRB introduced the following evidence: From May 1978 through May 1979, Termite bought approximately $20,000 worth of Douglas Fir Lumber from Economy Lumber Co. (Economy), a California company. During that period, Economy purchased over $1 million of Douglas Fir lumber. The NLRB introduced a freight bill to prove that a substantial amount of the lumber purchased by Economy came from outside California.[1] The bill showed that a shipment of lumber delivered to Economy in California originated in the State of Washington.

The freight bill was prepared by Southern Pacific Railroad. The custodian of records for Southern Pacific, however, was not called as a witness. Instead, the NLRB called Economy's bookkeeper as a witness. The bookkeeper testified that she had received the freight bill, and that she had paid it. No other witnesses were called to support the admission of the freight bill.

Termite objected to the introduction of the freight bill on grounds of hearsay. The ALJ overruled the objection, and held that the freight bill was admissible under the business records exception to the hearsay rule. Fed.R.Evid. 803(6).[2]

Rule 803(6) provides that: "A memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any form, of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity, and if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make the memorandum report, record, or data compilation, all as shown by the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness, unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness" are not excluded by the hearsay prohibition.

It cannot be contested that the challenged statement is in fact hearsay. The NLRB sought to introduce a writing that stated lumber came from Washington to California in order to prove the truth of that statement. See Fed.R.Evid. 801(c). The statement would, however, be properly admissible if it fell within the 803(6) exception.

[1] The parties entered into a stipulation by which much of the above information was admitted. Termite, however, did not stipulate to the existence of an interstate commerce nexus.

[2] 29 U.S.C. § 160(b) provides that "so far as practicable [proceedings before the NLRB shall] be conducted in accordance with the rules of evidence applicable in the district courts of the United States * * *." See 29 CFR §§ 101.10(a), 102.39 (1980). The parties do not contend that the use of the rules of evidence was not practicable in this case.

Termite contends that the requirements of Rule 803(6) were not met because the authenticating witness was an employee of Economy, and not of Southern Pacific, the entity that prepared the challenged record. Thus, the witness had no knowledge of the circumstances under which the records were prepared. Termite claims that 803(6) is not satisfied unless the witness has knowledge of both the making and keeping of the records sought to be introduced. Moreover, Termite contends that the witness must be able to testify that the record was made and kept in the ordinary course of the business' activity. In essence, Termite contends that Economy's bookkeeper did not satisfy the "custodian of records or other qualified witness" criterion of 803(6).

The NLRB responds that under 803(6) it is not necessary that the witness have knowledge of the preparation of the record. It is sufficient if the records "have all the indicia of trustworthiness that the federal rules rquire for the admission of hearsay evidence." (Citing United States v. Ullrich, 580 F.2d 765 (5th Cir. 1978).)

A traditional explanation for the exclusion of hearsay evidence is that it deprives the opposing party of the opportunity for cross-examination. The declarant is not present and thus cannot be cross-examined. On the other hand, the witness who is present and testifying to the hearsay does not have any personal knowledge of the hearsay on which testimony is sought, and therefore cannot be cross-examined in a meaningful manner. See 4 J. Weinstein &

M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence ¶ 800[01] at 10–11.[3]

Despite the inability to cross-examine, a business records exception to the hearsay rule has been incorporated into Anglo-American law for a substantial period.[4] The modern theory behind this exception is that business records have a special indicia of reliability. See Fed.R.Evid. 803, Notes of Advisory Committee on Proposed Rules:

> The element of unusual reliability of business records is said variously to be supplied by systematic checking, by regularity and continuity which produce habits of precision, by actual experience of business in relying upon them, or by a duty to make an accurate record as part of a continuing job or occupation."

The provision in the rule that requires that the records be supported by "the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness" insures the presence of some individual at trial who can testify to the methods of keeping the information. If the witness is not knowledgeable as to the manner in which the records are made and kept, he or she cannot be subjected to meaningful cross-examination. Without cross-examination on the keeping of the records, the trier of fact would have no rational basis on which to evaluate the accuracy of the record, and therefore the trustworthiness of the evidence. Thus, "[t]he testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness who can explain the record-keeping of his organization is ordinarily essential." 4 J. Weinstein & M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence ¶ 803(6)[02] at 151–52.[5]

The bookkeeper from Economy had no knowledge of how Southern Pacific's records were made or maintained. She testified that she received a freight bill from Southern Pacific for a shipment of lumber and that she made payment on the bill. At best the freight bill seemed to corroborate her testimony that she paid for a shipment of lumber. The freight bill, however, was offered to prove the lumber was shipped from Washington to California. The record is briefly quoted below:

[3] Cross-examination is "a 'Vital feature' of the Anglo-American system. Certainly cross-examination sheds light on the witness perception, memory and narration. It can expose inconsistencies, incompletenesses, and inaccuracies in his testimony." 4 J. Weinstein & M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence ¶ 800[01] at 10–11. See also 5 J. Wigmore, Wigmore on Evidence § 1367 at 32 (cross-examination "is beyond any doubt the greatest legal engine ever invented for the discovery of truth").

[4] Beginning in the 1600's a practice developed in England by which the "shop books" of tradesmen and craftsmen were admissible as evidence of debts. The rules prohibited a party from being a witness. This rule, therefore, developed as a necessity, as well as a rule of convenience, being the only way to prove debts. Abuses in this rule led to a number of statutory limitations.

In the 1700's an alternate, but broader, doctrine developed in English common law courts. This rule after some expansion, permitted use of all entries made by a person, since deceased, if made in the ordinary course of business.

The rule developed somewhat unevenly in America. By the 1800's however, an American equivalent to the English regular business entries exception began to emerge. Rule 803(6) simply represents a later, more relaxed, codification of the English rules. See generally J. Weinstein & M. Berger, 4 Weinstein's Evidence ¶ 803(6)[01]; 5 Wigmore on Evidence, Evidence §§ 1517–1518 (4th Ed.1974).

[5] That the drafters of the rule intended to require that the introducing witness have knowlege of the making, keeping and maintaining of the documents is clearly established by the Notes of the Committee on the Judiciary, Senate Report No. 93–1277. Note to paragraph (6). "A sufficient foundation for the introduction of such evidence will be laid if the party seeking to introduce the evidence is able to show that it was the regular practice of the activity to base such memorandums, reports, records, or data compilations upon a transmission from a person with knowledge, e.g., in the case of the content of a shipment of goods, upon a report from the company's receiving agent or in the case of a computer print-out, upon a report from the company's computer programer or one who has knowledge of the particular record system * * *." (emphasis added)

> A: I—I couldn't answer that. All I know is there's a set rate the Southern Pacific has for freight.

It is clear from the foregoing that the witness from Economy had no knowledge as to how the records were prepared nor any knowledge as to the manner in which factual information was placed in the records kept by Southern Pacific. Moreover, the record indicates no reason for the witness to be interested in the accuracy of the records as far as they refer to the place of origin of the lumber.

The NLRB contends, nonetheless, that United States v. Pfeiffer, 539 F.2d 668, 671 (8th Cir. 1976), United States v. Flom, 558 F.2d 1179, 1182 (5th Cir. 1977), and United States v. Ullrich, 580 F.2d 765 (5th Cir. 1978), would permit the admission of the challenged freight bills. These cases are factually distinguishable.

In United States v. Pfeiffer the prosecution introduced records prepared by a common carrier through the testimony of an employee of the shipper. The Eighth Circuit held this was proper:

> According to [the employee-witness] these invoices were delivery receipts which were prepared from the [shipper's] bill of lading by the common carrier taking the shipment away from the * * * plant. He stated that the carriers got paid on those freight bills, so they had to be correct in the weight and number of pieces, the freight charges, and the bill of lading number shown on that document * * *. [The shipper] relied on these records prepared by other companies. Although [the employee-witness] had no actual knowledge about the circumstances surrounding their preparation, he was familiar with these shipping invoices and the same delivery slips were checked by [the employee-witness] against [the shipper's] bills of lading for accuracy and proper freight payments. [The employee-witness] was familiar with all of these procedures and the records demonstrate a circumstantial guarantee of trustworthiness.

539 F.2d at 671.

In contrast to the employee-witness in Pfeiffer, the witness in the present case was unable to demonstrate any familiarity with the procedures used by Southern Pacific in making the records, had not checked the records for accuracy, and did not rely on the information in the records as to the lumber's place of origin.

In United States v. Flom, the prosecution introduced invoices prepared by one company through the testimony of an employee of a second company, in whose files the records were found. In a cursory manner, the Fifth Circuit approved this practice, noting that "[a]lthough the usual case involves an employee of the preparing business laying the necessary foundation under 803(6), the law is clear that under circumstances which demonstrate trustworthiness it is not necessary that the one who kept the record, or even had supervision over their preparation, testify * * *." 588 F.2d at 1182.

The Fifth Circuit unfortunately did not delineate the circumstances which illustrated trustworthiness. The record before us does not contain any circumstances that would demonstrate trustworthiness as to the place of origin of the shipment of lumber. There is simply no testimony regarding the preparation of these records.

In United States v. Ullrich, the prosecution introduced records to prove the identity of an automobile through to testimony of an employee of an automobile dealership. The records were prepared by an automobile manufacturer and a credit agency, and sent to the dealership. The Fifth Circuit held that their introduction was proper. "Although these documents were furnished originally from other sources, [the employee-witness] testified that they were kept in the regular course of the dealership's business. In effect, they were integrated into the records of the dealership and were used by it." 580 F.2d at 771.

The Ullrich court also noted the existence of mechanisms in the record keeping system that insured accuracy, testified to by the employee-witness. In the instant case, there was no testimony to indicate Economy relied on the information in the records relating to the origin of the lumber. Moreover, there was no evidence of mechanisms that would insure accuracy.

The NLRB also relies on United States v. Olivo, 278 F.2d 415 (3d Cir. 1960), a case arising under the since repealed Business Records Act. This reliance is unjustified. In Olivo, the offered records were prepared by the Illinois branch of a company, and introduced by the testimony of an employee of the New Jersey branch of the same company. In contrast, in the instant case, the business records of one entity, Southern Pacific, were introduced through the testimony of an employee of a second entity, Economy. This is obviously distinguishable from the single entity involved in Olivo.

We are not called upon here to determine whether the reasoning employed by the other circuits in deciding the above cases is sound. It is sufficient to note that none of the above cases provides a basis for holding that Economy's bookkeeper satisfied 803(6)'s requirement that business records be supported by the testimony of the custodian of records or other qualified witness. In the cases cited by the NLRB, the businesses in whose files the records were located had a substantial interest in the accuracy of the portion of the records at issue. In contrast, Economy was indifferent as to the origin of this lumber, and had not interest in the accuracy of that portion of the freight bill.[6]

Economy's bookkeeper is not the custodian of records or other qualified witness, as required by 803(6). Southern Pacific's records are inadmissible hearsay. Thus, the jurisdictional requirement of interstate commerce has not been established. We must deny enforcement of the NLRB's order.

[6] The Ninth Circuit has not before had occasion to interpret the need under Rule 803(6) to have as a witness an employee of the business that made the records. Under the old Business Records Act (28 U.S.C. § 1732 (1958)) (superseded), this Court discussed the exclusion of certain documents as not being business records within the meaning of the old business records exception. This Court stated that the records "were not made in the regular course of the business of the company in whose files they were found—a showing which must be made to give application to the Business Records Act", and thus noted that the documents were excludable. Phillips v. United States, 356 F.2d 297, 307 (9th Cir. 1965), cert. denied, sub nom. Walker v. United States, 384 U.S. 952, 86 S.Ct. 1573, 16 L.Ed.2d 548 (1966). The continued validity of the Phillips rationale under Rule 803(6) is unclear.

Termite further contends that enforcement of the NLRB's order must be denied because the "retail enterprise" standard was improperly applied and because it has already offered reinstatement to the employees in question. Our refusal to order enforcement on the jurisdiction question renders these issues moot.

NLRB v. Southern California Edison Company

646 F.2d 1352 (9th Cir.), June 1, 1981—243 NLRB 372

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before MARKEY,* Chief Judge, WALLACE and SKOPIL, Circuit Judges

SKOPIL, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board ("the Board") seeks enforcement of its order, 243 NLRB No. 62 (1979), holding that Southern California Edison Company ("SCE") violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act ("the Act"), 29 U.S.C. §§ 151 et seq., by threatening to discipline employees who honored a lawful picket line established by another union representing SCE employees, and by disciplining an employee who refused to cross a lawful picket line at a customer's place of business. The Board rejected SCE's primary defense that the union waived the employees' right to engage in sympathy strikes by accepting a no-strike pledge in the collective bargaining agreement.

We must decide whether the Board's interpretation of the Act to protect employees who refuse to cross lawful picket lines is reasonably defensible. If such action is protected, we must determine whether the Board permissibly concluded that the protection was not waived by the parties' collective bargaining contract. If the protection was not waived, we must examine the Board's finding that SCE did not have legitimate business justifications for its actions.

FACTS

SCE is a public utility engaged in transmitting and selling electric power in California and Nevada. It serves millions of customers including several hundred thousand commercial and industrial establishments.

At the time of the alleged violations, SCE employed 13,318 people. The intervenor in this case, Local 47, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers ("IBEW" or "the union") represented 6,754 employees. Local 246, Utility Workers Union of America ("UWUA") represented 1,265. SCE has had successive collective bargaining agreements with IBEW since 1945, and with UWUA since 1947.

ARTICLE II

CONTINUITY OF SERVICE TO THE PUBLIC

A. It is agreed that there shall be no strike, slowdown, or lockout until all methods provided for the settlement of disputes in this agreement have been fully utilized, and further, that the parties shall have exhausted the remedies provided under the Labor-Management Relations Act.

Following a strike by IBEW in 1953, the union and SCE entered into a strike settlement agreement that provided inter alia:

The Company is a public service agency charged under the laws of the United States of America, of the State of Nevada and of the State of California with the duty of maintaining electric service under public regulations of its activities and of its rates. The Company is engaged in a public service requiring continuous operation, and the recognition of such obligation of continuous service during the term of this Agreement is imposed upon both the Company and the Union. The Preamble because part of the collective bargaining agreement. The agreement has remained materially unchanged and was in effect at the time of the alleged unfair labor practices.

B. Unsuccessful Union Bargaining Proposals.

During the 1947 contract negotiations the union unsuccessfully proposed that the following be added to Article II, paragraph B:

> B. Employees covered by this agreement shall not be required to pass picket lines in the performance of their duties.

During the 1970 contract negotiations, the Union proposed that the following paragraph be added to Article I:

> No employee shall be required to cross a picket line that is sanctioned by the AFL-CIO Central Labor Council. Employees who exercise their right not to cross a picket line may be assigned to other work. SCE opposed the change on the ground that it would interfere with its continuous service commitment imposed by various regulatory agencies. SCE noted that it had been able to work out picket line problems with the union. The union withdrew the proposal.

In 1972 the union again sought to add a provision to Article I that "no employee shall be required to cross a picket line that is sanctioned by the AFL-CIO Central Labor Council". The union acknowledged SCE's prior cooperation, but expressed concern over instances where supervisors forced unwilling employees to cross picket lines. SCE again cited the obligation imposed on it by regulatory agencies. Discussion moved to other proposals. The union did not submit line clauses in later negotiations.

C. Picket Line Grievance History.

Over the last 20 years SCE has required employees to cross picket lines under threat of discharge. In some instances SCE has made accommodations by rescheduling, deferring, or reassigning work, or obtaining permission to cross from the striking union. SCE apparently did not require its employees to cross a picket line when there was a threat of physical harm.

The union has filed grievances over the company's forcing employees to cross picket lines of stranger unions. Two were filed in 1969. Both were denied. SCE did not rely on the no-strike clause. The union dropped both grievances short of arbitration.

Seven such grievances were filed in 1971. In each instance, employees unwillingly crossed picket lines to perform work. SCE denied six, alleging that "timely installation" was necessary to the customer. SCE denied the other grievance on the ground that contractual and legal obligations precluded delay in the work. SCE did not rely on the no-strike clause. The union did not pursue the grievances to arbitration.

Two such grievances were filed in 1978. They led to the disputes in this case and are detailed below. For the first time SCE relied on the no-strike clause to deny the grievances.

D. The 1978 UWUA Strike.

In 1978, in anticipation of a strike by UWUA, IBEW claimed that the Act gives employees the right to honor a lawful picket line, and that the right was reaffirmed by Article I, paragraph B of the collective bargaining agreement. SCE notified the union that it strongly disagreed. It stated in part that "refusal to cross a picket line not only would directly violate [Article II] of the Contract, but could lead to disciplinary action in addition to temporary or permanent replacement." It issued supervisors' instructions to read to nonstriking employees, which warned that "[r]efusal to cross [the picket line] could lead to disciplinary action and could also lead to your permanent replacement * * *." The union notified its members that it could not tell them whether to cross, but would support the individual's decision.

One IBEW member filed a grievance after the UWUA strike ended, alleging that he was forced to cross the picket line under threat of disciplinary actin. The union relied on Article I, paragraph B in support of the grievance. SCE denied the grievance, relying on the no-strike provision.

E. The Blum Suspension.

Gary Blum has been employed by SCE since 1969. At the time of the alleged unfair labor practice, he was a polyphase testman represented by IBEW. His duties included testing and servicing SCE wiring and installing meters in the field and on customer premises.

On May 4, 1977 Blum was assigned to service a malfunctioning polyphase meter and to change a magnetic tape recorder cartridge on the premises of Freightliner Corporation. The tape records data for SCE to measure power load to satisfy a time-of-day power study ordered by the California Public Utilities Commission. The data is solely for SCE's experimental use and does not benefit Freightliner. The cartridge contains enough tape for 33 days. It had been operating for 30 days.

At the beginning of the May 4 shift, Blum notified his supervisor that he was unwilling to cross a picket line at Freightliner. Blum noted that another SCE employee was willing to cross the picket line and perform the duties. The supervisor met Blum later that morning. Blum again refused to cross the picket line. He completed his other assignment. The supervisor arranged with Freightliner personnel for Blum to cross the picket line. Later that day Blum was informed of the arrangement and that other SCE employees had crossed the line without incident. Blum said he had never crossed a union picket line and again refused to do so. The supervisor told Blum that there were no other work assignments for him and that he could go home.

Blum attempted to contact his union representative. The supervisor asked Blum to decide immediately whether or not to cross the picket line so that a replacement worker could be assigned. Blum refused to cross, left work and for the remainder of that day and the next was considered absent without pay. Another employee was assigned Blum's responsibilities at Freightliner. The work was completed without incident.

On May 5, Blum sent the following telegram to SCE:

> I was available yesterday, and I continue to be available to perform all duties which do not require crossing a picket line. I will perform duties at location [sic] where a picket line exists if I do not have to cross that line. Please advise me when I should report for work.

On May 8, Blum met with various supervisors and with a union representative to discuss the situation. SCE suspended Blum for five working days under a policy providing for suspension when an employee refuses to perform regularly assigned duties.

Blum filed a grievance alleging that SCE violated Article I, paragraph B of the bargaining agreement. SCE denied the grievance on the basis of the no-strike clause.

PROCEEDINGS BELOW

The General Counsel charged that SCE violated section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with disciplinary action if they refused to cross the UWUA picket line and sections 8(a)(1) and (3) by suspending Blum. The charges were consolidated and heard by an Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ").

The ALJ rejected SCE's arguments that the matter should be deferred to the grievance-arbitration procedure and that the union had waived the employees' right to honor stranger picket lines.

With some modifications the Board adopted the ALJ's findings. The Board directed SCE to cease and desist from unfair labor practices and from interfering with its employees' statutory rights. Affirmatively, the order required SCE to expunge its records of reference to Blum's refusal to work, to make Blum whole for lost wages, and to post appropriate notices.

ISSUES

(1) Whether the Board properly concluded that employees have a statutory right to honor picket lines.

(2) Whether the Board permissibly concluded that the union did not waive employees' rights to honor stranger picket lines at the employer's place of business or at a customer's place of business.

(3) Whether the Board permissibly concluded that SCE did not have a proper business necessity defense to justify either the threatened discipline or the suspension of Blum.

STANDARDS OF REVIEW

We must enforce the Board's order if the Board correctly applied the law and if its findings of fact are supported by substantial evidence in the record viewed as a whole. E.g., Los Angeles Marine Hardware Co. v. NLRB, 602 F.2d 1302, 1305 (9th Cir. 1979). The Board's interpretation of the Act is subject to judicial review, but must be upheld if reasonably defensible. Ford Motor Co. v. NLRB, 441 U.S. 488, 497, 99 S.Ct. 1842, 1849, 60 L.Ed.2d 420 (1979); NLRB v. Iron Workers, 434 U.S. 335, 350, 98 S.Ct. 651, 660, 54 L.Ed.2d 586 (1978).

The Board's responsibility may require it to interpret contract terms to enforce the Act. NLRB v. C & C Plywood Corp., 385 U.S. 421, 428–29, 87 S.Ct. 559, 563–64, 17 L.Ed.2d 486 (1967). If the Board's interpretation is reasonable and not inconsistent with the Act's policies, it is entitled to deference from the courts. E.g., NLRB v. Gould, Inc., 638 F.2d 159, 164 (10th Cir. 1980); W–I Canteen Service, Inc., v. NLRB, 606 F.2d 738, 747 (7th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. C.K. Smith, 569 F.2d 162, 167 (1st Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 957, 98 S.Ct. 3070, 57 L.Ed.2d 1122 (1978); News Union of Baltimore v. NLRB, 393 F.2d 673, 678 (D.C.Cir.1968).

DISCUSSION

I. Protected Activity.

Section 7 of the Act provides that employees "shall have the right to * * * assist labor organizations, * * * and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 157. Section 8(a)(1) makes it an unfair labor practice to "interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in [section 7]." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

A. Honoring the UWUA Picket Line.

It is undisputed that the right to strike is protected by section 7. E.g., NLRB v. Allis-Chambers Mfg. Co., 388 U.S. 175, 181, 87 S.Ct. 2001, 2007, 18 L.Ed.2d 1123 (1967); NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp.,

1363

373 U.S. 221, 233, 83 S.Ct. 1139, 1148, 10 L.Ed.2d 308(1965). It is also undisputed that section 7 protects employees who engage in sympathy strikes in support of a lawful primary strike by a sister union of the same employer.[1] E.g., Delaware Coca-Cola Bottling Co. v. General Teamster Local 326, 624 F.2d 1182 (3d Cir. 1980); W–I Canteen Service, Inc. supra, 606 F.2d 738. Hence, the members of IBEW employed by SEC had the right to honor the UWUA picket line.

B. Honoring the Freightliner Picket Line.

SCE challenges the Board's extension of protection to Blum's refusal to cross a lawful picket line to perform assigned work at a customer's place of business. SCE contends that such employees lack a direct economic interest in the primary dispute and therefore may lack the necessary "mutuality." See C.K Smith & Co., supra, 569 F.2d at 165 n.1. SCE argues that Blum's refusal to cross the Freightliner picket line was not protected by section 7 because there was no mutuality of purpose or aid, since the refusal did not affect Freightliner. The ALJ found that the tape which Blum was assigned to change was solely for the experimental use of SCE and did not assist Freightliner in the performance of its operations. The ALJ did not mention any benefit to Freightliner from Blum's other duty of servicing a malfunctioning polyphase meter.

The Board has interpreted the Act to protect employees who honor a picket line at a customer's place of business. E.g., Redwing Carriers, Inc., 137 NLRB 1545 (1962), mod'g 130 NLRB 1208 (1961), enf'd sub nom. Teamsters Local 79 v. NLRB, 325 F.2d 1011 (D.C.Cir.1963), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 905, 84 S.Ct. 1165, 12 L.Ed.2d 176 (1964). The Board has concluded that whether the employees' refusal to cross constituted an economic detriment to the struck employer is not determinative of whether the refusal is protected. Other appellate courts have upheld the board's position. E.g., NLRB v. Alamo express, Inc., 430 F.2d 1032 (5th cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 1021, 91 S.Ct. 584, 27 L.Ed.2d 633 (1970); Teamsters Local 657 v. NLRB, 429 F.2d 204 (D.C.Cir.1970); NLRB v. Rockaway News Supply Co., 197 F.2d 111 (2d Cir. 1951), aff'd on other grounds, 345 U.S. 71, 73 S.Ct. 519, 97 L.Ed. 832 (1953). This circuit has not decided the question.[2] [1] This point is not determined by the proviso to section 8(b)(4) which states: "[N]othing [herein] shall be construed to make unlawful a refusal by any person to enter upon the premises of any employer (other than his own employer) if the employees of such employer are engaged in a [lawful] strike * * *." 29 U.S.C. §158(b)(4). That such activity is not unlawful does not necessarily mean that it is protected. The proviso appears to allow parties to a collective bargaining agreement to decide whether to protect such activity. NLRB v. Rockaway News Supply Co., 345 U.S. 71, 80, 73 S.Ct. 519, 524, 97 L.Ed. 832 (1953). See, e.g., Kellogg Co. v. NLRB, 457 F.2d 519, 523 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 850, 93 S.Ct. 58, 34 L.Ed.2d 92 (1972). But see Rockaway News Supply Co., supra, 345 U.S. at 81–82, 73 S.Ct. at 525 (Black, J., dissenting); Truck Drivers Local 413 v. NLRB, 334 F.2d 539 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 916, 85 S.Ct. 264, 13 L.Ed.2d 186 (1964) (picket line clause protects employees who refuse to cross a lawful picket line at the premises of another employer). No definitive interpretation of the proviso has been advanced. See Axelrod, The Statutory Right to Respect a Picket Line, 83 Dick.L.Rev. 617, 627–29 (1979).

An integral part of any strike is persuading other employees to withhold their services and join in making the strike more effective. "It cannot be denied that respect for the integrity of the picket line may well be the source of strength of the whole collective bargaining process in which every union member has a legitimate and protected economic interest." NLRB v. Union Carbide Corp., 440 F.2d 54, 56 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 826, 92 S.Ct. 96, 30 L.Ed.2d 55 (1971). Employees who honor a primary picket line in effect join the strike. NLRB v. West Coast Casket Co., 205 F.2d 902, 908 (9th Cir. 1953). Such activity is assistance to a labor organization for "mutual aid or protection." The sympathetic strikers "know that by their action each one of them assures himself * * * of the support of the one whom they are then helping; and the solidarity so established is 'mutual aid' in the most literal sense." Houston Insulation Contractors Ass'n v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 644, 668–69, 87 S.Ct. 1278, 1280–81, 18 L.Ed.2d 389 (1967). Although reciprocity may be indirect, respect for another union's picket line leads to a stronger labor movement. See Peter Cailler Kohler Swiss Chocolates Co., Inc. v. NLRB, 130 F.2d 503, 505–06 (2d Cir. 1942).

Activities for "mutual aid or protection" within the meaning of section 7 are not limited to those within the employer-employee relationship or those aimed at changing terms and conditions of employment. Section 7 protects employees' concerted lobbying for changes in national policy regarding job security. Kaiser Engineers v. NLRB, 538 F.2d 1379, 1384–85 (9th Cir. 1976).

The Act protects employees who "engage in otherwise proper concerted activities in support of employees of employers other than their own." Eastex, Inc. v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 556, 564, 98 S.Ct. 2505, 2511, 57 L.Ed.2d 428 (1978) (footnote omitted). At some point, however, "the relationship [to employee interests] becomes so attenuated that an activity cannot fairly be deemed to come within the 'mutual aid or protection' clause." Id. at 568, 98 S.Ct. at 2513. It is the Board's responsibility in the first instance to decide whether such activity is protected. Id., Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 798, 65 S.Ct. 982, 985, 89 L.Ed. 1372 (1945).

The Board's interpretation of the Act to protect an employee who honors a lawful picket line at a customer's place of business is reasonably defensible. Ford Motor Co., supra, 441 U.S. at 497, 99 S.Ct. at 1849. We must uphold the Board's determination that Blum's refusal to cross the Freightliner picket line was protected activity.

II. Waiver

SCE contends that the union waived, by collective bargaining, the employees' right to engage in sympathy strikes. A waiver would preclude an unfair labor practice finding, since SCE has the right to discipline employees who violate the contract. SCE relies on the no-strike provision, the Preamble, and the parties' collective bargaining and grievance histories. We must determine whether the Board's interpretation of the contract is permissible.

The right to strike may be waived by the collective bargaining agreement. Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 76 S.Ct. 349, 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956). The right to engage in sympathy strikes may also be waived. NLRB v. Rockaway News Supply Co., 345 U.S. 71, 80, 73 S.Ct. 519, 524, 97 L.Ed. 832 (1953). See also Delaware Coca-Cola Bot-

[2] In NLRB v. Swain & Morris Construction Co., 431 F.2d 861 (9th Cir. 1970), this court assumed, without deciding, that an employee's refusal to cross a picket line at an employer other than his own is protected activity. The employer did not argue below that the refusal to cross was unprotected, and the court declined to address it for the first time on appeal.

tling Co., supra, 624 F.2d at 1184; W–I Canteen Service, Inc., supra, 606 F.2d at 743.

The Board requires that a waiver must generally be "clear and unmistakable".[3] See, e. g., Delaware Coca-Cola Bottling Co., supra; C. K. Smith & Co, supra, 569 F.2d at 162. Waiver may be found in unequivocal extrinsic evidence bearing on ambiguous contract language. Operating Engineers, Local 18 (Davis-McKee, Inc.), 238 NLRB 58 (1978). Alternatively, a waiver may be implied by a binding arbitration clause. Even in the case of an express no-strike clause, the waiver of the right to strike is generally coterminous with the scope of the arbitration clause. See Garry-Hobart Water Corp.

v. NLRB, 511 F.2d 284 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 925, 96 S.Ct. 269, 46 L.Ed.2d 252 (1975). The Board found no clear and unmistakable waiver, notwithstanding the union's unsuccessful contract proposals expressly recognizing the right to engage in sympathy activity. It determined that the no-strike provision of the contract was implicitly tied to the arbitration clause and therefore limited to arbitrable disputes.

To determine whether the union has waived the right to engage in sympathy strikes the Board analyzes the language of the collective bargaining agreement and the factual circumstances of the labor controversy.[4] See W–I Canteen Service, supra, 606 F.2d at 743; Iowa Beef Processors v. Amalgamated Meat Cutters, 597 F.2d 1138, 1144 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 840, 100 S.Ct. 79, 62 L.Ed.2d 52 (1979). The Board views the contract as a whole and in light of the law relating to it when last ratified prior to the incidents at issue. Mastro Plastics Corp., supra, 350 U.S. at 279, 76 S.Ct. at 356.

A. Clear and Unmistakable Waiver in the Contract.

A contract need not explicitly prohibit sympathy strikes to show intent to waive the right to engage in such activity. E. g., Delaware Coca-Cola Bottling Co., supra, 624 F.2d at 1185 n.1; W–I Canteen Service, supra, 606 F.2d at 745. We must review the Board's construction of the contract as a whole and of the surrounding evidence of the parties' intent.

The contract's broad prohibition on the right to strike is not necessarily a clear and unmistakable waiver of the right to engage in sympathy strikes. E. g., Delaware Coca-Cola Bottling Co., supra at 1185; C. K. Smith & Co., supra, 569 F.2d at 167. Broad no-strike clauses coupled with other indicia of intent to waive the right to engage in sympathy strikes have been held to be an effective waiver. E. g., W–I Canteen Service, Inc., supra; Montana-Dakota Utilities Co. v. NLRB, 455 F.2d 1088 (8th Cir. 1972). The contract does not mention sympathy strikes, nor does it contain a picket line clause. See, W–I Canteen Service, supra; Iowa Beef Processors, supra, 597 F.2d at 1144 (contracts containing picket line clauses).

1. Preamble

Article II, containing the broad no-strike provision, is entitled "Continuity of Service to the Public". The Preamble acknowledges SCE's role as a public utility required to render continuous service. SCE contends that the Preamble and the no-strike clause together constitute the necessary clear and unmistakable waiver of the right to engage in sympathy strikes. The Board found otherwise.

The parties' acknowledgement of SCE's role and obligation as a public utility does not necessarily constitute a waiver of section 7 rights. Section 7 applies to public utilities. 93 Cong.Rec. 3835 (1947); Division 1287, Amalgamated Association of Street, Electric Railway & Motor Coach Employee v. Missouri, 374 U.S. 74, 82, 83 S.Ct. 1657, 1662, 10 L.Ed.2d 763 (1963). The Board's conclusion that the Preamble and the no-strike provision do not together constitute a clear and unmistakable waiver of the right to engage in sympathy strikes is reasonable and not inconsistent with the Act's policies. We must uphold it.[5] [3] This requirement originally applied to waivers of the right to strike over unfiar labor practices, e. g., Mastro Plastics Corp., supra, 350 U.S. 270, 76 S.Ct. 349, 100 L.Ed. 309, but has since been applied to sympathy activity.

[4] The parties dispute the propriety of using extrinsic evidence to interpret the contract provisions. The ALJ found sufficient ambiguity to resort to collateral evidence. See News Union of Baltimore, supra, 393 F.2d at 678.

[5] Amcar Div., ACF Indus. v. NLRB, 641 F.2d 561, 106 LRRM 2518 (8th Cir. 1981) and Montana-Dakota Util. Co., supra, 455 F.2d 1088 are distinguishable. In the former, the court held, without considering the standard of review, that the contract waived the right to honor a stranger picket line. In that case, there was a broad no-strike clause, and strong evidence that the union believed that the contract waived the right. 106 LRRM at 2523–24. See also St. Regis Paper Co., 253 NLRB No. 162, 106 LRRM 1207 (Jan. 9, 1981). In Montana-Dakota, the court also held that the right to honor a stranger picket line was waived. The contract in that

2. Bargaining History

SCE contends that the union, in attempting to insert a picket line clause, sought more then confirmation of the right to engage in sympathy strikes. SCE argues that these attempts show that the union understood the right to have been waived, and sought to regain it.

A union does not necessarily waive a right by failing to negotiate a contractural confirmation. Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. NLRB, 325 F.2d 746, 750–51 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 376 U.S. 971, 84 S.Ct. 1135, 12 L.Ed2d 85 (1964). Silence in the bargaining agreement cannot be considered to be a waiver even in light of the bargaining history. Id. at 751. The failure to obtain a contractual confirmation of a right is evidence of wavier, e. g., Rockaway News Suply Co., supra, 345 U.S. at 80, 73 S.Ct. at 524, only if it shows that the union thought the right had been waived by other provisions of the contract and sought to regain the right. See, e. g., W-I Canteen Service, Inc., supra, 606 F.2d at 745 (picket line clause delineated the boundaries of the waiver expressed in the no-strike clause).

The Board adopted the findings of the ALJ that the union's failure to obtain contractual recognition of the right did not constitute a waiver. The ALJ concluded that the proposed picket line clause was never linked with the no-strike provision so as to modify the no-strike obligation. She found that SCE never suggested in the negotiations that a refusal to cross a picket line was prohibited by the no-strike clause.

The union stated that the proposed picket line clause was intended to clarify its rights and to end the possibility of confusion among supervisors as to crossing picket lines. The Board concluded that the union was not seeking to regain rights it believed were waived. It held that the union's attempt to amend the collective bargaining agreement was not unequivocal evidence of waiver. Because the Board's conclusion is reasonable and not inconsistent with the Act's policies, we must uphold it.[6]

3. Other Indicia of Waiver

SCE argues that four other factors show a waiver: (1) the statement in the parties' 1953 strike settlement agreement that their mutual service obligation "is of the essence of the contract of employment * * *"; (2) the management prerogatives clause expressly reserving SCE's right to discipline employees; (3) the company's practice of requiring employees to cross picket lines to perform essential services; and (4) the grievance history, showing that SCE consistently denied grievances by employees threatened with discharge for refusing to cross a picket line.

When viewed in light of the parties' bargaining, grievance, and strike histories, these factors support an inference that the union waived the right to engage in sympathy strikes.[7] This inference is insufficient, however, to overcome the deference due the Board's interpretation of collective bargaining agreements, Gould, Inc., supra, 638 F.2d at 164; C. K. Smith & Co., supra 569 F.2d at 167; Newspaper Production Co. v. NLRB, 503 F.2d 821, 830 (5th Cir. 1974). Deference is due the Board's interpretation of labor contracts because such contracts are different in nature and scope from ordinary commercial contracts. The labor contract is closely bound up with labor-management experience, as well as with the negotiating traditions of the industry and the particular parties. See Syufy Enterprises v. Northern California State Ass'n of IATSE Locals, 631 F.2d 124, 125–26 (9th Cir. 1980). As such, labor contract interpretation falls within the area of the Board's special expertise. In comparing the inferences suggested by SCE with the required deference due the Board, we conclude the inferences are insufficient in this case of overcome the required deference.

B. Waiver by Operation of the Arbitration Clause.

1. No-strike and Abritation Clauses: Coterminous Application case contained an express picket line clause, and the obligation to provide continuous service was expressly tied to the no-strike clause. None of these factors are present in the instant case.

[6] We decline to address the General Counsel's argument that the scope of the picket line clause proposed by the union went beyond a mere contractual confimation of a statutory right. There is no indication that the Board relied on this theory in rejecting SCE's argument that the union's failure to gain express recognition was a waiver.

[7] We reject the General Counsel's suggestion that the no-strike language addressed only only union-sponsored activity and left individual employees free to engage in strike activity. See Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co. supra 388 U.S. at 180, 87 S.Ct. at 2006 (1967); Kellogg Co., supra, 457 F.2d at 523–24 (waiver of the right to honor strange picket lines binds all members of the bargaining unit).

SCE correctly contends that the right to engage in sympathy strikes may be waived by operation of an arbitration clause. An express or implied no-strike obligation is the quid pro quo for an employer's undertaking to submit grievance disputes to arbitration. Boys Markets, Inc., v. Retail Clerks Local 770, 398 U.S. 235, 248, 90 S.Ct. 1583, 1591, 26 L.Ed.2d 199 (1970).

Absent explicit expression to the contrary, the agreement to arbitrate and the obligation not to strike are coterminous. Gateway Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 414 U.S. 368, 382, 94 S.Ct. 629, 638, 38 L.Ed.2d 583 (1974). The no-strike obligation is limited to disputes over arbitrable issues. E. g., Gould Inc., supra, 638 F.2d at 164–65; Delaware Coca-Cola Bottling Co., supra, 624 F.2d at 1187. A sympathy striker's refusal to cross a stranger picket line does not violate a general no-strike clause. Because the underlying dispute is between a secondary employer and its union, the dispute is not subject to the abritration provisions of the sympathetic striker's collective bargaining agreement.[8] E. g., Gary-Hobart Water Corp., 511 F.2d at 288.

In the instant case, the parties negotiated a broad no-strike clause. The arbitration clause provides that only "grievances involving the interpretation or application of this Agreement may be submitted to abritration." The Board concluded from this evidence that the clauses were coextensive. The arbitration clause did not prohibit Blum's sympathy strike because the underlying dispute at Freightliner was not arbitrable.

SEC argues that the no-strike clause is broader than the arbitration clause because the former expressly requires exhaustion of legal remedies under the Act. The ALJ concluded that the effect of this provision is unclear.

The provision is ambiguous. It could be interpreted to prohibit strikes until legal remedies provided by the Act are exhausted. Alternatively, the provision may simply commit employees to seek judicial assistance where the company refused to arbitrate or to comply with an arbitral award. The Board concluded that the provision did not reveal a clear intent to create a functionally independent no-strike clause. Because the Board's conclusion is reasonable and not inconsistent with the Act's policies, we must uphold it.

2. Arbitrability of the Scope of the Arbitration Clause.

Even assuming coterminous application, SCE argues that Blum was obligated not to strike until the scope of the arbitration clause was arbitrated. SCE contends that whether a sympathy strike violated the agreement was itself arbitrable. The collective bargaining agreement specifies that the scope of the arbitration clause is itself arbitrable.

The applicability of a no-strike clause to a sympathy strike is subject to arbitration. Yet the arbitrability of the scope of a no-strike clause must be distinguished from the arbitrability of the underlying dispute. The dispute underlying a primary strike is not arbitrable between the sympathy strikers and their employer. A sympathy strike can not, therefore, be enjoined pending arbitration of the scope of a no-strike clause. An agreement to arbitrate disputes does not necessarily imply a promise to refrain from sympathy strikes pending arbitration. Buffalo Forge Co. v. United Steelworkers, 428 U.S. 397, 407–08 & n.10, 96 S.Ct. 3141, 3147–48 & n.10 49 L.Ed.2d 1022 (1976).

The Board did not infer from the no-strike and arbitration clause, and the parties' bargaining and grievance history, that the union waived the right to engage in sympathetic activity. Given the deference due the Board's interpretation of a collective bargaining agreement and the surrounding circumstances, we cannot overturn the Board's decision.

III. Business Justification

Employee's right to engage in protected activity must be balanced against the employer's legitimate and substantial business interests. E.g., Overnite Transportation Co., 154 NLRB 1271 (1965), See generally NLRB v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., 389 U.S. 375, 378, 88 S.Ct. 543, 545, 19 L.Ed.2d 614 (1967); NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 33–34, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 1797–1798, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967). It is the primary responsibility of the Board "to strike the proper balance between the asserted business justifications and the invasion of employees rights in light of the Act and its policy." Great

---

[8] Parties to a collective bargaining agreement can create functionally independent no-strike and arbitration clauses. E. g., W–I Canteen Service, supra, 606 F.2d at 744. The evidence of such an intent here is insufficient to overcome the Board's finding to the contrary. In the absence of such evidence, the "quid pro quo theory underlying coterminous interpretation applies where there is an express no-strike clause in the contract" Delaware Coca-Cola Bottling Co., supra, 624 F.2d at 1186.

Dane Trailers, supra, 388 U.S. at 33–34, 87 S.Ct. at 1797–1798.

The employer has the right to attempt to run its business despite sympathy strike activity. It may treat an employee who honors a lawful picket line at its place of business as an economic striker, subject to permanent replacement. It need not articulate a legitimate business necessity for doing so. Gary-Hobart Water Corp., 210 NLRB 742 (1974), enf'd, 511 F.2d 284 (7th Cir. 1975). When the refusal to cross a stranger picket line results in only partial work stoppage, the employer must demonstrate a legitimate business justification for replacing an employee. Redwing Carriers, Inc., supra, 137 NLRB 1545.

A. Threats of Discipline.

The Board held that SCE's threat to replace employees who honored UWUA picket lines was lawful, but that SCE's threat to discipline such employee was not. SCE argues that its threat of discipline was lawful since it was not carried out.

The Act prohibits an employer from acting to intimidate and coerce employees not to engage in protected activities. E.g., NLRB v. Gulf-Wandes Corp., 595 F.2d 1074, 1080 (5th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Albion Corp., 593 F.2d 936, 939 (10th Cir. 1979); Swearingen Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 568 F.2d 458, 461 (5th Cir. 1978). Section 8(a)(1) protects employees who engage in lawful union activity from even the edle threat of retaliation. Albion Corp., supra, at 939. The Board's conclusion that SCE violated section 8(a)(1) by threatening to displine employees if they honored UWUA's picket line is a reasonably defensible interpretation of the Act, and must be unheld.

B. Blum's Replacement and Suspension.

In instances of partial work stoppage, the company may replace an employee only if it acts to preserve the efficient operations of its business. See Redwing Carriers, Inc., supra, 137 NLRB 1545. Once the employer had demonstrated a legitimate business reason, the burden shifts to the General Counsel to establish that the primary motivation for the employer's action was to penalize the employee for engaging in protected activity. See NLRB v. Swain & Morris Construction Co., 431 F.2d 861, 862 (9th Cir. 1970) See also NLRB v. William S. Carroll, Inc., 578 F.2d 1, 4 (1st Cir. 1978).

SCE argues that Blum's replacement and suspension were necessary to preserve the efficeint operation of the company. The Board found that the replacement and suspension had no legitimate business justification.

1. Replacement.

We are unable to find substantial evidence in the record supporting the Board's finding that SCE lacked a legitimate business justification for replacing Blum. There was evidence that the tape Blum was assigned to replace would shortly expire and that SCE had an important interest in the repair of the polyphase meter. Although the situation may not yet have become an emergency, SCE was allowed to replace Blum to maintain reasonable, normal business operations.

2. Suspension.

There is substantial evidence in the record supporting the Board's finding that no business necessity required SCE to treat Blum as absent without pay on May 5 and to suspend him the following week. There is evidence that SCE relied on the no-strike provision of the contract to justify the disciplinary action, rather than on business necessity.

CONCLUSION

Honoring a sister picket line at one's employer's place of business and respecting a picket line at a customer's location are activities protected by section 7 of the Act. Although the protection can be waived by contract, the language and evidence bearing on the parties' intent in this case are insufficient to overcome the deference due the Board's determination that there was no waiver. The Board's conclusion that SCE violated the Act by threatening to discipline employees who honored a sister union picket line is reasonably defensible. The Board's finding that SCE lacked a business justification for disciplining an employee for honoring a stranger picket line at a customer's place of business is supported by substantial evidence. There is not substantial evidence supporting the Board's finding that SCE violated the Act by replacing the employee who refused to cross a picket line to perform work on a customer's premises.

The Board's order will be enforced as modified.

MARKEY, United States Customs and Patent Judge, dissenting: Convinced that the inference of waiver is so inescapable as to overcome deference admittedly due broad interpretations, I respectfully dissent. See Amcar Division, ACF v. National Labor Relations Board, 641 F.2d 561 (8th Cir. 1981), 33 Daily Labor Report, D-1

Aeronca, Inc. v. NLRB

650 F.2d 501 (4th Cir.), June 4, 1981—253 NLRB 261

On petition to review Board Order

Before HAYNSWORTH, Senior Circuit Judge, ERVIN, Circuit Judge, and RAMSEY*, District Judge

HAYNSWORTH, Senior Circuit Judge: Aeronca, Inc. petitions for review and the Board cross-applies for enforcement of the Board's order and finding that the company violated § 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by unilaterally discontinuing its practice of giving its employees Christmas turkeys. Because we find that the union waived the company's duty to bargain about discontinuance of the turkey bonus, we deny enforcement of the Board's order.

Since at least 1952 the company had maintained a practice of giving each employee, including managers and supervisors, a Christmas turkey. The practice continued after the union was certified in 1974 as the exclusive bargaining representative of the company's production and maintenance employees.

The parties' first collective bargaining agreement included a broad zipper clause [1] and an arbitration clause.

At the beginning of negotiations for the 1976 collective bargaining agreement, the union submitted a 72-page contract proposal. The union proposed the addition of a maintenance-of-benefits provision [2] and a corresponding modification of the zipper clause. The company objected to the length of the proposal, and union representatives subsequently caucused to reduce its length. The turkey bonus was mentioned during that caucus, but the union decided to drop the maintenance-of-benefits provision because the employees had regularly received the turkeys. In the protracted negotiations that followed, the turkey bonus was never mentioned, and without discussion the zipper clause was carried over verbatim from the prior contract and the proposed maintenance-of-benefits provision was not included.

In December 1976 poor financial conditions prompted the company to institute a general austerity program. As part of that program, the company decided to discontinue the turkey bonus. When the employees were not given turkeys on Christmas 1977, the union filed a grievance. The company did not consider the turkey bonus a grievable matter, but submitted to arbitration when the union filed the present unfair labor practice charge and the Board's regional director informed the company that a complaint would issue if the company refused to arbitrate.

After a hearing the arbitrator denied the union's turkey bonus grievance. The Board then proceeded on the General Counsel's complaint. It concluded that the arbitrator's decision did not meet the standards of the Spielberg [3] doctrine and thus did not warrant deference. On the merits, the Board concluded that the union had not waived its right to bargain over the discontinuance of the turkey bonus.

[1] The parties acknowledge that during the negotiations which resulted in this agreement each had the unlimited right and opportunity to make demands and proposals with respect to any subject or matter not removed by law from the area of collective bargaining, and that the understandings and agreements arrived at by the parties after the exercise of that right and opportunity are set forth in this Agreement. Therefore, the Company and the Union, for the life of this Agreement, each voluntarily and unqualifiedly waives the right, and each agrees that the other shall not be obligated to bargain collectively with respect to any subject or matter referred to or covered in this Agreement, or with respect to any subject or matter not specifically referred to or covered in this Agreement, even though such subject or matter may not have been within the knowledge or contemplation of either or both of the parties at the time that they negotiated or signed this Agreement.

[2] The provision stated that "any and all benefits that the employees and/or Union are now receiving which are not specified in this Agreement shall continue during the term of this Agreement.

[3] Spielberg Manufacturing Co., ,112 NLRB 1080 (1955).

We need not decided whether the Board abused its discretion in declining to defer to the arbitrator's decision, because the Board's decision on the merits is inconsitent with our holding in NLRB v. Southern Materials Co., 447 F.2d 15 (4th Cir. 1971). It is sought to distinguish this case from Southern Materials and the relevant Board precedents[4] on the ground that Aeronca continued the Christmas turkey bonuses after having entered the first agreement with the union. We find this an insufficient basis for not following our earlier precedent. The first contract did not obligate the employer to give the Christmas turkeys, and the negotiations leading up to the second one clearly indicate a union abandonment of any attempt to make giving of the turkeys obligatory.

Enforcement of the Board's order is denied.

ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before VAN GRAAFEILAND and KEARSE, Circuit Judges, and BRAMWELL, District Judge*

137

VAN GRAAFEILAND, Circuit Judge: This is a petition to enforce an order of the NLRB which held that respondent, Ortiz Funeral Home Corp., had violated section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5) and (1), by:

> (1) refusing on and after March 28, 1978 to recognize and bargain with Local 1034, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (The Union), for new contract covering all unit employees;
> (2) failing to apply the previous contract to all unit employees between September 23, 1977 and its expiration on March 21, 1978, and by failing thereafter to continue to maintain the wages, hours, terms and conditions of employment established pursuant to that contract.

For reasons hereafter discussed, the petition for enforcement is granted.

Respondent operates a funeral business with ten chapels in the New York City metropolitan area. In 1975, following an organizational strike and unfair labor practice charges, an informal settlement agreement was reached between respondent and the Union and approved by the Board's regional Director. Pursuant to this agreement, respondent agreed to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following unit:

> (A)ttendants, floorpeople, receptionists, interpreters and porters but excluding licensed embalmers, undertakers, drivers, managers, office clerical employees, bookkeepers, guards, watchmen and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Thereafter, respondent and the Union could not agree whether employees whose duties included clerical work, driving, or guarding, in addition to receiving visitors, were properly included as "receptionists" in the bargaining unit. because of this dispute, respondent refused to sign a collective bargaining contract incorporating the unit definition contained in the settlement agreement until ordered to do so by the Board. See 225 NLRB 1342 (1976). The Board found that "the parties reached an oral binding agreement on all material aspects of a collective-bargaining contract" and that the arbitration clause of the agreement was designed to resolve any uncertainty as to membership in the bargaining unit. Id. at 1345. The Board concluded that the unit, described as above quoted, was an appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining, and held that respondent was guilty of an unfair labor practice for refusing to sign it. Id. this Court enforced the order without opinion on May 6, 1977, see 559 F.2d 1204 (2d Cir. 1977), following which a written contract, effective for a three-year period ending on March 21, 1978 was signed.[1]

---

*Of the Eastern District of New York, sitting by designation.

[1] The contract provided in part:

The contract contained provisions for a union shop, checkoff of union dues, and employer payments to welfare, severance and retirement funds. Respondent applied these provisions only on behalf of the small number of employees whom it considered to be in the bargaining unit. In August 1977, after conducting an audit of respondent's payroll records, the Union concluded that respondent was failing to make contributions as provided in the contract. Discussion on the issue proved fruitless, and the Union invoked the contractual arbitration process.

The arbitrator was asked to determine whether respondent had violated the contract by failing to maintain a checkoff of union dues and to make payments to welfare, severance and retirement funds on behalf of the employees whose membership in the Union was disputed. On November 10, 1978 the arbitrator ruled that the contract required respondent to make contributions on behalf of all the disputed employees except one "secretary-bookkeeper". On April 19, 1979 the New York State Supreme Court vacated the arbitrator's award on the ground that the arbitrator had exceeded his powers by reclassifying employees. The Appellate Division, First Department, reversed and reinstated the award. See Adelstein v. Ortiz Funeral Home Corp., 75 App. Div.2d 529, 426 N.Y.S.2d 768 (180). On February 17, 1981 the Court of Appeals affirmed without opinion. Adelstein v. Ortiz Funeral Home Corp., 52 N.Y.2d 997, 438 N.Y.S.2d 80, 419 N.E.2d 1079 (N.Y.1981).

While the arbitration under the old contract was pending, the parties met in March 1978 to discuss a new one. However, their continuing disagreement regarding the composition of the bargaining unit precluded any progress toward consummation of a contract. Respondent submitted a list of its employees with their purported job classifications, asserting that only three of them were unit employees. The Union stated that it represented approximately twenty employees on the list.

On March 23, 1978, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging that respondent refused to bargain for a new contract. The complaint issued by the Board on May 9, 1978 described the beginning unit as it was described in the expired contract and in the Board's 1976 order. It alleged that respondent had failed and refused to negotiate with the unit thus described for the new three-year contract until the Union produced proof that it was the majority representative of the employees in the unit.

Not content with the unit description contained in the contract, the Administrative Law Judge redefined the unit and ordered respondent to cease and desist from refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the representative of the following unit:

> All employees at Respondent's main office and facility and at it branch locations, including receptionists, receptionist-porters, office clerks, office managers and office clerk-drivers, but excluding licensed funeral directors, secretary-bookkeepers and drivers normally and regularly engaged in the performance of such functions, and excluding supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

The Administrative Law Judge said that he had revised the definition of the unit "to reflect the Company's most recent job classifications." He also stated:

> As the complaint alleges an unlawful refusal to bargain only since on or about March 28, 1978, I have not provided any remedy for the Company's failure to apply the terms of the expired contract to the unit employees.

Despite these statements by the Administrative Law Judge, the Board held that respondent's refusal to bargain on a new contract was simply a continuation of respondent's refusal to apply the expired collective-bargaining agreement "to those same employees." The Board found the respondent had violated section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to apply the expired contract to all unit employees between September 23, 1977[2] and the contract's expiration date, March 21, 1978, and by failing thereafter to continue to maintain the wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment es-

---

Excluded from the coverage of this Agreement are licensed embalmers, undertakers, drivers, managers, office clerical employees, bookkeepers, guards, watchman [sic] and supervisors as defined in the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 as amended, hereinafter referred to as the "Act."

[2] Because of limitations contained in section 10(b) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §160(b), the complaint of unfair labor practices is limited to the six-month period prior to the filing of the charge with the Board, which occurred in this case on March 23, 1978.

tablished pursuant to the contract. It ordered respondent to make the various payments to the employees and the Union which the terms of the contract required.

DISCUSSION

Our task in passing upon the Board's petition has not been lightened by the manner in which the Board itself has handled the lengthy dispute between the parties.

Although it was apparent at the time respondent and the Union entered into their 1976 settlement agreement that they disagreed sharply as to the makeup of the bargaining unit, the Board ordered them to execute a collective-bargaining contract with the dispute unsettled. The Board said that any uncertainty as to which employees were in the unit was a matter "which the contract's grievance-arbitration machinery is designed to resolve." Thereafter, the Union followed what it must have considered to be the Board's suggestion and demanded arbitration of the parties' differences arising out of the 1975–78 contract. Because negotiations for a new contract were entered into prior to the arbitrator's decision, the Union also filed an unfair labor practice charge which was based upon respondent's refusal to accede to the Union's definition of the unit and to bargain accordingly. The Administrative Law Judge confined his order to the charges made in the complaint. Instead of limiting it remedy in a similar manner, the Board went back to the expired contract and found respondent guilty of unfair labor practices arising out of respondent's allegedly erroneous interpretation of the unit membership provided for in that contract. Neither the Administrative Law Judge nor the Board deferred to the arbitration award.[3]

The Board found that "the issue of [sic] whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to apply the provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement before its expiration, and thereafter by failing to continue to maintain the wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment established pursuant to that agreement, was closely connected to the subject matter of the complaint and has been fully litigated." We disagree.

The original bargaining unit in this case was set up by agreement between the parties. As bargaining history, it was not conclusive upon the Board in determining what was an appropriate unit for subsequent contract negotiations. Westinghouse Electric Corp., 118 NLRB 1043, 1047 (1957). In making an independent determination of a proper bargaining unit, the Board may exercise reasonable discretion pursuant to section 9(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §159(b). See NLRB v. Sunrise Lumber & Trim Corp., 241 F.2d 620, 624 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 818, 78 S.Ct. 22, 2 L.Ed.2d 34 (1957); NLRB v. Libbey-Owens-Ford Glass Co., 241 F.2d 831, 834–36 (4th Cir. 1957).

With respect to the agreed-upon unit, however, the Board was not making an independent determination of unit membership; it was constructing a contract. NLRB v. Joclin Manufacturing Co., 314 F.2d 627, 633 (2d Cir. 1963). The question was one of contract interpretation that should have been governed by the intention of the parties. Tidewater Oil Co. v. NLRB, 358 F.2d 363, 365 (2d Cir. 1966); NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., 379 F.2d 172, 182 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 958, 88 S.Ct. 338, 19 L.Ed.2d 364 (1967). Although, in determining that intent, the Board was not confined to the four corners of the contract, International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers v. NLRB, 418 F.2d 1191, 1201 (D.C. Cir. 1969), the Board could not alter the unit that had been agreed upon and approved. Tidewater Oil Co. v. NLRB, supra, 358 F.2d at 365.

We have examined very carefully the opinions of the Administrative Law Judge and the Board and find no discussion whatever of the parties' intentions. The Administrative Law Judge treated the settlement agreement as the equivalent of a certification following a Board-conducted election, and followed general Board standards in determining unit composition. He informed counsel at the hearing that he was unwilling to "get into the negotiation that led up to the choice of the particular [contract] words" and stated in his decision that he had not taken into consideration the arbitration testimony of respondent's president concerning his version of the 1975 negotiations. The Board apparently accepted the reasoning of the Administrative Law Judge.

[3] At the time of the Board's decision, there was still uncertainty as to whether the New York Court of Appeals would affirm the Appellate Division's reinstatement of the arbitrator's award.

If the Board's order had to stand on its own merits, we would be inclined to deny enforcement and remand for a hearing on the issue of intent. However, with regard to this issue, there is one point on which there has never been any disagreement between the respondent and the Union. By the terms of their original settlement stipulation, they agreed to submit their disputes to arbitration. The parties clearly intended to be bound by the arbitrator's decision and have consistently expressed their willingness to be so bound. We need not decide whether, in view of the Board's 1976 order, it also should have deferred to the arbitrator's determination. See Douglas Aircraft Co. v. NLRB, 609 F.2d 352 (9th Cir. 1979). If the Board had done so, it would have complied with the parties' intentions and reached the same result that it did. We see no reason, therefore, to reject that result because we are troubled by the manner in which it was reached.

The Board's petition for enforcement of its order is granted.

NLRB v. Nevis Industries, Inc. d/b/a Fresno Townehouse

647 F.2d 905 (9th Cir.), June 8, 1981—246 NLRB 1053

On petition to review Board Order

Before SKOPIL and FARRIS, Circuit Judges, and BELLONI,* District Judge

907

SKOPIL, Circuit Judge: Nevis Industries, Inc. ("Nevis") petitions for review of a decision of the National Labor Relations Board ("the Board"), 246 NLRB No. 167, 103 LRRM 1035 (1979). The Board cross-applies for enforcement of its order.

FACTS

In April 1977 Nevis acquired the Fresno Townehouse hotel. Prior to the acquisition, the Townehouse's engineering employees were represented by Stationary Engineers, Local 39, ("Local 39"). The other service employees were represented by Motel Service Employees, Local 62 ("Local 62").

Nevis did not retain the engineers, including the supervisor, Brewer. Nevis refused to bargain with Local 39 regarding employment of the engineers. Nevis retained most of its other employees. It allegedly conditioned retention of one employee, Alford, on his resignation from Local 39. Nevis allegedly attempted to persuade the employees represented by Local 62 to withdraw from that union.

PROCEEDINGS BELOW

The Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") concluded that Nevis violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act ("the Act"), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), by attempting to convince its service employees to withdraw from Local 62, and by conditioning Alford's retention on resignation from Local 39. The ALJ held that Nevis violated section 8(a)(1) by refusing to retain Chief Engineer Brewer, and sections 8(a)(1) and (3) by refusing to retain the four engineers because they were members of Local 39. The ALJ held that Nevis violated section 8(a)(5) by refusing to bargain with Local 39.

The Board affirmed the ALJ's findings and conclusions. Two members of the Board dissented, and one member concurred specially, in the conclusion that Nevis violated section 8(a)(1) by refusing to retain Chief Engineer Brewer.

The Board issued a cease and desist order. It affirmatively directed Nevis to make the engineers whole for lost wages, to offer them immediate reinstatement, and to bargain with Local 39.

ISSUES

1. Does substantial evidence support the Board's finding that Nevis violated section 8(a)(1) by interfering with the rights of the employees it retained?
2. Did the Board apply the correct legal standard, and does substantial evidence support its finding that Nevis violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3) by refusing to retain the engineers because they were union members, and to avoid an obligation to bargain with Local 39?
3. Did the Board apply the correct legal standard in determining that Nevis violated section 8(a)(1) by refusing to retain Chief Engineer Brewer?

*The Honorable Robert C. Belloni, United States District Judge for the District of Oregon, sitting by designation.

908

4. Did the Board apply the correct legal standard, and does substantial evidence support its finding that Nevis violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) by refusing to bargain with Local 39?

DISCUSSION

I. Standard of Review.

We must enforce the Board's order if the Board correctly applied the law, and if the Board's findings of fact are supported by substantial evidence on the record viewed as a whole. E. g., NLRB v. Big Bear Supermarkets No. 3, No. 79-7100, ——— F.2d ———, at ——— (9th Cir.), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct 318, 66 L.Ed.2d 147 (1980). The Board's interpretation of the Act is entitled to considerable deference. Ford Motor Co. v. NLRB, 441 U.S. 488, 497, 99 S.Ct. 1842, 1849, 60 L.Ed.2d 420 (1979); NLRB v. International Harvester Co., 618 F.2d 85, 87 (9th Cir. 1980). The Board's findings must be enforced if supported by substantial evidence, even if this court might reach a different conclusion based on the same evidence. Stephens Institute v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 720, 726 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 358, 66 L.Ed.2d 217 (1980). This court must not limit its consideration to supporting evidence while excluding contradictory evidence. Stephenson v. NLRB, 614 F.2D 1210, 1214 (9th Cir. 1980).

II. Interference With Retained Employees.

The Board held that Nevis violated section 8(a)(1) by interfering with the section 7, 29 U.S.C. § 157, rights of the employees it retained.

A. The Service Employees

The Board found that Snider, the manager of the Townehouse, and a subordinate told the banquet waitresses that the Townehouse was going to be non-union. They promised greater benefits than the union had offered. After the takeover, Snider urged the maids to withdraw from Local 62, and threatened to discharge maids who joined Local 62's picket line. The Board held that these acts violated section 8(a)(1).

Nevis does not contest the Board's holding as to these acts. This constitutes a waiver. Riverside Press, Inc. v. NLRB, 415 F.2d 281, 284–85 (5th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 912, 90 S.Ct. 915, 25 L.Ed 2d 94 (1970).

B. The Retention of Alford

The Board found that Nevis conditioned retention of one employee, Alford, on his resignation from Local 39. Nevis contends that this finding is not supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. We disagree.

Snider encouraged Alford to resign from Local 39. He originally suggested that Alford resign, after checking with his lawyer as to its feasibility. Snider loaned Alford the company car to deliver his letter of resignation to Local 39.

Snider had, on other occasions, made statements consistent with conditioning retention on resignation from the Union. He told Alford at a later date that he would not hire any of the picketing engineers. He threatened the maids with discharge if they joined the strike by Local 62, and circulated a petition of resignation from Local 62, which the maids were to sign.

Snider denied that he conditioned Alford's retention on resignation from Local 39. The ALJ discredited his testimony. We will not overturn decisions as to credibility unless shown to be incorrect by a clear preponderance of the evidence. NLRB v. Max Factor & Co., No. 79-7118, ——— F.2d ——— at ——— (9th Cir. September 9, 1980); NLRB v. Inland Empire Meat Co., 611 F.2d 1235, 1238 (9th Cir. 1979).

There is substantial evidence on the record viewed as a whole supporting the finding that Nevis violated section 8(a)(1) by conditioning retention of Alford on his resignation from Local 39.

III. Refusal to Retain the Engineers.

The Board held that Nevis violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3) by refusing to retain the engineers because they were members of Local 39, and to avoid incurring a duty to bargain with the union. Nevis contends that the Board applied an incorrect legal standard in determining the motive underlying the decision not to retain the engineers, and that there is not substantial evidence supporting the finding of a unlawful motive.

A. The Standard Governing Unlawful Terminations

To establish an unfair labor practice, the General Counsel must show an unlawful motivation either to discourage union membership or to interfere with the exercise of protected rights. Ad Art, Inc. v. NLRB, 645 F.2d 669, at 678 nn.9–10 (9th Cir. 1980).

Where a discharge is motivated both by legitimate business considerations and protected activity, this court requires the General Counsel to show that the protected union activity was the dominant or moving cause behind the discharge. Ad Art, Inc., supra at 1285–86; L'Eggs Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 619 F.2d 1337, 1341–42 (9th Cir. 1980); Western Exterminator Co. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1114, 1118 (9th Cir. 1977). Other circuits have employed different standards. See Western Exterminator Co., supra at 1118 n.3 (citing cases); Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB No. 150, 105 LRRM 1169, 1170–72 (1980) (same).

The Board has recently changed the procedural requirements in mixed motivation cases. It held that the General Counsel has the initial burden of showing that protected conduct was "a motivating factor" in the decision to discharge an employee. The burden then shifts to the employer to show that it would have discharged the employee absent participation in protected activity. Wright Line, 105 LRRM at 1175.

The Board is not disqualified from altering its rules. When it does so, we must still review its decision for rationality and consistency with the Act, and not construe the statute de novo. NLRB v. Local 103, International Association of Iron Workers, 434 U.S. 335, 350–51, 98 S.Ct. 651, 660, 54 L.Ed.2d 586 (1978). See also Ford Motor Co., 441 U.S. at 497, 99 S.Ct. at 1849. The rule articulated by the Board in Wright Line is a reasonably defensible interpretation of the Act, and is entitled to acceptance by this court. Ford Motor Co., supra

The Wright Line rule is consistent with the legislative history of the Act, which reveals an intent to require the employer to show that an employee was discharged for cause. 93 Cong.Rec. 6678 (1947) (remarks of Sen. Taft), reprinted in 2 Legislative History of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, at 1595 (1947). See also NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 34, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 1797, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967). It is also consistent with the reality that the employer has the best access to proof of motivation. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., supra. The new rule strikes an acceptable balance between protection of employees' rights and preservation of employers' right to discharge employees for valid business reasons. See NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 229, 83 S.Ct. 1139, 1145, 10 L.Ed.2d 308 (1963).

B. The Finding of Unlawful Motivation

The Board found that the General Counsel carried its burden of showing that anti-union animus was a motivating factor in the decision not to retain the engineers. The Board found that Nevis failed to show that it would have acted as it did absent the protected conduct. Nevis contends that these findings are not supported by substantial evidence on the record viewed as a whole. We disagree.

There was credible testimony that Snider intended to fire enough employees to avoid incurring a duty to bargain. He discussed firing particular strong union members. Some of those individuals were not reemployed. At one meeting Snider stated that the hotel was to be non-union and that he was letting the entire engineering crew go.

Shortly after midnight on April 11, 1977, Snider abruptly told the engineers that they would not be allowed to work and that he was going to run a non-union operation. Snider claimed that he had a crew standing by to assume the engineers' duties. In fact, he had hired only one person, who was completely unfamiliar with the hotel's heating and air conditioning system. At the time of the dismissals, the air conditioning was malfunctioning, and the outside temperature was becoming quite hot. There was a great need for a least one experienced engineer to correct the malfunction in the air conditioning system. Snider did not discuss employment with any of the engineers.

Snider testified that he based his decision not to employ the engineers primarily on their poor work attitude. He had obtained unfavorable reports on two of them from the leasing agent and other unnamed persons, none of whom testified. Snider also testified that he had received good reports regarding the work of two of the engineers. Snider later added that watch engineers were unnecessary and were overpaid, but that he did not base his decision on those factors. He did not discuss wages with any of the engineers. He told one of them that he could not hire him because of "technicalities," which he was not a liberty to reveal.

The Board was justified in concluding that the justifications asserted by Snider were pretextual. Where the employers' asserted justification is shifting and unreliable, its case is weakened, and the conclusion that the true reason was for union activity is correspondingly strengthened. NLRB v. Superior Sales, Inc., 366 F.2d 229, 235 (8th Cir. 1966); NLRB v. Georgia Rug Mill, 308 F.2d 89, 91 (5th Cir. 1962)

IV. The Refusal to Retain Chief Engineer Brewer.

The Board held that Nevis violated section 8(a)(1) by refusing to retain Chief Engineer Brewer. Nevis contends that the Board applied an incorrect legal standard in reaching its conclusion.

The Act excludes supervisiors from the definition of "employee." 29 U.S.C. § 152(3). The Act does not protect supervisors who engage in activity which, if engaged in by a non-supervisory employee, would be protected. Florida Power & Light Co. v. IBEW, Local 641, 417 U.S. 790, 806–08, 94 S.Ct. 2737, 2745–46, 41 L.Ed.2d 477 (1974). An employer has the right to insist on the loyalty of its supervisors. Id.

There are limited exceptions to the rule that employer conduct towards supervisors does not violate the Act. These exceptions protect employees' right "to have the privileges secured by the Act vindicated through the administrative procedures of the Board." NLRB v. Southland Paint Co., 394 F.2d 717, 721 (5th Cir. 1968). The exceptions have been construed narrowly. NLRB V. Southern Plasma Corp., 626 F.2d 1287, 1294 (5th Cir. 1980).

Courts have found a violation of section 8(a)(1) and ordered reinstatement of supervisors in three basic situations. Southern Plasma Corp., supra at 1294–95. The first is where a supervisor is disciplined for refusing to commit an unfair labor practice. Belcher Towing Co. v. NLRB, 614 F.2d 88, 91–92 (5th Cir. 1980); Gerry's Cash Markets, Inc. v. NLRB, 602 F.2d 1021, 1022–23 (1st Cir. 1979); Russell Stover Candies, Inc. v. NLRB, 551 F.2d 204, 206–08 (8th Cir. 1977). The second is where a supervisor is disciplined for testifying before the Board. King Radio Corp. v. NLRB, 398 F.2d 14, 21–22 (10th Cir. 1968); Southland Paint Co., 394 F.2d at 721; Oil City Brass Works v. NLRB, 357 F.2d 466, 470–71 (5th Cir. 1966). The Third is where a supervisor who hired his own crew was descharged as a pretext for terminating his pro-union Crew. Pioneer Drilling Co. v. NLRB, 391 F.2d 961, 963 (10th Cir. 1968).

In these cases resintatement was ordered only to remedy harm done to rank and file employees. Berry Schools. v. NLRB, 627 F.2d 692, 698–99 (5th Cir. 1980). See also NLRB v. Local 962, Pulp & Paper Workers, 498 F.2d 26, 28–29 (9th Cir. 1974), enforced on petiton after remand, 510 F.2d 1364 (9th Cir. 1975). Reinstatement is not warranted merely because employees are put in fear of losing their jobs and thereby restrained from exercising their section 7 rights. Berry Schools, supra. But see King Radio Corp., 398 F.2d at 22 (dicta). No court has held that a series of terminations of both supervisors and employees, without more, justifies reinstatement of the supervisors.

In the instant case the Board ordered Nevis to reinstate Brewer because his discharge was motivated by a desire to stifle employees' exercise of section 7 rights and was part of an overall scheme to achieve that result. DRW Corp., 248 NLRB No. 95, 103 LRRM 1506, 1509 (1980); Production Stamping, Inc., 239 NLRB No. 176, 100 LRRM 1141 (1979). The Board claims that in such cases "employees cannot be expected to perceive the distinction between the employer's right to prohibit union activity among supervisors and their right to engage freely in such activity themselves." DRW Corp., 103 LRRM at 1508. Reinstatement of Brewer was required "to fully dissipate this coercive effect." Id.

Congress has expressly chosen not to protect pro-union activities of supervisors. Reinstating a supervisor whenever discipline might have a coercive effect on employees would tend to override the express will of Congress. E. g., Southern Plasma Corp., 626 F.2d at 1295 & n.8.

Reinstatement may be necessary where there is no other way to dissipate the coercive effect of an employer's actions. Discipline of a supervisor used as a conduit for disciplining employees might be such a case. See Pioneer Drilling Co., 391 F.2d at 963. In this case the coercive effect on employees can be eliminated by ordering reinstatement of the employees themselves.

Even granting considerable deference to the Board's interpretation of the Act, its order to reinstate Brewer is inconsistent with the statute.

V. The Requirement that Nevis Bargain with Local 39.

The Board presumed that Local 39 would have represented a majority of the engineers but for Nevis' unlawful refusal to retain them. See Kallman v. NLRB, 640 F.2d 1094 (9th Cir. 1981); K. B. & J. Young's Supermarkets, Inc. v. NLRB, 377 F.2d 463, 465 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 841, 88 S.Ct. 71, 19 L.Ed.2d 105 (1967); NLRB v. Houston Distribution Services, Inc., 573, F.2d 260, 267 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 1047, 99 S.Ct. 722, 58 L.Ed.2d 705 (1978). Nevis claims that the presumption was rebutted by evidence that the engineers would not have accepted jobs for the wages Nevis offered.

Had Nevis not unlawfully refused to retain the engineers, they would have comprised a majority of the bargaining unit. Nevis would have been required to bargain with their representative, Local 39. NLRB v. Burns International Security Service, 406 U.S. 272, 281, 92 S.Ct. 1571, 1579, 32 L.Ed.2d 61 (1972). See also Kallman, supra. Nevis would not have been bound to the terms of the prior collective bargaining agreement. It could negotiate for lower wages. Id. at 287–88, 92 S.Ct. at 1582. It could not unilaterally set lower wages. NLRB v. Edjo, Inc., 631 F.2d 604, 606–08 (9th Cir. 1980). The Board's order directs Nevis to bargain with Local 39 as Nevis would have been required, absent its unlawful refusal to retain the engineers.

CONCLUSION

Nevis does not contest that it committed unfair practices by interfering with the service employees it retained. There is substantial evidence on the record viewed as a whole supporting the Board's findings that Nevis conditioned Alford's retention on resignation from Local 39 and refused to retain the four engineers because of anti-union animus. The Board applied the wrong legal standard in holding that Nevis violated section 8(a)(1) by refusing to retain Supervisor Brewer. The Board did not err in ordering Nevis to bargain with Local 39.

The Board's order is ENFORCED except as to the refusal to retain Brewer. The petition for review is DENIED except as to Brewer.

NLRB v. Circle A & W Products, Company

647 F.2d 924 (9th Cir.), June 8, 1981; rehearing denied August 18, 1981; certiorari denied November 16, 1981—243 NLRB 434

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before KENNEDY, PREGERSON and POOLE, Circuit Judges

KENNEDY, Circuit Judge: In this case, a union disclaimed representation of a bargaining unit during the existing term of a collective bargaining agreement with the employer. While the collective bargaining agreement with the first union was still extant, the employees selected a new union as their collective bargaining agent in an election supervised by the National Labor Relations Board (Board). The employer refused to bargain with the new union, claiming a right to stand upon the existing collective bargaining agreement until it expired. The employer's position was based on an elaboration of the Board's contract bar rule, discussed more fully below. The Board cited the employer for refusal to bargain, rejected the contract bar defense, and ruled that the employer had committed an unfair labor practice. The Board now petitions for enforcement of its order directing the employer to bargain. We grant enforcement.

In more detail, the background of the dispute is as follows: Circle A & W Products Co. (Circle A & W) manufactures electrical equipment in Portland, Oregon. Since 1962, it has engaged in a series of collective bargaining agreements with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 49 (Local 49), the most recent of which commenced on January 1, 1977, and was due to expire three years later. Following the filing of a union deauthorization petition, an election was held on March 30, 1977. A majority of employees voted to withdraw the authority of Local 49 to require union membership as a condition of employment. After this election, Local 49 continued to abide by the terms of the collective bargaining agreement. In the succeeding year, however, the union's efforts to reinstate the union security clause resulted in another election to decide the issue. Shortly before the election, Local 49 notified the employees of its intention to disclaim representation in the event the union security clause failed to gain majority approval. Once again, the employees voted against compulsory union membership, and as a consequence, Local 49 formally disclaimed in writing its representational interest in Circle A & W's employees on April 28, 1978.

In an attempt to challenge the disclaimer, Circle A & W filed unfair labor practice charges against Local 49, alleging a failure and refusal to bargain collectively as well as the restraint and coercion of its employees in the exercise of their section 7 rights in violation of sections 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(3) of the National Labor Relations act (Act), as amended 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(b)(1)(A) and 158(b)(3) (1976). Two days later, the Regional Director dismissed these charges, and the subsequent appeal to the Office of Appeals was denied.

In the interim, Warehousemen's Union Local No. 206, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Local 206) had filed a petition to represent those Circle A & W employees previously represented by Local 49. At the representation hearing held on May 17, 1978, Circle A &W contended that, because a valid collective bargaining agreement with Local 49 existed, Local 206's petition must be rejected, citing the Board's contract bar rule. East Mfg. Corp., 242 N.L.R.B. No. 5 (1979); Mack Truck, Inc., 209 N.L.R.B. 1003 (1974); Gate City Optical Co., 175 N.L.R.B. 1059 (1969); Aircraft Turbine Service, Inc., 173 N.L.R.B. 709 (1968). Relying on Local 49's disclaimer of interest in representing the unit, the Regional Director found no contract bar present and, accordingly, directed that an election be held.

Based on the rejection of its contract bar defense, along with some procedural objections, Circle A & W requested a review of the Regional Director's decision, which the Board summarily denied on the ground that no substantial issues were raised. In the subsequent election, Local 206 was chosen to represent the unit and was promptly certified by the Board. Circle A & W then refused to commence collective bargaining with Local 206, resulting in an unfair labor practice charge filed by the union. The Regional Director this time issued a complaint. The Board, ruling on the general counsel's motion for summary judgment, found Circle A & W's actions violative of sections 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. The Board's order directs the company to cease and desist from engaging in the unfair labor practice and requires it to bargain with Local 206.

Circle A & W contends that under the Board's own precedents, employees are permitted to designate a new bargaining agent contrary to the terms of an existing collective bargaining agreement only if representation by the original union is wholly impracticable, such as in cases where there is a union schism, Oregon Macaroni Co., 124 N.L.R.B. 1001, 1004 (1959); Hershey Chocolate Corp., 121 N.L.R.B. 901, 906–12 (1958), enf't denied on other grounds, 297 F.2d 286 (3d Cir. 1961), or where the union is defunct, Bennett Stove Co., 139 N.L.R.B. 1422, 1423 (1962); Hershey Chocolate, supra. There is logic to that position, and we agree with the employer that the foregoing cases do not square precisely with the Board's subsequent decision in American Sunroof Corp.-West Coast, Inc., 243 N.L.R.B. No. 172 (1979). There, as in this case, due to a dispute over a union security clause, a new bargaining agent was selected and the Board required the employer to bargain, thereby rejecting a defense based on the contract bar rule without explicitly recognizing the important policy to protect the employer by preserving the stability of a collective bargaining agreement. We agree with the respondent employer that employees are not free to avoid a contract by electing a new bargaining representative for any reason at all.[1]

The Board's contract bar rule is designed in recognition of the importance of preserving stability in collective bargaining agreements. East Mfg. Corp., 242 N.L.R.B. No. 5 (1979). Simply stated, the rule holds that an existing collective bargaining agreement not exceeding three years will bar a petition for redetermination of representation in most instances. Bob's Big Boy Family Restraurants v. NLRB, 625 F.2d 850 (9th Cir. 1980). The rule does not find its source in the express language of the statute, nor is it judicially compelled. Rather, the Board has formulated the rule and thus has the principal discretion to waive or apply it in order to effectuate its policy underpinning. Local 1545, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners v. Vincent, 286 F.2d 127, 130–31 (2d Cir. 1960) (Friendly, J.) Leedom v. Local 108, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 278 F.2d 237, 241–43 (D.C. Cir. 1960). The Board discretion must not run counter to other policies of the Act, however, and we think certain guidelines are required in applying the rule.

[1] While somewhat opaque, the decision in American Sunroof may be justified on the ground that the Board explicitly found no collusion or attempt to avoid the terms of the collective bargaining agreement by the employees or the disclaiming union. 243 N.L.R.B. No. 172, at 5.

The policy of preserving industrial stability is of sufficient importance that the Board is required to implement the contract bar rule to protect the employer's rights as well as those of the employees. Accordingly, neither a union nor its members may rely on a severance of their relations as a grounds for designating a new representative if a substantial motive underlying that rift is to avoid the terms of an existing collective bargaining agreement. It may be appropriate, if not required, moreover, for the Board to make an inference or presumption of a prohibited purpose to avoid the terms of a bargaining agreement if the reason for a union's disclaimer is insignificant, minor, or contrary to the policies of the Act. In such cases, the employer may not be required to recognize a new bargaining agent within the period to which the contract bar rule is applicable.[2]

On the other hand, the Board is also required to implement the policy of the Act to ensure that employees secure fair, adequate and effective representation by their designated collective bargaining agent. There will be circumstances, in addition to schism or union defunctness, in which a change in representation is necessary in order to implement that policy. Where the objectives of contract stability and adequate employee representation conflict, the Board must exercise its discretion to reach an appropriate balance, but it must give explicit recognition to both sides of this balance.

While the Board's ajudication of this dispute was not entirely satisfactory under these principles, we nevertheless rule that its order must be enforced. Circle A & W did not allege that the union disclaimer or the employees' petition for a new election was a pretext for avoiding the terms of the collective bargaining agreement. The employer did not allege collusion between the parties for this purpose. The employer, finally, did not allege that avoidance of the collective bargaining agreement was a significant motivation of either the union or the employees. To the contrary, it stated that the dispute over the union security clause was the sole reason for changing bargaining agents. The employees did not object that the union had violated their section 7 rights in making this demand, and we think it a fair inference that there was a legitimate disagreement between the employees and their union on a fundamental matter of policy, rather than an attempt to avoid the terms of the contract with the company.

In these circumstances, Circle A & W was required to bargain with Local 206. The various procedural objections raised by the employer are without merit.

The petition is granted and the order is enforced.

Pregerson, Circuit Judge (dissenting): I respectfully dissent. I agree with the majority that the Board's adjudication of this dispute was not entirely satisfactory because the Board failed to articulate the basis for its conclusion that the contract-bar rule does not apply here. Unlike the majority, however, I would not draw the inferences necessary to support the Board's decision. Rather, I would remand the matter to the Board for an explanation of the basis of its decision not to apply the contract-bar rule.

As the majority correctly points out, the Board's longstanding interpretation of the contract-bar rule does not square precisely with the Board's most recent contract-bar decision. American Sunroof Corp.-West Coast, Inc., 243 NLRB No. 172 (1979). Up until the American Sunroof decision, it appeared that a valid disclaimer of representational interest by a union was insufficient, standing alone, to suspend the contract-bar rule. Instead, under the formulation set forth in East Manufacturing Corp.,

[2] A union might conceivably disclaim further representation of an employee unit for other improper purposes, and failure to apply the contract bar rule in such a situation could amount to an abuse of the Board's discretion. Such facts are not presently before the court and hence call for no ruling at this time.

242 NLRB No. 5 (1979), a valid disclaimer merely prompted the Board to examine the policies underlying the rule. In deciding whether to impose a contract bar, the Board would strike a balance between the need to preserve industrial stability and the need to protect the employees' right to a reasonable opportunity to change their bargaining representative. Balancing these important policy considerations was paramount in deciding whether to direct an election or to enforce the contract-bar rule.

In American Sunroof, however, the Board appeared to adopt, implicitly, a new interpretation of the contract-bar rule. In American Sunroof, without balancing the two competing policies, the Board suspended the contract-bar rule because of a valid disclaimer of interest by an incumbent union. Thus, the current effectiveness of the contract-bar rule is questionable.

The majority opinion does not dispel this uncertainty. The majority succinctly states the policies relevant under pre-American Sunroof decisional law and endorses their consideration by the Board. Yet the majority then appears to validate the suspension of the contract-bar rule on the sole ground that Local 49's disclaimer was valid. I am uncertain whether the majority is deciding that a valid disclaimer alone effectively suspends the contract-bar rule or whether the competing policies must still be considered. To avoid creating further confusion, I would grant the Board an opportunity to clarify its position. We have in the past recognized and deferred to the Board's expertise in these matters before rendering an opinion and I see no reason to depart from that policy now.

Generally we do not substitute our rationale for the rationale provided by the Board in its decisions. FTC v. Sperry & Hutchison Co., 405 U.S. 233, 249–50, 92 S.Ct. 898, 907–08, 31 L.Ed.2d. 170 (1972); Bob's Big Boy Family Restaurants v. NLRB, 625 F.2d 850 (9th Cir. 1980). Because the Board did not explain its decision to suspend the contract-bar rule, I think it appropriate to remand the matter to afford the Board an opportunity to explain the underlying rationale of its decision.

Daniel Silverman, Reg. Dir. v. Major League Baseball Player Relations Committee, Inc.

516 F. Supp. 588 (S.D.N.Y.), June 10, 1981

On action for temporary injunction

589

WERKER, District Judge: This is an acti brought by petitioner, the Regional Director of t Second Region of the National Labor Relatio Board for and on behalf of the National Labor R lations Board (the "Board") seeking temporary i junctive relief pursuant to Section 10(j) of the N tional Labor Relations Act, as amended (t "Act"), 29 U.S.C. § 160(j), pending the final disp sition of matters presently before the Board. R spondents in this action are the Major Leag Baseball Player Relations Committee, Inc ("PRC") and twenty-four of its constituent membe clubs. A hearing on petitioner's application w held on June 3 and 4, 1981. The Major Leagu Baseball Players Association (the "Player Associa tion") was granted leave to participate at the hear ing in support of petitioner. All parties were af forded full opportunity to be heard, to present evi dence bearing on the issues and to argue on th evidence and the law. After duly considering al the evidence and arguments presented, the petition for injunctive relief is denied.

FACTS

Since 1966 the Major League baseball players have been represented by the Players Association. During this time the respondent PRC has been the exclusive collective bargaining agent of twenty-six Major League clubs.[1] The Board of Directors of the PRC is empowered to formulate labor relations policy for the clubs and direct all negotiations with the Players Association.[2]

590

[1] The PRC is a multi-employer bargaining unit composed of the twenty-four respondent American Major League baseball clubs as well as two Canadian-based clubs, the Montreal Baseball Club, Ltd. and the Toronto Blue Jays Baseball Club. Petitioner is not seeking injunctive relief against the two Canadian clubs.

[2] The Members of the PRC Board Directors are: Charles Feeney, (President of the National League), Leland MacPhail (President of the American League), Joseph Burke (Executive Vice-President and General Manager of Kansas City Royals), Edmund Fitzgerald (Chairman of Milwaukee Brewers), Daniel Galbreath (President of Pittsburgh Pirates), Clark Griffith (Executive Vice President of Minnesota Twins), Robert Howsam (Executive Vice Chairman of Cincinnati Reds) and John McHale (President and Chief Executive Officer of Montreal Expos).

The Players Association and the PRC bargain to establish an agreement on pensions, allowances and a variety of rules governing players' employment. Except as to a base salary, under the various agreements negotiated by the parties, the Players Association has waived its right to bargain with the PRC about individual player salaries. Thus, above a minimum salary, the subject has been left to each individual player to negotiate with his club.

Prior to 1975, when a Major League baseball player's employement contract expired, he was precluded from negotiating for employment with any other team except his own. In December 1975, as the result of grievances filed by the Players Association on behalf of John Messersmith and David McNally, an arbitrator found that Major League clubs could not reserve a player for more than one year ("option year") past the expiration of his contract. A player who completes the option year without signing a renewal contract with his team becomes a "free agent" who is able to negotiate with other clubs.[4]

In 1976 the Players Association and the PRC entered into a collective bargaining agreement, effective January 1, 1976 through December 31, 1979, which provided, inter alia, for "free agency" as established by the Messersmith-McNally decision. Pursuant to this agreement, however, a player was required to serve six years in the Major Leagues before becoming a "free agent." The agreement also provided for "compensation"[5] in the form of an amateur player draft choice to each club which lost a "free agent" player selected by more than two clubs for negotiation rights. After four years of experimenting with this new system, the Players Association and the PRC commenced negotiations for a new collective bargaining agreement on November 11, 1979.

On January 16, 1980, the PRC presented a proposal which recognized the difference in quality, as measured by skill and ability, among the various players choosing to become "free agents." Under this proposal, as finally offered on May 12, 1980, a team losing a "free agent" selected by less than four clubs will not be afforded replacement player "compensation." If a player is selected for negotiation rights by four to seven clubs, the club signing a contract with the player must compensate the player's former club with an amateur draft choice, as before.[6] However, if a player is selected by eight or more clubs, and meets certain minimum performance standards,[7] the signing club must compensate the former club with not only an amateur draft choice, but also a professional player of the former club's choice from a list of unprotected players under contract with the signing club. In this third category, the player is referred to as a "ranking free agent" or "premium" player. Each club may retain 40 players under the contract. Depending upon the performance level of the "free agent" signed, the signing term may protect from 15 to 18 of its 40 players.[8]

The Players Association adamantly opposed this proposal as having a negative impact on player salaries. Since the proposal requires a club signing a "ranking free agent" to give up a professional player as well as an amateur draft choice, the Association predicts that the number of clubs willing to bid for a "premium" player and the salaries they would offer would be limited by the knowledge that they would be required to forfeit a player of perhaps comparable quality. Correspondingly, the player's present club could then offer him less to insure his remaining with the team.

As negotiations progressed, various matters were being resolved, but it became apparent that the issue of additional replacement player "compensation" was a significant impediment to settlement.

[5] One wonders what William Safire might do with the language concept that "compensation" in athletic terms means the exchange of bodies.

[6] An amateur draft choice is a high school or college player.

[7] This "free player" must rank in the upper ⅓ or ½ of certain performance categories, and be drafted within a specified number of rounds.

[8] In addition to the proposal for replacement player "compensation," the clubs also sought to require the Players Association to bargain directly about players' salaries by establishing salary ranges for players with less than six years of Major League service. Changes were also sought in the procedure by which the salaries of some players may be established by arbitration. During the negotiations, the clubs withdrew both these proposals.

Unable to reach agreement on the PRC's proposal, a strike deadline was established for May 23, 1980. On the eve of that deadline, the PRC and the Players Association entered into a collective bargaining agreement ("basic agreement"), effective January 1, 1980 through December 31, 1983, establishing the terms and conditions of employment of Major League baseball players. As part of that agreement, a joint study committee was appointed to consider the unresolved matter of replacement player "compensation" for a club which loses a "free agent." The committee was to report to the PRC and the Players Association no later than January 1, 1981.

On December 8, 1980, Bowie Kuhn, Commissioner of Baseball, delivered a speech at the Annual Convention of Professional Baseball. Commenting on the financial difficulties facing the industry, Commissioner Kuhn expressed concern about escalating player salaries brought about by "free agency." He cited the companion problem of "compensation" as a threat to competitive balance in baseball and thus expressed a concern about adequate replacement talent for the loss of a "free agent." Sounding a clarion call to owners and players alike to recognize the need to correct the system of "free agency" which has given rise to these problems, he predicted further financial loss without cooperation between the two groups.

Meanwhile, the joint study committee met on several occasions between August 7, 1980 and January 22, 1981. At one of the meetings, Marvin Miller, the Executive Director of the Players Association, referring to the press reports of Commissioner Kuhn's statements at the Annual Baseball Convention on December 8, 1980, asserted that the clubs' "compensation" proposal was motivated by financial concerns and by a desire to reduce player salaries. Mr. Grebey rebutted these statements and clearly stated that reduction of player salaries was not a goal of the clubs' proposal and that no question of the clubs' ability to pay was relevant or was being raised on behalf of the clubs.

Failing to agree on a joint report, separate reports were issued by the PRC on February 17, 1981 and by the Players Association on February 19, 1981. The players' position, as reflected in its report, is that the additional compensation for a "ranking free agent" diminishes that "free agent's bargaining position with the new team by the value of the player that the signing club expects to lose. The clubs repeated their position in the report submitted by its members, stating that its current approach is not designed to attack the subject of player salaries.

This impasse ended round one of negotiations over the PRC's proposal and set the stage for round two as provided for in Article XVIII, Section D(2) of the basic agreement:

> Negotiations. Subsequent to receiving the report of the study committee, the parties shall promptly meet to commence negotiations on the subject of the study. If the parties are unable to reach agreement on the matter of player selection rights as compensation to a Club which loses a free agent player after receiving the report of the study committee and by February 15, 1981, the Clubs may thereafter but before February 20, 1981 unilaterally adopt and put into effect as part of the Basic Agreement the proposal on this matter * * * [see attachment 9] or a variation not less favorable to the Players Association. In the event the Clubs put such proposal into effect unilaterally, the Players Association may reopen the Basic Agreement with respect to the player selection rights provision put into effect by the Clubs and strike with respect thereto. The Player Association may reopen the Basic Agreement with respect to the player selection rights provision put into effect by the Clubs and strike with respect thereto. The Player Association shall give the Clubs notice of such reopening by March 1, 1981 and in such notice shall indicate the date on which it will strike, which date shall not be later than June 1, 1981. In the event the Players Association does not so strike, there shall be no further strike on this subject during the term of the Basic Agreement, provided, however, that the Players Association may, prior to March 1, 1981, offer to waive the right to strike described above and may request the Clubs to agree to a substitute right to strike in 1982 on a date not later than June 1, with no obligation on the part of the Clubs to accept such request.

On February 19, 1981, the parties having failed to reach an agreement on the "compensation" issue, the clubs invoked their option under the basic agreement and unilaterally adopted as part of that agreement their last proposal on the issue. On February 26, 1981, the Players Association likewise exercised one of its options under the agreement, reopening the basic agreement on the unresolved issue and setting a strike deadline of May 29, 1981.[9] As a result of this reopener, the second round of negotiations began.

By letter of February 27, 1981, the Players Association requested the PRC to provide certain financial information for all member clubs. The Players Association premised the appropriateness of its request on Commissioner Kuhn's December 1980 speech which the Association interpreted as an affirmation of its belief that the "compensation" proposal was motivated by financial concerns.

Mr. Miller explained that the requested financial data was "necesary for the Players Association to properly discharge its duties and responsibilities * * * as the exclusive collective bargaining representative of all major league players, for purposes of preparation for and conduct of the ongoing negotiations."

On March 13, 1981, the PRC, through Mr. Grebey, refused to comply with the Association's request, repeating the PRC's position that its bargaining stance regarding "compensation" was not based on "economic incapacity or inability." By letters of April 7 and 20, 1981, the Players Association sought reconsideration of the PRC's decision not to comply with its request. Specifically, the Association focused on the sharp increase in player salaries since the 1976 agreement.[10]

Noting a causal relationship between the "free agency" provisions of that agreement and the escalation of player salaries,[11] the Association challenged the PRC to deny that its proposal is "designed to negatively impact upon the salaries of free agent players."

Grebey responded by letter of April 24, 1981, and again refused to comply with the Association's request. First, he noted the Association's failure to seek disclosure of club financial data until it exercised its option to reopen the basic agreement, more than sixteen months after the commencement of negotiations on the issue of player "compensation." Grebey further stated that the PRC had "never advanced the position nor taken refuge in argumentation which either directly or indirectly claims an inability to pay as a defense for [its] position in collective bargaining." Rather, the objective of the PRC in proposing the plan for "compensation," explained Mr. Grebey, "is to enhance player balance between clubs losing a quality free agent over the long term by providing replacement personnel that will: (1) compensate for the loss of a player; (2) compensate for the general inability of clubs to overcome this added turnover on a club roster through additions from the Minor Leagues; and (3) provide equity balance in compensation, reflecting the different levels of skill and ability of players who chose to become free agents as evidenced by our experience of the past four years."

Meanwhile, during this second round of negotiations, various statements by club owners appeared in the media. These statements all reflect an expression of concern about the financial well-being of the baseball industry and/or the level of player salaries. Specifically, in an article appearing in The Sporting News on March 21, 1981, Ruly Carpenter, President of the Philadelphia Phillies, stated that "salaries have basically gotten to ridiculous proportions." Ray A. Kroc, Chairman of the Board of the San Diego Padres, made a statement which was quoted in The Sporting News magazine dated May 21, 1981, warning the players not to strike because there is a limit to the salaries they can be paid. He is also quoted as saying that only three or four clubs out of twelve in the National League are still making money.

[9] The strike deadline was subsequently extended by stipulation of the parties on May 28, 1981, the date petitioner instituted this action. Pursuant to that stipulation the parties agreed that the Players Association's right to strike is extended to 48 hours following this Court's ruling on the petition presently before it. The parties also agreed that the Players Association will not commence a strike until at least 24 hours after the Court's ruling.

[10] Commenting on public resentment of high salaries in sports, an article appearing in Sports Illustrated, June 1, 1981, contained the following quote at 90:

> "There was a time when the League stood for integrity and fair dealing. Today it stands for dollars and cents. Once it looked to the elevation of the game and an honest exhibition of the sport; today its eyes are on the turnstile. Men have come into the business for no other motive than to exploit it for every dollar in sight."

That statement is from a "manifesto" issued in 1889 by the Brotherhood of Ball Players. The issuance of the "manifesto" was a prelude to the formation of a players' league. Dissatisfied, among other things, with the imposition of salary limits set by the owners, the Players League was formed for the 1890 season as an alternative to striking.

[11] The average Major League Baseball player's salary has risen from approximately $52,300 per year in 1976 to $196,500 in 1981.

On March 21, 1981, Toronto Blue Jays President, Peter Bavasi, predicted in a radio interview that the rise in salaries as a result of "free agency" would force the clubs into bankruptcy if the situation were not corrected. He further commented that cooperation from the players regarding the "compensation" proposal would be helpful in restraining clubs from expending large sums on "free agents" since they would have to give up a promising player as a price for signing a "premium" player.

On April 7, 1981, during a television interview, Ted Turner, President of the Atlanta Braves, similarly voiced concern about the financial state of the baseball industry due to salaries, as did Joseph Burke, in his capacity as Executive Vice President of the Kansas City Royals. Burke linked the rise in salaries to "free agency."[12]

Believing that the PRC's bargaining position on the issue of player "compensation" was based at least in part on the financial difficulties of certain member clubs, on May 7, 1981, the Players Association filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board alleging respondents' failure to bargain in good faith by refusing to comply with the Players Association's request for financial disclosure in violation of Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (5).

Following investigation and pursuant to Section 10(b) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(b), the Board filed a complaint charging respondents with violating Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. A hearing on this complaint before an administrative law judge of the Board is scheduled to commence on June 15, 1981.

The temporary injunctive relief sought by petitioner requires respondents to rescind their February 19, 1981, action by which they exercised their right under the 1980 basic agreement and unilaterally implemented their bargaining proposal regarding "compensation." This relief, if granted, would thus preclude the Players Association, under the terms of the basic agreement, from commencing a strike. Petitioner argues that if its request for relief is not granted, the Players Association and the baseball player-employees it represents will be forced to strike within forty-eight hours after this Court rules, or be bound through the end of 1983 by the PRC's proposal. Petitioner emphasizes that obvious irreparable harm to the players, owners and fans would flow from a decision by the Players Association to strike.

The Association contends that if petitioner should prevail in the proceedings presently before the administrative law judge, the Board would be unable to adequately remedy the PRC's alleged unfair labor practice by ordering the clubs to disclose the financial information which the Association seeks, since the Board cannot undo the effects of a strike which would ensue as a result of the denial of petitioner's instant request for relief.

Respondents vigorously oppose petitioner's application as a tactic by the Players Association to avoid the consequences of a contract freely bargained for and entered into by it.

DISCUSSION

To obtain a Section 10(j) injunction, petitioner must satisfy a two-fold test. First, this Court must find that there is reasonable cause to believe that an unfair labor practice has been committed. Second, the Court must determine whether the requested relief is just and proper. Kaynard v. Mego Corp., 633 F.2d 1026, 1030 (2d Cir. 1980); Kaynard v. Palby Lingerie, Inc., 625 F.2d 1047, 1051 (2d Cir. 1980), see Morio v. North American Soccer League, 632 F.2d 217, 218 (2d Cir. 1980). Regarding issues of fact, petitioner "should be given the benefit of the doubt," and with respect to questions of law, "the Board's view should be sustained unless the court is convinced that it is wrong." Kaynard v. Palby Lingerie, Inc., 625 F.2d at 1051; See Danielson v. International Organization of Masters, 521 F.2d 747, 751 (2d Cir. 1975); Danielson v. Joint Board, 494 F.2d 1230, 1245 (2d Cir. 1974).

Unfair Labor Practice Claim

Section 7 of the Act provides that "[e]mployees shall have the right to * * * bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 157. Section 8(a)(5) of the Act implements this right by making it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5). Section 8(d) defines collective bargaining as, inter alia, "the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of his employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment * * * ." 29 U.S.C. § 158(d).

[12] Although Joseph Burke is also a member of the Board of Directors of the PRC, his remarks quoted in the Kansas City Star were not made in that capacity.

Information concerning subjects at issue in bargaining is presumed to be necessary and relevant to negotiations, and employers and unions alike must provide such information when requested in the course of bargaining. N.L.R.B. v. General Electric Co., 418 F.2d 736, 753 (2d Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 965, 90 S.Ct. 965, 25 L.Ed.2d 257 (1970); N.L.R.B. v. Jacobs Manufacturing Co., 196 F.2d 680 (2d Cir. 1952).

Since the Players Association exercised its option under the 1980 basic agreement on February 26, 1981, and reopened negotiations with regard to the PRC's compensation" proposal, collective bargaining has been limited to one issue: the level of "compensation" to be paid to a club when a former player of the club, upon the expiration of his employment contract becomes a "free agent" and contracts with another club for employment.

The Board alleges in its petition that the public statements by club owners regarding claims of financial difficulties created a reasonable belief on the part of the Players Association that respondents' bargaining position during this second round of negotiations was based, "at least in part, on the present or prospective financial difficulties of certain of Respondents' member clubs." Although Marvin Miller has expressed some doubt as to club owners' inability to pay rising player salaries, he nevertheless takes the position that the Players Association must have the financial information it requests if it is to fulfill its duty of fair representation. If deprived of that information, the Association claims that it must blindly decide whether to press its demands and risk the loss of jobs for its members if the clubs cannot survive under the "compensation" terms proposed by the Association, or to recede from its position and accept the PRC's proposal without verifying owners' claims of financial distress caused by "free agency." Thus, the Association brought an unfair labor practice charge against the PRC for its failure to disclose the requested financial data after the clubs allegedly put into issue their inability to pay.

In N.L.R.B. v. Truitt Manufacturing Co., 351 U.S. 149, 76 S.Ct. 753, 100 L.Ed. 1027 (1956), the Supreme Court laid to rest the question of whether an employer, bound by the National Labor Relations Act to bargain in good faith, could claim that it was financially unable to pay higher wages and then refuse a union's request to produce financial data to substantiate the claim. Holding that such conduct supported a finding of failure to bargain in good faith, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5), the Court explained:

> Good-faith bargaining necessarily requires that claims made by either bargainer should be honest claims. This is true about an asserted inability to pay an increase in wages. If such an argument is important enough to present in the give and take of bargaining, it is important enough to require some sort of proof of its accuracy.

Id. at 152–53, 76 S.Ct. at 755–756.

However, Truitt's progeny have held that an employer is required to disclose its financial condition only when the employer claims an inability to pay, however phrased, during the course of bargaining. E.g. Western Massachusetts Electric Co. v. N.L.R.B., 573 F.2d 101 (1st Cir. 1978); Pressman v. N.L.R.B., 538 F.2d 496 (2d Cir. 1976).

Petitioner admits that at no time during bargaining sessions have respondents made a claim of inability to pay. Nevertheless, petitioner urges the Court to find that public statements made by several club owners as well as the Commissioner of Baseball about the financial condition of the industry are sufficient to support a finding of reasonable cause to believe that respondents have injected the inability to pay into the negotations.

The cases cited by petitioner in support of its position are simply inapposite. In each case, inability to pay was put in issue at the bargaining table. Thus, no consideration of extrinsic events was necessary or relied upon in determining under Truitt, whether an employer raised the issue of inability to pay at the bargaining table. E. g., Latimer Bros., 242 N.L.R.B. 50 (1979); Teleprompter Corp., 227 N.L.R.B. 705 (1977), enf'd, 570 F.2d 4 (1st Cir. 1977); C-B Buick, Inc., 206 N.L.R.B. 6 (1973), modified, 506 F.2d 1086 (3d Cir. 1974); Goodyear

Aerospace, 204 N.L.R.B. 831 (1973), enf. denied on other grounds, 497 F.2d 747 (6th Cir. 1974); Globe Gear Co., 189 N.L.R.B. 422 (1971), enf'd, 451 F.2d 1348 (6th Cir. 1971).

Thus, Petitioner concedes, as it must, that the Board and courts have never found that an employer has injected financial condition into negotiations, absent statements or conduct by the employer at the bargaining table. Nevertheless, it urges this Court to find, on the basis of statements by Commissioner Kuhn and various owners, that the financial issue has become relevant to the negotiations regarding "compensation" because of the unique nature of collective bargaining in baseball. Mindful that this Court must be "hospitable" to the views of the Regional Director, however novel, Danielson v. Joint Board, 494 F.2d at 1244–45, I am nevertheless convinced that the Board's position is wrong, and thus will not "defer to the statutory construction urged by [it]." Danielson v. International Organization of Masters, 521 F.2d at 751.

It is the PRC Board of Directors which is charged with the exclusive authority to formulate the collective bargaining position of the clubs and to negotiate agreements with the Players Association. Indeed, Grebey, the official spokesman for the PRC in collective bargaining matters, has consistently denied that the clubs' financial status is at issue in the current negotiations.

Commissioner Kuhn's remarks in December 1980 at the convention cannot be imputed to the PRC as a statement of its bargaining position. First, petitioner's attempt to establish an agency relationship between the Commissioner and the PRC is unavailing. As Commissioner of Baseball, Kuhn presides at the regular joint meetings of the Major Leagues, but does not request nor preside at special meetings called by the PRC. Moreover, while Kuhn is responsible for disciplining players who may then file grievances against him in his capacity as Commissioner, he has likewise ordered the clubs to cease certain action when the interests of baseball warranted his intercession, as when he directed the clubs to open their training camps in the spring of 1976.

There can be little doubt that there is a correlation between "free agency" and the rise in player salaries. Commissioner Kuhn addressed this problem and expressed his concern about the high salaries negotiated between individual players and clubs. During his 1980 speech at the clubs' convention, he also voiced concern for a companion problem, and called for cooperation between the players and owners in combating the threat to competitive balance. He expressed optimism that a solution would be found by the joint study committee that was then considering the "compensation" issue. Fairly read, I cannot find that the Commissioner's speech supports the proposition that the clubs' bargaining position on the replacement player "compensation" proposal is motivated by financial inability.

Indeed, viewing the companion problem of player "compensation" as a separate issue, Commissioner Kuhn made a statement appearing in The Sporting News on January 24, 1981 that he did "not believe that 'compensation' as proposed by the clubs would have any effect on salaries or certainly not more than a marginal effect at most."

In a multi-employer bargaining unit as large and publicly visible as the Major League Baseball Clubs, it is inevitable that extraneous statements will be made by individuals affiliated in some way with the group which are inconsistent with the official position of the unit. This only underscores the necessity, recognized by the PRC, for centralized bargaining responsibility and authority. Clearly, individual expressions of opinion cannot serve to bind the entire bargaining unit in the absence of authority to speak for the groups. See Anderson Pharmacy, 187 N.L.R.B. 301, 302 n.10 (1970).

Petitioner and the Association strain to emphasize the uniqueness of collective bargaining in the baseball industry to avoid the consequences of the established labor law regarding the inability to pay. However, this Court cannot accept "collective bargaining through the press" as a basis for a 10(j) injunction.

The Act has provided for collective bargaining between the parties through their authorized representatives. If this Court were to find that the several public statements by club officials and the Commissioner were sufficient to support a finding that the PRC and its negotiating team view the respondents' "compensation" proposal as related to the financial condition of the clubs, it would do violence to the intent and purpose of the Act which limits the jurisdiction of this Court. See McLeod v. General Electric Co., 366 F.2d 847, 849–50 (2d Cir. 1966), vacated as moot, 385 U.S. 533, 87 S.Ct. 637, 17 L.Ed.2d 588 (1967).

To accept petitioner's argument would permit disgruntled employers in a multiemployer unit who disagreed with the negotiation policies of their representatives to force negotiation issues into the courts, thereby "conducting labor management relations by way of an injunction," id. at 850, a result clearly contrary to the purpose of the Act. The Players Association and the PRC entered into a valid contract on May 23, 1980. As part of that contract they agreed that if the parties were unable to reach an agreement on the "compensation" issue, the PRC could implement its proposal, thereby triggering one of the Players Association's options, that is, to reopen the agreement on that issue and set a strike deadline of no later than June 1, 1981. This Court will not alter the terms of this contract, for which the parties freely bargained, by delaying implementation of the proposal and a possible strike on the basis of a tortured reading of the law regarding inability to pay.

Thus, I cannot find that the comments by several club officials and the Commissioner, relied upon by petitioner, are statements of policy on behalf of the PRC which would support a claim of inability to pay.

Moreover, the issue of salary, above a minimum rate, is not a subject of collective bargaining between the Players Association and the PRC. Rather, individual players negotiate independently with the clubs as to their salary. Indeed, it is the high player salaries which have resulted from the negotiation of individual contracts by players and clubs which Commissioner Kuhn addressed in his 1980 speech. Noting that player salaries are increasing at a more rapid rate than revenues, he opined that bargaining of individual contracts has led to this problem. He called upon players and owners to cooperate in this regard to arrest the trend and avoid loss to all, including the fans who will be required to pay higher ticket prices.

The evidence adduced at the hearing is insufficient to support a finding that the replacement player "compensation" proposal implemented by the PRC presents economic issues. Rather, the proposal is addressed to the inequities which flowed from the "compensation" for "free agents" as provided for in the 1976 agreement. Specifically, the proposal implemented by the PRC in February 1981, recognized the difference in skill and ability among "free agents" by the type of compensation provided to a club losing the player. In addition, the proposal is designed to more adequately assist the clubs in replacing players lost in the "free agent" draft. Under the 1976 agreement, clubs were unable to replace lost players through the Minor League and amateur systems within a meaningful time period, if at all.

Finally, I find an insufficient basis for the Board's assertion that the Players Association has a reasonable and rational belief in the clubs' inability to pay in view of its delay in requesting financial data for more than one year after the "compensation" proposal was first introduced by respondents.

As early as 1975 there were reports about club financial losses. In response to these reports, Miller characterized the claims as "phony." In 1977, again in response to reports of financial loss, Miller stated that the clubs had been making that claim for years. In January 1979, Miller claimed that the concern about the escalation of salaries was ill-founded since Major League clubs pay players a smaller proportion of income than most other industries. Tr. 56–60. A few days following the Commissioner's speech in December 1980, Miller likewise commented on the credibility of statements regarding alleged club losses by focusing on the rise in capital gains over the preceding five years. Tr. 63. Indeed, as recently as March or April of this year, Miller predicted that the clubs would refuse to produce the requested financial data because they were not losing money. Tr. 64.

Despite the presentation of a "compensation" proposal in January 1980 and Miller's apparent knowledge for several years of the losses claimed by club owners, the Players Association first requested financial information from the clubs on February 27, 1981. This delayed request coupled with Miller's expressed opinion that the clubs were not losing money leads to the inescapable conclusion that the proceedings brought before the Board, resulting in the instant action, was not a sincere effort to obtain access to the clubs' financial records, but rather a bargaining tactic by the Association to prevent the implementation of the PRC's proposal.

The court is mindful that a strike may result from its denial of petitioner's request for a 10(j) injunction. Indeed, the industry has suffered a strike in the past. Nevertheless, in struggling with a temptation and even compulsion to prevent a strike in the public interest, I am bound by the law. The possibility of a strike, although a fact of life in labor relations, offers no occasion for this Court to distort the principles of law and equity. The resolution of the "compensation" issue is left to the parties through the negotiation process.

CONCLUSION

In accordance with the foregoing, I find there is no reasonable cause to believe that an unfair labor practice has been committed by respondents. The petition is therefore dismissed.

NLRB v. Lloyd A. Fry Roofing Company, Inc. of Delaware

651 F. 2d 442 (6th Cir.), June 10, 1981—237 NLRB 1005

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before MARTIN and JONES, Circuit Judges, and REED, District Judge[*]

443

NATHANIEL R. JONES, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (the Board) petitions for enforcement of its order that the Lloyd A. Fry Roofing Company (Fry) violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. by constructively discharging an employee because be filed complaints respecting the safety of Fry's equipment. For the reasons set forth below, we grant enforcement.

I.

Fry is a multistate manufacturer and distributor of asphalt roofing products. At its Medina, Ohio plant, Fry employs approximately 25 production workers, and four over-the-road (OTR) truck drivers who are not represented by a union. On May 21, 1975, Carl Bauer, Fry's office manager at Medina, hired James L. Varney as an OTR driver. Because Varney was a close personal friend, Bauer waived Fry's established policy requiring two years experience as an OTR driver. In December of 1975, Varney was laid off for lack of work. Although Varney had been reprimanded for improperly securing loads and had one accident, Fry recalled Varney in January 1976.

In November 1975, Fry entered into a one-year truck leasing agreement with Joban Leasing Company. Immediately thereafter, each of the OTR drivers complained to numerous Fry officials about the safety of Joban's trucks. Varney also questioned James Beliles, Joban's owner, about the condition if its trucks. In response, Beliles threatened to "see to it that Varney was fired."

As a result of the OTR drivers' complaints on January 13, 1976, plant manager Dorsch convened a meeting with Beliles and OTR drivers James Wade and Varney to seek a solution to the truck maintenance problems. Varney complained of the condition of the trucks and compared them unfavorably with Fry's prior equipment. Wade agree. Beliles promised that new equipment would be provided in the spring. Dorsch stated that no driver need operate an unsafe vehicle, but that they would have to continue to use Joban's trucks. Belies agreed to make repairs provided the complaints were in writing. As a consequence, Dorsch instituted an "Equipment Complaint Report" to be completed by the OTR drivers after each trip. After the meeting, Beliles again threatened Varney to "see to it that he is fired."

The Equipment Complaint Report proved ineffective. Beliles ignored Equipment Complaint Reports listing defective lights, faulty transmissions, faulty steering wheels, maladjusted or inoperative brakes, and broken speedometers. On one occasion, Beliles tore up several forms. At Varney's instigation, Dorsch was told of Beliles's disregard for the Equipment Complaint Report.

[*] The Honorable Scott Reed, District Judge, United States District Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky, sitting by designation.

In addition to filing Equipment Complaint Reports, Varney used the "Driver Vehicle Condition Report" on the back of the daily log form required by regulations of the Federal Highway Administration to note mechanical problems with Joban's trucks. Driver Vehicle Condition Reports provide for certification by the mechanic that the defect, has been repaired before further use of the vehicle. Though Varney submitted several such reports, the required repairs were not made.

Varney also asked Dorsch to have Joban's trucks inspected by the Ohio Public Utilities Commission or by the Federal Highway Administration. Varney agreed to stop complaining if the trucks were inspected. Dorsch refused.

In early March 1976, three of the four OTR drivers complained orally to Dorsch about Joban's trucks. Varney threatened not to drive the trucks unless they were fixed. Shortly thereafter, an OTR driver quit because he was tired of driving Joban's trucks. On April 14, Varney was assigned to deliver a load in Pennsylvania. Joban's mechanic told Varney that the truck had new brakes. During Varney's trip, the brakes on the truck failed and he had a three-vehicle accident. In a telephone conversation with office manager Bauer, an emergency road service mechanic stated that the brakes were defective. Bauer and Dorsch told Varney that the accident was not his fault.

The day after the accident, Beliles called Dorsch and threatened to " pull all of his equipment out unless they get rid of Varney." On April 19, Dorsch convened another meeting. Varney complained about the condition of Joban's trucks. Beliles accused Varney of deliberately abusing Joban's trucks. Beliles reiterated his oft-repeated threat that Varney be fired. Dorsch "refused," but gave Varney an "ultimatum." Dorsch then presented to Varney for his signature a statement, already prepared, putting him on probation for six months.[1] Dorsch read the statement aloud. Bauer advised Varney that if he signed it he would be admitting to the violations set forth in it. Varney refused to sign. Dorsch told Varney to sign the statement or be terminated. After the meeting Bauer conferred privately with Varney and told 445 him that he would be foolish to sign the statement. Varney again refused to sign the statement and was fired.

Varney filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board alleging that he was discharged for exercising rights protected by section 7 of the Act. After a hearing, an Administrative Law Judge held that Varney's participation in meetings convened by Fry, use of the Equipment Maintenance Report, and efforts to enforce compliance with governmental safety regulations were related to a common concern of all OTR drivers. As a consequence, the ALJ held that Varney was engaged in protected concerted activities within the meaning of section 7 of the Act.[2]

STATEMENT

I, James I. Varney, Hereby acknowledge that, effective April 19, 1976, I shall begin a driver's probationary period of six months with the Medina Plant of Lloyd A. Fry Roofing Company of Delaware, Inc. During the period April 19, 1976 through October 19, 1976, I fully understand that I will be subject to the closest scrutiny by plant management, and plant employees and agents, of my driving ability (speeding (sic) tickets, accidents, breakdowns) and my treatment of the Equipment provided me by my plant management. In addition, I understand that I will be judged on my ability to take loads out of the plant at the time scheduled by plant management. I will also be judged on my ability to deliver these loads at the time promised. My treatment of customers and their employees will be scrutinized. The time required for me to return to the plant and be ready for another trip will be monitored. The condition of my returned empty trailer with regard to its convenient re-loading by the plant shipping department will be reported to plant management. I shall promptly report, in writing, all equipment deficiencies to the agents of our leasing company, who are responsible for vehicle maintenance. I understand that these same agents will report to my plant management all equipment defects not reported by me, or reported by me late, causing a scheduled trip to be delayed. I completely understand that I am subject to immediate dismissal by plant management during my probation period.

The ALJ concluded that Varney was subjected to "excessively harsh and unwarranted probationary status" because of his concerted activity respecting the safety of Joban's trucks. Fry's proffered justification that Varney was discharged because he failed to tie down cargo, was tardy in deliveries, had poor customer relations, and drove carelessly were found to be pretextual.

II.

Section 7 of the Act provides that "employees shall have the right * * * to engage in * * * concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutal aid or protection." 29 U.S.C. § 157. Employees may engage in concerted activities protected by section 7 regardless of whether the employees are members of a union. Vic Tanny International, Inc. v. NLRB, 622 F.2d 237, 241 (6th Cir. 1980).

An individual employee's complaint is "concerted" if it is related to group action for the mutal aid or protection of other employees. Signal Oil & Gas Co. v. NLRB, 390 F.2d 338, 342–43 (9th Cir. 1968). Either the individual employee "is in fact acting on behalf of, or as a representative of, other employees," NLRB v. Guernsey-Muskingum Electric Cooperative, Inc., 28 F.2d 8, 12–13 (6th Cir. 1960), or his claim "must be made with the object of inducing or preparing for group action," Aro, Inc. v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 713, 718 (6th Cir. 1979). It is not necessary that the individual employee be appointed or nominated by other employees to represent their interests.

Protests of wages, hours other working conditions and the presentation of job-related grievances are for the mutal aid and protection of employees. NLRB v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9, 82 S.Ct. 1099, 8 L.Ed.2d 298 (1962); Vic Tanny, supra, 622 F.2d at 241; NLRB v. Elias Brothers Restaurants, 496 F.2d 1165 (6th Cir. 1974). Additionally, an employee's presentation if job-related grievances aimed at achieving employer compliance with governmental regulations affecting working conditions is for the mutal aid and protection of employees. Socony Mobil Oil Co. v. NLRB, 357 F.2d 662 (2d Cir. 1966). Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 NLRB No. 999 (1975). Applying these principles, we hold that Varney was engaged in concerted activity protected by section 7 of the Act.

Varney was engaged in numerous discussions with other OTR drivers regarding their personal safety, which was a major issue at Fry. Varney expressed his concern to Fry's management that Joban's trucks were unsafe. Varney articulated his and the other drivers' concerns at meetings between the OTR drivers and Fry's management. Varney's continued use of the Equipment Complaint Report and the Federal Highway Administration's Driver Vehicle Condition Report to eliminate safety hazards on Joban's trucks was for the mutual aid or protection of other employees. His attempt to enforce federal safety and state inspection regulations is protected concerted activity. Such regulations are intended to provide all employees with a safe job environment and the means to protect themselves against job hazards.

III.

Section 8(a)(1) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice to "interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of * * *" their section 7 rights. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). In this Circuit, if a discharge is motivated "in part" by an employee's protected concerted activities the discharge violates section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Vic Tanny, supra, 622 F.2d at 241; NLRB v. Retail Store Employees Union, Local 876, Retail Clerks International Association, AFL-CIO, 570 F.2d 586, 590 (6th Cir. 1978). Elias Brothers Restaurants, supra, 496 F.2d at 1167. But see, NLRB v. Ogle Protection Service, 375 F.2d 497 (6th Cir.) cert. denied, 389 U.S. 843 (1967). In Wright Line, 251 NLRB No. 150 (1980), the Board has reexamined its use of the "in part" test in light of the decision in Mt. Healthy Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 97 S.Ct. 568, 50 L.Ed2d 471 (1979). The Supreme Court in Mt. Healthy fashioned a "test of causation which distinguishes between a result caused by [protected concerted activity] and one not caused." 429 U.S. at 286, 97 S.Ct. at 575. The Court reasoned that "[t]he [section 7 right of an employee] is sufficiently vindicated if such and employee is placed in no worse a position than if he had not engaged in the conduct," Id. at 285–86, 97 S.Ct. at 575. Wright Line adopts a test of causation parallel to that set forth in Mt. Healthy:

[2] Additionally, the ALJ held that the agreement between Fry and the OTR drivers to institute the "Equipment Complaint Reports" was analogous to a limited collective bargaining agreement which the OTR drivers were entitled to enforce. Because of our resolution of the other issues on appeal, we do not reach this issue.

> The general counsel establishes a prima facie case that protected concerted activity was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision; then, the burden shifts to the employer's decision; then, the burden shifts to the employer to prove that the same action would have taken place in the absence of the protected concerted activity.

251 NLRB at 20. Applying these principles to this case, we hold that the facts compel the conclusion that Varney would not have been discharged but for his protected activity.

It is beyond peradventure that Varney was constructively discharged on April 19. Beliles vigorously opposed Varney's concerted activity to improve Joban's equipment. He told Dorsch that Varney's April 14 accident was "the last straw." Though Dorsch stated Varney was not at fault for the accident, Dorsch adopted Beliles' opposition to Varney's concerted efforts by requiring him to sign a probationary statement which suggested that Varney was guilty of its detailed provisions.

Fry claims that Varney was discharged because of his careless driving, tardy departures and deliveries, treatment of customers and abuse of Joban's equipment. However, substantial evidence supports the Board's findings that Fry has failed to demonstrate that it would have discharged Varney in the absence of his engaging in protected concerted activities.

Varney had only one accident prior to his accident on April 14, which Dorsch admitted was not Varney's fault. He received two tickets for traffic violations in the summer of 1975, but Fry took no action at that time. Most of the truck breakdowns were due to equipment failures. Tardy departures and deliveries were related to equipment defects. There is no evidence that Varney abused Joban's trucks. A customer once reported that a young driver wearing cowboy boots was rude. Through Dorsch testified that he concluded Varney was the driver in question, the ALJ specifically discredited Dorsch's testimony.

Varney was repeatedly reprimanded because he failed to properly stack and tie down the loading pallets and temporary plywood sides of the flat bed trucks after making a delivery. However, after each reprimand, Varney would comply with the proper procedures. Additionally, the ALJ held that nothing unusual occurred immediately preceding April 19 to make Varney's conduct a crucial matter. Consequently, Varney's disregard for the condition of his truck after making deliveries was not, standing alone, a crucial matter for which he would have been discharged.

Accordingly, the Board's order is ENFORCED.

NLRB v. Amber Delivery Service, Inc.

651 F.2d 57 (1st Cir.), June 11, 1981—250 NLRB 63

On petition to enforce Board Order

59

BREYER, Circuit Judge: In a decision and order dated June 24, 1980, the National Labor Relations Board ruled that respondent Amber Delivery Service, Inc. (Amber) had committed several unfair labor practices in violation of section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (3) (1970). Specifically, the Board found that Amber had (1) impermissibly interrogated and solicited help from employees in an effort to forestall union organizing activities; (2) imposed one-day suspensions on three employees in retaliation for their union activities; and (3) instituted changes in working conditions in an unlawful attempt to convert its employees to independent contractors and thereby deprive them of their statutory right to union representation. Underlying these findings was the Board's preliminary determination that Amber's "employees' in fact enjoyed such status—rather than that of "independent contractors"—and thus were entitled to the Act's protection. Upon concluding that the unfair practices were indicative of a pervasive and ongoing anti-union animus on the part of Amber, the Board ruled that a fair election was unlikely and that a bargaining order was necessary. It now petitions for enforcement of its order. We affirm the Board's findings of various unfair labor practices but vacate the bargaining order, finding Amber's actions insufficiently coercive to warrant this extraordinary mandate.

I.

Background

Amber operates a package-delivery service, concentrated in the Boston area, which specializes in same-day pickup and delivery. During the relevant period, it employed sixteen to eighteen drivers, of whom approximately half worked as "call" drivers and half as "distribution" drivers. The call drivers were essentially free-floating; they picked up packages at designated locations and delivered them to others in accordance with customer orders typically received over a two-way radio from the company dispatcher. The distribution drivers, by contrast, each serviced a specific geographic area, making a daily delivery to customers within that area of packages that had earlier been deposited at Amber's terminal. Both groups of drivers were paid a commission equal to one-third of their daily gross revenues.

In the fall of 1976, Amber decided to convert all of its drivers to owner-operator status, reasoning that such a change would boost productivity and increase profits for company and driver alike. Three steps were required of each driver: (1) purchase of his own vehicle; (2) acquisition of contract carrier authority from the Massachusetts Department of Public Utilities; and (3) execution of a contract carrier agreement with the company. Commissions were increased to fifty percent for call drivers and up to sixty-five percent for distribution drivers depending upon the area served. Amber's president initially designated March 31, 1977 as the deadline for conversion, warning that all who failed to comply would be discharged. By that date, all but five or six drivers were fully converted. Because these remaining drivers claimed to be temporarily unable, rather than entirely unwilling, to undertake the conversion, the deadline was extended. However on June 15, 1977, the four remaining holdouts were discharged[1] and the conversion to owner-operator status was complete.

In mid-April of that year, two drivers—apparently disgruntled with this change in status and with a recently implemented twenty percent reduction in rates (and thus commissions)—contacted a representative of the local teamsters union.[2] Each of them signed a union authorization card designating the union as his "sole and exclusive representative for the purposes of collective bargaining" with Amber, and they each solicited and obtained, over the next several weeks, signed authorization cards from other drivers. On May 11, the union filed a petition with the Board's regional office requesting an election in any employee unit consisting of Amber's drivers and warehousemen. A representation hearing was held several weeks later devoted primarily to whether the drivers—in their new role as owner-operators—constituted employees or independent contracts. This determination was necessitated by section 2(3) of the Act, which specifically excludes from the definition of "employee"—and thus from statutory coverage—any "individual having the status of an independent contractor." 29 U.S.C. § 152(3) (1970). While the regional director's decision was pending, the union on June 20 called a strike at Amber's facility to protest the dismissal of the four drivers who had not converted to owner-operator status. On July 29, the regional director issued his decision, finding that the drivers were employees and directing that an election be held in a unit consisting of "all-distributor and call deliverymen."[3]

Thereafter, in a rather confusing maneuver described in greater detail below, Amber on August 9 moved for reconsideration by the regional director, representing that various "modifications" had been made in the drivers' working conditions, which were sufficient to convert the drivers to independent contractors. On August 26, the regional director vacated his Decision and Direction of Election and reopened the hearing to receive additional evidence "with respect to purported changes made by the Employer in its relationship with its owner-operators." A hearing was conducted on September 1 and 30. On October 12, the union filed the unfair labor practice charges at issue here, challenging the propriety of these "modifications" as well as other actions earlier undertaken by Amber. The regional director has held the representation proceeding in abeyance pending resolution of these charges.

[1] An unfair labor practice charge contesting these dismissals was filed on June 16, 1977 but dismissed one month later by the regional director, who concluded that the discharges were "in accordance with economically motivated plans."

[2] Teamsters Local 25, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America.

[3] More specifically, the unit included "[a]ll distributor and call deliverymen of the Employer at its Malden, Massachusettts facility, excluding part-time warehousemen, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act."

II.

The Drivers' Status Before August 9

We must first decide whether the Board correctly held that, prior to August 9, Amber's drivers were employees and not independent contractors. It is well-established that general principles of agency law govern the distinction between employee and independent contractor for purposes of the Act. E. g., NLRB v. United Ins. Co., 390. U.S. 254, 256, 88 S.Ct. 988, 989, 19 L.Ed.2d 1083 (1968); Seven-Up Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 506 F.2d 596, 597 (1st Cir. 1974). The House Report on the legislation specifically excluding "independent contractor" from the definition of "employee" outlined this distinction as follows:

> "Employees work for wages or salary under direct supervision. "Independent contractors" undertake to do a job for a price, decide how the work will be done, usually hire others to do the work, and depend for their income not upon wages, but upon the difference between what they pay for goods, materials, and labor and what they receive for the end result, that is, upon profits.

H.R.Rep.No.245, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 18 (1947), reprinted in 1 Legislative History of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, at 309 (1948). Thus the Board, in applying the common law test of independence, has looked to the right of control: whether the putative employer has the right to control not only the results sought but also the means by which those results are achieved. E. g., Merchants Home Delivery Service, Inc. v. NLRB, 580 F.2d 966, 973 (9th Cir. 1978); Seven-Up Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 506 F.2d at 597–98; News Syndicate Co., 164 N.L.R.B. 422, 423 (1967). It has also looked to the risk of loss and opportunity for profit and to the degree of "proprietary" interest in, for example, a route or a dealership. E. g., Brown v. NLRB, 462 F.2d 699, 705 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1008, 93 S.Ct.441, 34 L.Ed.2d 301 (1972); EL Mundo, Inc., 167 N.L.R.B. 760, 761 (1967); R. Gorman, Basic Text on Law 30 (1976). The determination of "independence", however, ultimately depends upon an asseassment of "all of the incidents of the relationship * * * with no one factor being decisive." NLRB v. United Ins. Co., 390 U.S. at 258, 88 S.Ct. at 991; see Restatement (Second) of Agency § 220 (1957). Our task on review is to ascertain whether the Board's evaluation of such factors is "supported by substantial evidence when viewed in light of the entire record, including the evidence opposed to the Board's position." Seven-Up Bottling Co. v NLRB, 506 F.2d at 600. So long as the Board's position represents a "choice between two fairly conflicting views," it should be enforced even if this court "would justifiably have made a different choice had the matter been before it de novo." Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 465, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951), quoted in NLRB v. United Ins. Co., 390 U.S. at 260, 88 S.Ct. at 991.

We shall first examine the status of the owner-operators immediately prior to the August 9 changes in their working conditions. As in all but the rarest of cases, there are pertinent factors that cut in both directions. The drivers' ownership of their respective vehicles and the financial obligations attending such arrangement are of course suggestive of independent contractor status; they show that the drivers have invested capital as well as labor in their enterprise, and that they have more than their labor skills alone to sell to others who might hire them. Each owner-operator purchased his vehicle without assistance from Amber. All expenses connected with its operation—including fuel, repairs, taxes and insurance—are borne by the driver. All risks associated with the truck also fall on the owner's shoulders; by contract, he must indemnify Amber for any personal injury claims stemming from the operation of his vehicle, and he is responsible for any damage to freight in his possession. The absence of any guarantee of a minimum daily income or volume of deliveries poses an additional risk to each owner. Compensation is on a commission rather than hourly basis, and the company makes no deductions for unemployment, workmen's compensation, or social security insurance or for income taxes. The drivers receive no holiday or vacation pay. The fact of ownership and the attendant financial arrangements also afford each driver some opportunity for enterpreneurial enterprise, since each reduction in operating costs will provide a corresponding increase in his profit. Each driver in his discretion can decide not to work on any particular day—a freedom that further links his compensation to his personal initiative and effort. Additional indicia of independent contractor status derive from other facets of the drivers' working relationship with Amber. Each driver is free to hire assistants. Each can unilaterally and immediately terminate his contract carrier agreement with Amber by providing written or oral notice—as can the company. Finally, the respective carrier agreements signed by the drivers each explicitly state: "Nothing in this Agreement shall be in any way constured to constitute the [driver], or any of his agents, or employees, as an employee or representative of the Company."

Other factors, however, strongly militate in favor of an employer-employee relationship between Amber and its drivers.

Through a variety of rules, requests and retained powers, Amber exercises, or is capable of exercising, substantial control over the manner in which the drivers perform their deliveries. Each distribution driver services a specific geographic area assigned by the company and, while Amber is free to reassign service areas at any time, the driver is prohibited from expanding or restricting his territorial coverage without permission. Amber not only discusses with the driver any special demands of customers along his delivery route but also specifies the sequence in which deliveries are to be made.[4] Each distribution driver must load his vehicle at night or in the early morning, must report to work no later than 8:00 a. m. (or call in by that time if intending not to work), and is requested to phone the company every two hours during the day in case a pickup or delivery has been ordered in his area. The daily workload of each call driver, or course, is determined largely by the company dispatcher, who transmits customer orders by radio as they are received. Call drivers need not appear at the terminal in the morning but must report their location to the dispatcher by 8:00 a. m. Other requirements and requests evidencing Amber's control apply to both groups of drivers equally. All freight loads assigned by the company must be accepted and must be delivered promptly. Each driver, for the duration of his contractual relationship with Amber, is prohibited from using his vehicle to provide any type of related service elsewhere. The company provides training and orientation programs which the drivers are invited to attend and conducts safety meetings at which attendance is mandatory. Each driver must wear a uniform with the company insignia and must paint his vehicle in the company colors;[5] Amber bears half of the cost of uniforms and the entire cost of painting. A permanent or detachable sign bearing Amber's insignia must also be place on each vehicle. The carrier agreement requires each driver to carry liability and cargo insurance for the company's protection. Finally, any driver is subject to termination for poor performance or as a result of external causes.

Apart from the question of Amber's supervisory powers with respect to the means of physical performance, there are several additional indicia of employee status. The drivers possess no proprietary interest in their respective delivery routes. All customers "belong" not to the drivers but to Amber. They negotiate their rates directly with, and make payments directly to, Amber; the drivers play no role in rate negotiations and handle no money except for an occasional C.O.D. delivery. In addition, the drivers not only receive frequent assistance with loading from Amber employees but occasionally assist other drivers with the loading work—receiving an hourly wage from the company for such effort. Finally, any driver whose contract with Amber is for any reason terminated is prohibited, for the next six months, from providing any type of delivery services to Amber's customers.

[5] It must be noted that, at the representation hearing, there was no evidence presented that the uniform and truck-painting rules were mandatory or that the company dictated the sequence of deliveries for all distribution drivers. Evidence of these requirements derives solely from Amber's subsequent admissions, contained in its motion for reconsideration and in its answer to the unfair labor practices complaint, that as of August 9 such practices were no longer observed. Absent these representations, these subsidiary findings of the ALJ would have been unsupported by substantial evidence. In light of Amber's admissions, we need not decide whether the absence of these elements would have been sufficient to convert the employees to independent contractors.

We believe that the Board could reasonably conclude that these various indicia of employee status outweigh those factors suggesting otherwise. Although the nature of the inquiry here—mandating an assessment of all facets of the working relationship—militates against ready comparisons of other cases, we note that a finding of employee status was upheld in closely related circumstances in NLRB v. Warner, 587 F.2d 896, 899–901 (8th Cir. 1978). Moreover, the instant situation would appear to present a stronger case for such a finding than that involved in Seven-Up Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 506 F.2d 596 (1st Cir. 1974), in which we determined that the distributor-salesmen of the bottling company constituted employees. The circumstances there were closely analogous except that the distributors were generally free to follow their own schedule; received as compensation the difference between the price paid to the company and that charged to customers; were free to set customer prices (although they generally adhered to the company's suggested price list); were responsibile for collecting payments from customers; and possessed (but had never exercised) the freedom to deliver noncompeting products. In contrast to Seven-Up Bottling and other salesmen-distributor cases in which the drivers are at liberty to set customer prices and pursue additional customer accounts, see, e. g., Lorenz Schneider Co. v. NLRB, 517 F.2d 445, 449–50 (2d Cir. 1975); Frito-Lay, Inc. v. NLRB, 385 F.2d 180, 185, 187 (7th Cir. 1967), the drivers here have scant opportunity for realizing additional profits through the exercise of entrepreneurial skill. By setting customer rates, and by regulating the volume of deliveries of each driver through the assignment of geographic areas and the use of a dispatcher, Amber effectively controls the two primary determinants of a driver's income. Moreover, each driver is prohibited from changing his assigned service area and from participating in a competing delivery service during the term of his contract. These constraints provide minimal play for entrepreneurial initiative and minimize the extent to which ownership of the truck gives its driver entrepreneurial independence.

A review of analogous cases also serves to underscore the extensive control exercised by Amber over the manner of physical performance. Six factors are particularly noteworthy in this regard: the drivers must report in by 8:00 in the morning, compare NLRB v. A. Duie Pyle, Inc., 606 F.2d 379, 382 (3d Cir. 1979); Merchants Home Delivery Service, Inc. v. NLRB, 580 F.2d at 974; they cannot refuse assigned loads, compare NLRB v. A. Duie Pyle, Inc., 606 F.2d at 385; Associated Gen. Contractors of Calif., Inc. v. NLRB, 564 F.2d 271, 279 (9th Cir. 1977); Amber specifies the sequence of deliveries for all distribution drivers, compare Merchants Home Delivery Service, Inc. v. NLRB, 580 F.2d at 974; Amber can reassign or modify geographic areas for any reason, see NLRB v. Warner, 587 F.2d at 901; the drivers are prohibited from working for a competing delivery service, compare NLRB v. A. Duie Pyle, Inc., 606 F.2d at 385; Associated Gen. Contractors of Calif., Inc. v. NLRB, 564 F.2d at 280; SIDA of Hawaii, Inc. v. NLRB, 512 F.2d 354, 357 (9th Cir. 1975); and Amber is free to terminate at will its agreement with any driver, see Seven-Up Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 506 F.2d at 599.[6] It is also significant that, before the conversion to owner-operator status had been completed, many of these requirements and other working conditions applied equally to the owner-operators and to those drivers who were concededly company employees. See NLRB v. Warner, 587 F.2d at 901. Moreover, in contrast to Merchants Home Delivery Service, Inc., v. NLRB, 580 F.2d at 974–75, each of the drivers here operates individually rather than as a corporation or partnership.

Finally, we note that the functions performed by the drivers demand little skill, see Restatement (Second) of Agency §202(2)(d) (1957), and constitute a regular and essential part of the company's business operations. See id. § 220(2)(h); Seven-Up Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 506 F.2d at 600. In these circumstances,[7] whether or not we would have reached the same conclusion as an original matter,[8] we find that the Board's judgment represents at minimum "a choice between two fairly conflicting views." NLRB v. United Ins. Co., 390 U.S. at 260, 88 S.Ct. at 991 quoting Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

[6] Amber's contention that each of these constraints is necessary to ensure prompt and efficient delivery services is beside the point; the relevant inquiry here is not limited to those indicia of control that can be considered unessential.

[7] That each driver expressly disclaimed the status of employee in his contract with Amber—although relevant as evidence of "an assumption of control by the one and submission to control by the one and submission to control by the other," Restatement (Second) of Agency § 220, comment m, at 492 (1957)—is by no means dispositive. See, e. g., NLRB v. A. Duie Pyle, Inc., 606 F.2d at 385 n.3; Lorenz Schneider Co. v. NLRB, 517 F.2d at 449.

III.

The Effect of the August 9 Changes

We must next consider whether Amber's efforts to change the employees' status after August 9 succeeded in making them independent contractors and whether these efforts constituted an unfair labor practice. The Board found that Amber on August 9 instituted a series of changes in working conditions, having the general effect of increasing the drivers' discretion over their daily routines. Specifically, the drivers were (1) given the right to refuse loads and to terminate bilaterally their contracts with the company; (2) given the right to report for work at their discretion; (3) given discretion as to route selection within a geographic area; (4) no longer required to wear company colors; (5) no longer assisted by company warehouse employees in loading their vehicles (6) no longer required or permitted to report their hours to the company in the same manner as other employees; and (7) no longer required to attend Amber's safety meetings.[9] The Board determined that these changes were motivated by a desire on Amber's part to thwart the drivers' organizing activities and therefore violated § 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. For this reason, the Board not only refused to consider the changes in its examination of the employee/independent contractor issue but also ordered them rescinded.

It is clear that Amber is free, in the sincere and justifiable exercise of business judgment unrelated to its employees' union activity, to convert its workers to independent contractors notwithstanding that such action has the incidental effect of excluding these persons from the Act's coverage. It is equally clear, however, that Amber is not at liberty to effect such a conversion, or attempt to do so, as an artifice or device for depriving its employees of their statutory right to union representation. "The conversion of employees to independent contractor status is an unfair labor practice when motivated by anti-union animus." United Dairy Farmers Co-op. Assoc. v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 1054, 1063 (3d Cir. 1980). Accord, e.g., Tonkin Corp. of Calif v. NLRB, 420 F.2d 495, 498 (9th Cir. 1969); General Teamsters

[8] In United States v. Silk, 331 U.S. 704, 67 S.Ct. 1463, 91 L.Ed. 1757 (1947), the Supreme Court determined in roughly analogous circumstances that owner-operators working for a trucking company constituted independent contractors for purposes of the Social Security Act. Briefly, the drivers there were obligated by contract to haul exclusively for the company; they were required to furnish their own trucks and all necessary equipment and labor, to pay all operating expenses, to furnish fire, theft and collision insurance, and to indemnify the company for any loss caused to it by their actions; they were paid a commission based on a percentage of the tariff charged to customers; company dispatchers issued orders for the truckers' movements although not as to the routes to be followed; and the contract was terminable at any time by either party. The Court concluded:

> [W]here the arrangements leave the driver-owners so much responsibility for investment and management as here, they must be held to be independent contractors * * *. These driver-owners are small businessmen * * *. It is the total situation, including the risk undertaken, the control exercised, the opportunity for profit from sound management, that marks these driver-owners as independent contractors.

Id. at 719, 67 S.Ct. at 1471. That the Court reached this result is particularly significant in that it applied a more expansive definition of the term "employee" than that applicable here. Relying on its decision in NLRB v. Hearst Publications, Inc., 322 U.S. 111, 64 S.Ct. 851, 88 L.Ed. 1170 (1944), the Court rejected "technical concepts" of agency law as the test for employee status and inquired instead whether the drivers should be included within the statutory scheme in light of the legislation's purposes and as a matter of "economic reality." 331 U.S. at 713, 67 S.Ct. at 1468. Congress, in subsequently amending the National Labor Relations Act to exempt "independent contractors" from coverage, specifically intended to overturn Hearst and to substitute the narrower principles of agency law as the governing test of employee status. E. g., NLRB v. United Ins. Co., 390 U.S. at 256, 88 S.Ct. at 989; Local 777, Democratic Union Organizing Comm. v. NLRB, 603 F.2d 862, 879 n.47, 880 (D.C. Cir. 1978).

Various courts have relied on the Silk decision in support of a finding that owner-operator drivers constitute independent contractors. See, e. g., NLRB v. A. Duie Pyle, Inc., 606 F.2d at 387–88; Merchants Home Delivery Service, Inc. v. NLRB, 580 F.2d at 975–76. While Silk might have persuaded us to reach such a result as an initial matter, it does not compel reversal of the Board's contrary finding here. Not only do several factual distinctions exist, but the result in Silk might well have been different—in light of the applicable scope of review—had the Court been reviewing a Board finding that the drivers constituted employees.

[9] These findings correspond to allegations contained in the union's unfair labor practices complaint that were specifically admitted by Amber in its answer. Although of no great concern, we note that these findings diverge slightly from the "modifications" which Amber earlier listed—and "represent[ed] ha[d] been implemented"—in its motion for reconsideration. Amber made no mention there of any changes in the drivers' right to refuse loads or in their duty to report their time. Conversely, Amber in its motion did represent that the drivers had been given discretion as to when to load their vehicles and were no longer paid an hourly wage for occasionally assisting other drivers with loading; these additional changes were not included in the union's complaint or in the Board's findings.

Chauffeurs & Helpers Local 782 v. NLRB, 373 F.2d 661, 662 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 837, 88 S.Ct. 54, 19 L.Ed.2d 100 (1967); NLRB v. Kelly & Picerne, Inc., 298 F.2d 895, 898 (1st Cir. 1962). Cf. Textile Workers Union v. Darlington Manuf. Co., 380 U.S. 263, 275, 85 S.Ct. 994, 1002, 13 L.Ed.2d 827 (1965) (partial closing of business constitutes unfair labor practice if motivated by purpose to chill unionism in any of employer's remaining plants).[10] Were changes for this sort of reason permissible, an employer might forestall union organizing simply by announcing that, if its employees organize, it will convert them into independent contractors—thus leaving them, should the threat prove effective, with the worst of both worlds. "The critical fact," as this court remarked in NLRB v. Kelly & Picerne, Inc., "is the underlying motive for the respondent's change of business practice." 298 F.2d at 898.

We find substantial evidence for the Board's finding that Amber instituted the August 9 changes not for legitimate business reasons but for the purpose of forestalling the drivers' union activities. At the unfair labor practices hearing, Amber's president sought to characterize these changes as a continuation of the lawful decision, reached prior to the advent of union activity, to convert the drivers to owner-operators. But, the Board found that the conversion to owner-operator status had been completed in June, at which time no further changes were contemplated; as discussed below, Amber makes no attempt on appeal to justify the changes in terms of business reasons. Rather, we find that Amber's action was undertaken in response to—and in an effort to reverse—the regional director's Decision and Direction of Election issued just eleven days earlier. Amber admitted as much in its motive for reconsideration, stating that "[b]ased upon the Decision and Direction of Election rendered on July 29, 1977, the Employer has made certain modifications in its relationship with its owner-operators so that they will be viewed as independent contractors by the Board * * *." Even more illustrative are comments voiced by Amber's predecessor counsel at the reopened representation hearing, as follows:

> [I]t is the Company's intention to make its owner-operators independent contractors as far as this office, the Regional Office, is concerned. And if there is a ruling by the Regional Director that these people, our owner-operators, are > employees, we will make changes—additional changes—until they become independent contractors as far as the Regional Director is concerned. It's unfortunate that there's no way that the Regional Director of this office can advise a company what steps have to be taken in order to make "employees" independent contractors. But this has been the intent of this employer from day one, prior to the filing of the petition; and this is still the intent of the company.

These statements plainly belie any suggestion that Amber's actions represented an exercise of business judgment divorced from union considerations.

Amber responds, not by attempting to justify the August 9 changes, but by asserting that no changes in fact occurred. It explains that the motion for reconsideration constituted a "representational strategy" devised solely as a means of responding to many alleged factual inaccuracies in the regional director's decision. That is to say, Amber believed that these "changes" described circumstances that—contrary to the regional director's findings—were in existence before August 9. Amber essentially argued: "All right, if you say these circumstances did not exist before August 9, they do now because we have 'changed' our working conditions to incorporate them." Although now acknowledged to have been "clearly ill-advised," this action nonetheless must be viewed, Amber claims, as a "good" reason for its claim that changes were made—a reason unrelated to overt discrimination against union activity.

We agree that several of the regional director's factual findings were otherwise unsupported, see note 5 supra; the record also reveals that many others hinged on credibility determinations largely adverse to Amber. But while the company may have had grounds for complaint concerning the regional director's findings of fact, making representations that it believed were inaccurate to the regional director was a less than appropriate means of voicing them. We thus have some difficulty with Amber's characterization of its actions as a "good" reason for the changes. In any event, as Amber now concedes, it is "stuck" with its admissions that theses various changes were in fact implemented. Given the absence of any proffered business justifications for the changes, and considerating the other evidence discussed above and the other unfair labor practices discussed below, we concur in the Board's finding that Amber's actions on August 9 violated the Act.

[10] In the course of discussing an illegal "runaway shop," whereby an employer for antiunion reasons closes a plant and transfers its work to a new or existing plant in another locality, the Court in Darlington noted: "An analogous problem is presented where a department is closed for antiunion reasons but the work is continued by independent contractors." 380 U.S. at 272 n.16, 85 S.Ct. at 1001, citing, inter alia, NLRB v. Kelly & Picerne, Inc., 298 F.2d 895 (1st Cir. 1962).

IV.

The § 8(a)(1) Allegations

We turn next to the alleged "employee coercion" violations.[11] As noted above, the union's petition was filed with the regional director on May 11, 1977 and received by Arthur Brussard, the company president, on May 13. On the following Monday, May 16, Brussard called a meeting of drivers at 8:00 a.m. to ascertain what problems had prompted the filing of the petition. Some twelve to fourteen drivers attended. Various problems, including the conversion to owner-operator status and the reduction in customer rates, were discussed. Brussard make no promises or threats to the assembled drivers, but expressed disappointment that their grievances could not have been handled internally and voiced the hope that a union would be unnecessary. Immediately following the meeting, Brussard approached three drivers, named Pitcher, Marra and Griffin, individually and, without requesting any specific action, inquired whether—or indicated that he would appreciate it if—they could "help him out" in any way. These three drivers had earlier been identified by Clifford Fales, the company dispatcher, as among the parties chiefly responsible for the petition.

The drivers, assembling later that day, compiled and then submitted to Brussard a list of grievances. Brussard called the drivers into his office on May 18 and, in a brief meeting, rejected their demands across the board; he commented that, once the conversion to owner-operator status was completed, the drivers would no longer be employees and their demands would be irrelevant. At approximately 5:00 that afternoon, Brussard called Pitcher to his office and asked him what he thought of the meeting and why none of the drivers had responded. Brussard also remarked that if the election petition were "pulled" before the hearing the company would save $700 in legal fees. Although this last statement was directed to the terminal manager who was also present, Pitcher testified that he felt it was meant for his ears.

On May 23, a meeting was held between Brussard, Griffin and another driver named Sawyer in the latter's apartment. Brussard had requested the meeting in order to "straighten things out." Under discussion was the possibility of the union withdrawing the petition in return for the company redressing the cited grievances. Brussard specifically requested Griffin and Sawyer to pull the petition. They replied that they might be able to persuade the other drivers to do so if their grievances were met. Brussard promised to attempt to meet at least some of their demands.

The Board concluded that the company violated § 8(a)(1) by interrogating Pitcher on May 18 and by soliciting Pitcher, Marra and Griffin on May 16, Pitcher on May 18, and Griffin and Sawyer on May 23 to withdraw support from the union.[12] With one exception, we agree that these actions constitute cognizable—if for the most part borderline—violations of the Act. A finding by the Board of coercive interrogation, based as it must be on an assessment of the entire factual context in which the questioning occurred, see, e.g., NLRB v. Prince Macaroni Mfg. Co., 329 F.2d 803, 806 (1st Cir. 1964), is one in which we typically defer to agency judgment. See, e.g., NLRB v. Otis Hosp., 545 F.2d 252, 256 (1st Cir. 1976); Corriveau & Routhier Cement Block, Inc. v. NLRB, 410 F.2d 347, 349 (1st Cir. 1969). Here, the questioning of Pitcher, a known union supporter, was conducted by the company president in his office with one other supervisor present, and occurred on the same day as a drivers' meeting in the midst of a union organizing campaign. Brussard's queries bore no relation to Pitcher's individual activities, but rather were designed to elicit information about the drivers' union sympathies and their reaction to actions of the company. Although such questioning is not per se unlawful, see, e.g., NLRB v. Douglas Division, Scott & Fetzer Co., 570 F.2d 742, 745 (8th Cir. 1978), we find sufficient factors here not to disturb the Board's finding that it was unlawfully coercive under the circumstances. See, e.g., NLRB v. Otis Hosp., 545 F.2d at 256–57.

[11] Section 8(a)(1) provides: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7 * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1)(1970). Section 7 provides in pertinent part: "Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection * * *." Id. § 157

[12] No impropriety was found in the general meeting conducted by Brussard on May 16.

Like the interrogation of Pitcher, Brussard's actions in soliciting the "help" of Pitcher, Marra and Griffin involved isolated and fleeting conversations containing no obvious threat of retaliation or promise of benefits. Nonetheless, we cannot fault the Board's determination that such conduct violated the Act in that it was to some degree coercive and "calculated to erode employee support for the union." NLRB v. Deutsch Co., 445 F.2d 902, 906 (9th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 988, 92 S.Ct. 1248, 31 L.Ed2d 454 (1972); accord, General Motors Acceptance Corp. v. NLRB, 476 F.2d 850, 855 (1st Cir. 1973); Amalgamated Clothing Workers v. NLRB, 4[illegible]4 F.2d 818, 824 (D.C. Cir. 1970). Admittedly, the solicitations here did not rival in severity the employers' actions at issue in the cited cases—involving the distribution of, and solicitation of signatures for, form letters expressly disavowing union membership. But even a single oblique remark can be considered unduly coercive in appropriate circumstances. Com- pare NLRB v. Pilgrim Foods, Inc., 591 F.2d 110, 114 (1st Cir. 1978), with NLRB v. Rich's of Plymouth, Inc., 578 F.2d 880, 884–85 (1st Cir. 1978). Brussard's inquiries here reasonably could have been interpreted as requests for repudiation of the election petition. Coming as they did from the company president on directed as they were in one-on-one encounters to recognized union sympathizers in a relatively small workforce, these requests can properly be considered violative of the Act. Brussard's comments on May 23, particularly his explicit request that the petition be withdrawn, were obviously even less appropriate. That Griffin and Sawyer may have actively sought—and even initiated—the negotiations with Brussard is unimportant; Amber "was not relieved from its obligations because the employees asked that they be disregarded." Medo Photo Supply Corp. v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 678, 687, 64 S.Ct. 830, 834, 88 L.Ed. 1007 (1944); see, e.g., NLRB v. Pilgrim Foods, Inc., 591 F.2d at 116. We disagree, however, that Brussard violated the Act on May 18 by remarking to a third person, in the presence of Pitcher, that withdrawing the petition would save $700 in legal fees. The record provides no grounds for imputing a coercive undertone to this fleeting and undoubtedly accurate comment.

V.

The § 8(a)(3) Allegation

We next take up the allegation of antiunion discriminatory behavior.[13] On June 3, 1977, call drivers Pitcher, Marra, Griffin, Sawyer and Nicotra reported for work between 7:45 and 8:00 a.m. After loading their vehicles, and in accordance with their customary practice, they visited a diner located approximately one mile from Amber's terminal. For the length of their coffee-break, the drivers were off the air and unable to receive transmissions from Fales, the company dispatcher.[14] Fales testified that, upon receiving several new customer orders, he became concerned about his inability to contact the drivers and suggested to Brussard that they might be at the diner. At approximately 8:30, Brussard drove to the diner and observed all five drivers inside. But rather than speaking with them, he immediately returned to the terminal and instructed Fales to note the time when radio contact was established. When he did succeed in reaching the drivers, beginning at approximately 9:00, Fales made no mention of their diner visit or of his attempts to contact them. At noon that day, Tom Manning, the terminal manager, recommended to Fales that the drivers be suspended. In letters dated June 6, Manning imposed one-day suspensions without pay on Pitcher, Marra and Griffin "for [13] Section 8(a)(3) provides in pertinent part: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—(3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3) (1970).

[14] The ALJ made no finding as to the length of time spent in the diner. Brussard and Fales testified that they were off the air for approximately one hour, but Pitcher, Marra and Griffin each stated they made their customary ten to twenty-five minute stop.

best copy available

going off the air for a 45 minute period * * * without notifying the Dispatcher." Sawyer and Nicotra, being owner-operators, were not considered employees and thus not disciplined. The Board concluded that these suspensions were motivated by antiunion animus rather than business concerns and thus were violative of § 8(a)(3) of the Act. Amber, emphasizing the time-sensitive nature of its delivery service, protests that the suspensions were both business-related and appropriate to the offense.

In a dual motive case such as this, the initial inquiry is whether the Board has made a prima facie showing that a "significant improper motivation" underlay the one-day suspensions. See Statler Indus., Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 902, at 906 (1st Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666, 671 (1st Cir. 1979). Such a showing can rest either on independent evidence of antiunion animus or on the circumstances surrounding the suspensions themselves. Id. at 670. Here, we find the former sufficient to satisfy the Board's initial burden. Amber not only had general knowledge of union activity, see, e. g., NLRB v. South Shore Hosp., 571 F.2d 677, 682 (1st Cir. 1978), but was specifically aware that Pitcher, Marra and Griffin were among the principal union activists. Upon receipt of the election petition, Fales identified these individuals to Brussard as among the parties responsible therefor. And, that Brussard subsequently approached these very three to solicit help underscores his recognition of their key roles in the union campaign. In addition, evidence of improper motivation derives from the various § 8(a)(1) violations discussed above, particularly since they were directed against the same individuals as here. Although not conclusive proof that the suspensions were similarly unlawful, see, e. g., NLRB v. Prince Macaroni Mfg. Co., 329 F.2d at 806, these violations warrant a strong inference of union hostility on the part of Amber. Finally, the timing of the suspensions is important. The decision to discipline these drivers was made three days after the hearing on the representation petition commenced[15] by which time Brussard had undoubtedly realized that his solicitations of these individuals less than three weeks earlier had been futile. We think these factors suffice to establish a "significant improper motivation" for the suspensions.

The burden therefore shifts to Amber "to prove that it had a good reason, sufficient in itself, to produce" the suspensions. Statler Indus., Inc. v. NLRB, at 905, quoting NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d at 671. This shift does not impose an overall burden upon Amber of proving itself "innocent" of violating the statute. Rather, Amber must simply come forward with enough evidence to convince the trier of fact that, under the circumstances, there is no longer a preponderance of evidence establishing a violation. This it has failed to do. Recognizing the inherent demands of the delivery business, we agree with Amber as a general matter that the drivers' conduct here was of a sort that might reasonably warrant disciplinary action. We cannot agree, however, that Amber has demonstrated that such conduct was the reason for the suspensions in this case, to the point where the inference of unlawful activity (drawn from the evidence of improper motive) is overcome (or, strictly speaking, counterbalanced). Brussard himself conceded that the company not only had knowledge of, but acquiesced in, the drivers' practice of stopping for coffee in the morning. He stated that although the drivers had been warned[16] about "dallying," it was "fine" if they "wanted to grab a quick cup of coffee." He also acknowledged that no driver ever before had been suspended for being off the air. In an attempt to depict this incident as an unusual and serious occurrence, Amber contended at the hearing that it encountered problems making deliveries and satisfying customer requests as a result of the driver's actions. But no evidence was introduced that business was lost, the customer complaints were received, or that deliveries were missed or even delayed. And, as the ALJ noted, Brussard's failure to address the drivers a the diner and his request that Fales record the time when contact was established might reasonably be viewed as evidencing "a greater concern for documenting the delay than for expediting pick up and delivery." For these reasons, we think the Board was justified in rejecting Amber's cited justification for the suspensions and in finding a violation of § 8(a)(3).

[15] The hearing was conducted on two days, Tuesday, May 31 and the following Monday, June 6. Amber decided on Friday, June 3 to suspend the drivers and notified them of this action the next Monday.

[16] Pitcher, Marra and Griffin each testified, contrary to Brussard's statement, that they had never been warned about stopping for coffee or being off the air. The ALJ failed to resolve this dispute.

VI.

The Propriety of the Bargaining Order

Finally, we turn to the relief that the Board ordered. Stressing Amber's "antipathy to the collective-bargaining process," the Board concluded that the unfair labor practices had undermined employee free choice to the extent that a free election was unlikely. Consequently, after finding that a majority of the employees had signed valid authorization cards,[17] the Board affirmed the issuance of a bargaining order as a necessary means of protecting employee sentiment. Although fully cognizant of the deference normally accorded to the Board's expertise in fashioning remedies, NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1939, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1960); NLRB v. Pilgrim Foods, Inc., 591 F.2d at 120, on this point we differ.

The interrogation and the various acts of solicitation constituted borderline violations having minimal impact on the election process. Brussard made no threat of reprisal and exerted no direct coercion at any time. His only unambiguous requests and promises were voiced at the May 23 meeting to individuals who—far from being intimidated—actively sought and possibly initiated the negotiations. Moreover, Pitcher, at whom Brussard's actions seemed principally directed, is no longer in Amber's employ.[18] The one-day suspensions, of course, were not borderline violations of the Act. And, as the Board notes, the fact that they occurred at the height of the union campaign undoubtedly magnified their coercive effect, particularly given the small size of the employee unit. See, e.g., Ann Lee Sportswear, Inc. v. NLRB, 543 F.2d 739, 744 (10th Cir. 1976). Nonetheless, these actions were neither severe nor permanent. And again, Pitcher, one of the three drivers suspended, is no longer an employee. In Pilgrim Foods, we vacated a bargaining order involving an eight-member employee unit notwithstanding that the employer had unlawfully cancelled a scheduled wage increase, solicited and promised to remedy grievances, threatened reprisals, and discharged an employee. 591 F.2d at 114–20. The one-day suspensions at issue here plainly provide less warrant for this "extreme" remedy. NLRB v. Matouk Indus., Inc., 582 F.2d 125, 130 (1st Cir. 1980).

In justifying its order, the Board places principal reliance on the August 9 changes in working conditions and the statements made by Amber's former counsel in connection therewith. However, we fail to see how these actions have irrevocably tainted the election machinery. Admittedly, Amber's attempt to counteract the regional director's finding of employee status evidenced a hostility toward the union.[19] But the record makes clear that Amber hit upon this device, not because it was out to "get" the union "at all costs," but rather because it mistakenly believed that these changes (or at least the alleging of these changes) provided a lawful method of demonstrating that the employees did not qualify for union status. Now that it is plain that they do so qualify, we see no reason in the record for believing that Amber's past conduct, or its likely future conduct as evidenced by its past actions, would prevent an election from properly manifesting the uncoerced will of the majority. The Board points to the promise of future action voiced by Amber's counsel as evidence that the unfair labor practices are likely to recur. Given the unusual candor of these comments, arguably the more supportable inference is that Amber, or at least its counsel, failed to appreciate the unlawfulness of the proposed changes. We do not see how these statements, examined in the context of the entire record, evidence an intention of Amber's part to disobey the subsequently imposed cease and desist order. Even if they can be considered an accurate reflection of Amber's frame of mind at that time, counsel's comments neither mentioned nor implied future retaliation or other coercive measures. Nor does an expressed intent to seek to change the status of employees to bring them out from under the Act obviously or necessarily imply an intent to interfere later with their subjective freedom of choice. In these circumstances, we think the holding of a fair election—which constitutes the "preferred" method of determining a bargaining unit's representative, NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. at 602, 89 S.Ct. at 1934—remains a viable option.

[17] The Board found that, as of May 11 when the election petition was filed, nine of the seventeen drivers then employed by Amber had signed valid authorization cards designating the union as their collective-bargaining representative. Amber advances several challenges to this finding of majority status, which we reject.

[18] Pitcher was one of the four drivers lawfully discharged on June 15 for failing to convert to owner-operator status. It should be noted that the discharge of these drivers dissipated the union's card-based majority status. Although this fact does not preclude issuance of a bargaining order. see, e. g., United Dairy Farmers Co-op. Assoc. v. NLRB, F.2d at 1069, it is a relevant factor bearing on the propriety of such an order, see, e. g., NLRB v. Jamaica Towing, Inc., 632 F.2d 208, 214, 216 (2d Cir. 1980); Chromalloy Mining & Minerals Alaska Div. v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 1120, 1132–33 (5th Cir. 1980), and it reinforces the conclusion we reach here.

[19] Dislike of unions, of course, "is not uncommon among employers." NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d at 670. It should also be noted that Amber had good reason for its initial lack of enthusiasm for the union campaign. As is evident from our discussion of this issue, Amber reasonably could have believed that the unlawful change to owner-operator status had also worked a conversion of its drivers to independent contractors.

Enforced in part and vacated in part.

Big Y Foods, Inc. v. NLRB

651 F.2d 40 (1st Cir.), June 11, 1981—251 NLRB 869

On petition to review and set aside Board Order

Before Coffin, Chief Judge, Bownes, Circuit Judge, and Wyzanski, Senior District Judge*

Wyzanski, Senior District Judge: This case is before the Court on a petition to review and set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") based upon alleged violations of §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act ("Act"), 29 U.S.C. §§ 151-68, directing the petitioner, Big Y Foods, Inc. ("the Company") to bargain with the Amalgamated Meat Cutters, Food Handlers and Affiliated Workers of North America, Local Union 33, a/w Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workers of North America AFL-CIO ("Meat Cutters") which was certified, following an election, as the representatives of meat department employees in 11 of the Company's stores. The Board had cross-petitioned for enforcement of its decision and order.

The Company contends that the order is invalid because a unit of employees in the meat departments of the Company's 11 stores does not constitute an appropriate bargaining unit within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

The proceedings before the NLRB began when on August 16, 1971 the Retail Store Employees Union, Local 1459, Retail Clerks International Association, AFL-CIO ("Retail Clerks") filed in Case 1-RC-11708 a petition seeking to represent an overall unit of grocery and meat department employees at the Company's 11 unrepresented stores. On August 16, 1976 the Meat Cutters filed in Case 1-RC-14664 a petition seeking to represent a unit limited to the Company's meat department employees at the same 11 unrepresented stores. On September 22, 1976 the NLRB's Regional Director ordered a consolidation of the two cases. Thereafter, he held a hearing at which there was evidence to the following effect.

The Company, a Massachusetts corporation, operates in Western Massachusetts a chain of 16 supermarkets for the retail sale of meats, groceries, and other food products.

Before the petitions were filed with the NLRB none of the employees in 11 of those stores had been represented for collective bargaining. There are employed in those 11 stores 850 to 1,000 persons, of whom 72 are the so-called "meat department employees" involved in this case. That group breaks down into 11 head meat cutters, 8 meat cutters, 18 apprentice meat cutters, and 35 meat wrappers and clerks.

In 5 of the Company's stores not covered by the petitions the employees in all departments have been for 10 years covered by collective bargains between their representative, Meat Cutters Union, and the Company.

The Company is centrally operated. The administrative activities of all 16 stores and their records are handled exclusively at the central office. Virtually every major management decision concerning the stores—including labor relations policies, advertising, merchandising, pricing, physical layout of the stores, hours of operation, hiring, wage scales, promotions, discipline and transfers—are under the direct control and supervision of the personnel in the central office. That office employs specialists for each department who not only coordiate purchasing, but also regularly visit the stores in order to supervise merchandising and, in general, oversee the operation of the various departments. In this latter respect, these specialists work in conjunction with the store managers.

*Of the District of Massachusetts, sitting by designation.

All the employees in the 11 unrepresented stores receive the same fringe benefits such as leave time, holidays and insurance. Seniority for layoff purposes and benefit levels is based on service in all departments. Working hours for all employees are the same.

All the foregoing policies and procedures apply to employees in the meat department of the 11 stores as well as to other employees.

The meat department in each store is the only department that has a formal apprenticeship program. Under it, employees a number of whom began as meat clerks, are trained as meat cutters primarily by on-the-job training. Substantially higher wages are paid to meat cutters than to meat clerks.

Meat cutters are not trained to work in other departments, are never transferred temporarily or permanently to other departments, and have little contact with employees of other departments.

Meat clerks may be transferred to serve permanently or temporarily in other departments. When in the meat department, they work in close association with meat cutters; they clean equipment used in the meat department, process some meat, wrap meat, receive customers' requests for special cuts, supply new product to cutters, and stock meat in display cases. When transferred to other departments, meat clerks are associated with and do work similar to clerks regularly employed in those departments.

Not only may meat clerks serve either permanently or temporarily in other departments, but clerks from other departments may serve permanently or temporarily in the meat department. Each transfer which is in excess of 30 days is called "permanent"; transfers for shorter periods of service are called "temporary."

In the year 1974 there were permanent transfers from the meat department of 5 persons (of whom one, Lowell, had earlier in the year been transferred from the delicatessen department) and to the meat department of 41 persons. In the year 1975 there were permanent transfers from the meat department of 5 persons and to the meat department of 41 persons. In the year 1976 up to September 25, there were permanent transfers from the meat department of 25 persons (of whom some had earlier been transferred from other departments to the meat department) and to the meat department of 22 persons (of whom some had earlier been transferred from the meat department to other departments). See Exs. 6, 7, and 8.

With respect to temporary transfers, Ex. 9 shows that there were in 1976 up to August 16, 1976 1,353 interdepartmental interchanges between the meat department and other departments. Interchanges occurred almost every week. Some of the transfers were for only a few hours.

After taking the foregoing evidence, the Regional Director transferred the case to the Board.

On September 29, 1978 the Board issued its Decision and Direction of Elections. It did not purport finally to exercise its powers under § 9(b) of the Act.[1] Instead, it found that for purposes of collective bargaining, "the meat department employees at the Employer's 11 unrepresented stores * * * may constitute an appropriate unit" (emphasis added) and "a storewide unit, including the meat department, would also be appropriate" (emphasis added) (A. 8–9, fourth paragraph). The decision then directed the creation of two voting groups: Unit A, including all meat department employees in the 11 stores who "shall vote whether they desire to be represented by Meat Cutters, Retail Clerks, or no union"; and Unit B, including all other employees in the 11 stores who "shall vote whether or not they desire to be represented by Retail Clerks." (A.14) The only other now relevant direction by the Board provided that: "If the majority of the employees in voting group A select Meat Cutters, they shall be deemed to have indicated their desire to constitute a separate bargaining unit, and the Regional Director shall issue a certification of representative for such group, which the Board under the circumstances finds to be an appropriate unit for collective bargaining." (A.14)

[1] The NLRB recited in its September 29, 1978 decision "* * * we make no final unit determination at this time, but we shall first ascertain the desires of the employees as expressed in the elections directed below." (A.9)

On November 3, 1978, the Retail Clerks, reciting that they and the Meat Cutters "have reached agreement on a merger," filed a motion to amend the Direction of Elections, requesting that its name be withdrawn from the ballot in Unit A and that separate elections be conducted in the two units. The Company filed an objection to the motion. On December 29, 1978, the Board issued an Order and Amended Direction of Elections granting the Retail Clerks' motion to withdraw from the ballot. Thereafter, on January 23, 1979, the Retail Clerks requested that its petition in Case 1-RC-11708 be withdrawn entirely.

On January 26, 1979, a secret ballot election in Unit A was conducted pursuant to the Board's Order. The Union won the election by a vote of 34 to 30, with 2 challenged ballots. On February 1, 1979, the Regional Director issued an order severing cases and permitting withdrawal of the Retail Clerks' petition with prejudice, thus eliminating the election in Unit B.

On January 2, 1980, the Board issued its Decision and Certification of Representative certifying the Union as the collective bargaining representative of the Company's meat department employees.

Following its certification, the Union requested that the Company commence collective bargaining, but the Company refused. Thereafter, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge and, on March 26, 1980, the Board's Regional Director issued a complaint alleging that the Company had refused to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. In its answer, the Company admitted its refusal to bargain, but challenged the validity of the Board's certification on the ground that the bargaining unit was inappropriate. On April 28, 1980, the General Counsel moved for summary judgment. On August 28, 1980, the Board granted the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment, found that the Company had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union after it had been certified as the bargaining agent in an appropriate unit, and ordered the Company to cease and desist from engaging in the unfair labor practice found and to bargain with the Union upon request.

The Company petitions this court to set aside the Board's August 28, 1980 order on the ground that the Board's January 2, 1980 certification determining that the appropriate unit for collective bargaining consisted of the employees in the meat department of the Company's 11 unrepresented stores was arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, and lacking in substantial evidentiary support and that therefore the Board's August 28, 1980 order is invalid.

1. The NLRB's authority to determine the appropriate unit rests on § 9(b) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 159(b) which provides that:

> "The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to assure to employees the fullest freedom in exercising the rights guaranteed by this Act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or subdivision thereof * * *." (Emphasis added.)

With respect to § 9(b)[2], the Supreme Court in Packard Motor Car Co. v. NLRB, 330 U.S. 485, 491–492, 67 S.Ct. 789, 793, 91 L.Ed. 1040 (1947) held that:

> "The issue as to what unit is appropriate for bargaining is one for which no absolute rule of law is laid down by statute, and none should be by decision. It involves of necessity a large measure of informed discretion, and the decision of the Board, if not final, is rarely to be disturbed. While we do not say that a determination of a unit of representation cannot be so unreasonable and arbitrary as to exceed the Board's power, we are clear that the decision in question does not do so. That settled, our power is at an end."

A court may set aside an NLRB § 9(b) determination only if the Board has not disclosed the basis of its determination,[3] or the determination is not supported by substantial evidence,[4] or the determination is in violation of the Act,[5] or some other statute or the Constitution, or is arbitrary or unreasonable.[6]

[2] Packard Motor Car Co. v. NLRB, 330 U.S. 485, 67 S.Ct. 789, 91 L.Ed. 1040 (1947) interpreted § 9(b) as originally enacted by the Act of July 5, 1935, 49 Stat. 453. That interpretation applies to § 9(b) as amended. South Prairie Construction Co. v. Local No. 627, International Union of Operating Engineers, 425 U.S. 800, 805, 96 S.Ct. 1842, 1844, 48 L.Ed.2d 382 (1976).

2. The Company contends that "the mechanical application of an invalid legal 'presumption' was used to determine the unit in question."

We reject the contention.

In no sense did the NLRB proceed mechanically. Adhering to the principle set forth in Mock Road Super Duper, Inc., 156 NLRB 983, 984 (1966) [order enforced in NLRB v. Mock Road Super Duper, Inc., 393 F.2d 432 (6th Cir. 1968)] that "as in other industries, the determination of the appropriate unit in the retail food industry must rest upon analysis of all the relevant factors,"—the NLRB in its September 29, 1978 decision considered[7] each of the factors relevant to the determination of an appropriate unit in this case.

Nonetheless, the Company is correct in charging that the NLRB used a "presumption" to determine the unit question. After setting forth some factors favorable to an overall or storeswide unit, the Board stated:

> Nothwithstanding these factors which would appear to militate in favor of an overall employee unit, it is well settled that a separate meat department unit is pesumptively appropriate. (See e. g., Quality Markets, Inc., 129 NLRB 904 (1960); Hy-Vee Food Stores, Inc., 176 NLRB 54, 60 (1969), and cases cited therein.) In order to determine whether the presumption survives or is rebutted on a particular set of facts, a number of factors must be considered. (A. 6). (parenthetical material appears in the original text as a footnote; emphasis added.)

After considering further factors, the NLRB made the following finding:

> In consideration of the foregoing, we find that the Employer has failed to rebut the presumptive appropriateness of a meat department unit. We find, therefore, that the meat department employees at the Employer's unrepresented stores, including the head meatcutters, meatcutters, apprentice meatcutters, and meat clerks and wrappers, may constitute an appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining. (A. 8), (footnotes omitted; emphasis added.)

Those quotations show that the NLRB applied a presumption under which an NLRB finding that a meat department exists in a multi-department retail food store justifies a determination that the meat department is an appropriate unit unless an opponent proves that in the particular circumstances it is not an appropriate unit. This presumption is a substantive, not a procedural, presumption such as is set forth in F. Rules Ev. 301; it is a rebuttable, not a conclusive, or, as is sometimes said, e.g. in NLRB v. St. Francis Hospital of Lynwood, 601 F.2d 404, 414 (9th Cir. 1979), a per se presumption; unless rebutted, it leads from a proved fact or set of facts directly to an administrative determination,[8] and not merely to a presumed fact intermediate to a final decision, such as the presumptions involved in Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6, 32–54, 89 S.Ct. 1532, 1546–1557, 23 L.Ed.2d 57 (1969). It does no more than to shift the burden of proof. NLRB v. Baptist Hospital, Inc., 442 U.S. 773, 781, 99 S.Ct. 2598, 2603, 61 L.Ed.2d 251 (1979).

This presumption is subject to judicial review "for consistency with the Act, and for rationality." Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483, 501, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 2473, 57 L.Ed.2d 370; NLRB v. Baptist Hospital Inc., supra, 442 U.S. 787, 99 S.Ct. 2606.

The Act vests in the NLRB extraordinarily broad discretionary powers to decide the appropriate unit. See Packard Motor Car Co. v. NLRB, supra. The only pertinent limitation is the § 9(b) statutory direction to the NLRB to make a decision

[7] The text of the NLRB's September 29, 1978 decision shows that in determining that the meat department was an appropriate unit, the Board considered that the Company's entire chain is centrally operated, that its personnel policies are centrally developed and administered, that all employees receive the same fringe benefits, that only the meat department has a formal apprenticeship program, that meat cutters and apprentice meat cutters receive higher wages than clerks, that meat cutters are never permanently or temporarily transferred out of the meat department and have almost no contract with employees of other departments, that the work of meat clerks is closely integrated with the work of meat cutters, that permanent transfers of meat clerks to other areas of the store are relatively infrequent, and that it is not uncommon for a meat department clerk who had been transferred to be reassigned, and that there was no bargaining history involving the employees of the 11 stores.

[8] Under Professor J.R. Thayer's classification originally made in a pamphlet on the The Presumption of Innocence and now available in 2 Bouvier's Law Dictionary (1914) 2679, the presumption in the case at bar is a presumption of the third type, that is, one "where a fact or set of facts makes out a case which shall stand until overthrown by a specific quantity of evidence * * * "

"in each case." NLRB v. St. Francis Hospital, supra; Long Island College Hospital v. NLRB, 566 F.2d 833, 840–41 (2nd Cir. 1977), cert. den., 435 U.S. 996, 98 S.Ct. 1647, 56 L.Ed.2d 84 (1978); Memorial Hospital of Roxborough v. NLRB, 545 F.2d 351, 360–362 (3rd Cir. 1976). It has been held that that statutory direction invalidates a conclusive presumption because it precludes the NLRB from making a determination based upon the unique circumstances of a particular group of employees. NLRB v. St. Francis Hospital, supra. But that statutory direction does not invalidate a rebuttable presumption which has no such preclusive effect.

"The validity of a presumption depends upon the rationality between what is proved and what is inferred." Republic Aviation Corp v. NLBR, 324 U.S. 793, 804–805, 65 S.Ct. 982, 988–989, 89 L.Ed. 1372; Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, supra, 437 U.S. 511, 98 S.Ct. 2478; NLRB v. Baptist Hospital, Inc., supra, 442 U.S. 787, 99 S.Ct. 2606. Where an NLRB presumption reflects the Board's experience in similar cases, it is likely to be rational. Republic Aviation Corp., v. NLRB, supra.

The reasonableness of a presumption may be proved by matters other than the testimonial evidence in the case in which the presumption is used. Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6, 32–34, 89 S.Ct. 1532, 1546–1547, 23 L.Ed.2d 57 (1969); NLRB v. Metropolitan Life. Co., supra;[9] Memorial Hosipital of Roxborough v. NLRB, supra, 357.

The reasonableness of this presumption is demonstrated both by the two cases—Quality Markets, Inc. and HY-Vee Food Stores, Inc., both supra—which the NLRB cited as the basis of its presumtion—and by myriad cases to the same effect—all revealing "the emerging bargaining trend in the retail food industry generally, whereby grocery employees and meat department employees are represented in separate units."[10] R.N. Market, Inc., 190 NLRB 292 (1971).

NLRB v. Purity Food Stores, Inc., 376 F.2d 497, 501 (1st Cir. 1967) upon which the Company relies for its statement that the presumption in the case at bar is "invalid" is plainly distinguishable. Judge Woodbury, in holding that the NLRB had not articulated substantial reasons for its determination of an appropriate unit, said that "a simple declaration that single store units are considered 'presumptively appropriate' adds nothing" to the NLRB's decision. If we assume that in Purity Foods the NLRB did invoke a presumption that a single store unit was an appropriate unit, the NLRB failed to show that there were supporting facts in our outside the record which made the presumption reasonable. Indeed, Judge Woodbury stated that the only relevant case indicated that the single store was not an appropriate unit.

3. The Company contends that the Board was unreasonable in not giving any weight to the over 10-year successful bargaining history between the Company and the Meat Cutters as representative of the employees in the 5 stores not involved in these proceedings. The NLRB in its September 29, 1978 opinion gave the obviously correct answer to that contention: what the Company and the Meat Cutters did with respect to employees in 5 stores acquired from Growers Outlet is not part of the bargaining history of the employees in the instant case.

4. The Company places great emphasis on its contention that the NLRB has minimized the importance of the transfer of employees from and to the meat department. For the following reasons we reject that contention.

The significance of the transfers is to be measured against the framework of the pleadings. The Co.,* 380 U.S. 438, 443, 85 S.Ct. 1061, 1064, 13 L.Ed.2d 951 (1965) held that "In articulating the 'basis for its order,' the Board is free to refer 'to other decisions or its general policies laid down in its rules and its annual reports." Id. at 443 n.6; 85 S.Ct. at 1062.

[10] Before its September 29, 1978 decision, the NLRB had had a large number of cases involving meat departments in multi-department stores. The overwhelming majority of those cases resulted in a determination that the meat department was, within the meaning of § 9(b), "the unit appropriate." See, e.g., Quality Markets, Inc., 129 NLRB 904, 905 (1960); Mock Road Super Duper, Inc., 156 NLRB 983 (1966) [order enforced in NLRB v. NLRB, 426 F.2d 763 (8th Cir. 1970)]) "the Board has traditionally held separate meat departments to be appropriate units"); Primrose Super Market of Malden, Inc., 178 NLRB 566 (1969); R.N. Market, Inc., 190 NLRB 292 (1971); C & E Stores, Inc., 229 NLRB 1250 (1977) ("The Board has normally found appropriate a unit of grocery employees excluding meat department employees.")

NLRB had before it petitions seeking a determination as to only an alternative between a unit composed of all meat department employees and a unit composed of all employees in all 11 stores; no one proposed that meat clerks should be a separate unit.

In that framework, the majority of the meat department consisted of meat cutters who were never transferred temporarily or permanently. There was no evidence as to what percentage of the individuals regularly employed as meat clerks was transferred out of the meat department temporarily or permanently.[11] There was no evidence as to what percentage of a transferred meat clerk's time annually was spent away from the meat department. There was no evidence that any transferred meat clerk failed to return to the meat department. There were corresponding gaps in the evidence with respect to individuals regularly employed in other departments who were transferred to the meat departments. Thus the evidence as to the transfers came down to a showing that a substantial number of meat clerks spent part of their time in other departments and a substantial number of clerks from other departments spent part of their time in the meat department.

If the NLRB's finding that the "interchange between meat clerks and personnel in the other four areas of the stores * * * is minimal at best and generally occurs on an emergency basis" had meant that there was only a small number of people involved, the finding would be false, especially in light of 1,353 temporary transfers in the first 7½ months of 1976. However, the finding was made in a context in which the NLRB was looking at the effect of temporary transfers upon the meat clerks, not upon the employer. With respect to meat clerks, there were many reasons why the NLRB was justified in finding that the temporary transfers were of minimal significance: the relevant exhibit, Ex. 9, showed nothing more than that to meet emergencies an uncounted number of meat clerk's had been transferred in an uncounted number of transfers for an uncounted percentage of each transferred meat clerk's annual working time; there was no proof that any transferred meat clerk remained out of the meat department; it was not at once apparent how many meat clerks were involved in the transfers; more important, it was not indicated how many of the persons regularly employed as meat clerks in the meat department were never transferred; and there was a corresponding want of clear proof as to the number and percentage of clerks from other departments who were transferred to the meat department. So far as it appears, only a fringe element of meat clerks was involved in the transfers, and that fringe element of meat clerks had no roots in other departments. Nor was it shown that a large percentage of clerks from other departments had contact with meat clerks.

The Company cannot rightly claim that the NLRB failed to give full and fair consideration to the magnitude of the transfers as viewed from the employer's angle. Aware that the Company saw the transfers as indicative of managerial integration of the 11 stores, the NLRB in its September 29, 1978 decision recited that: "The record indicates that interdepartmental transfers, both temporary and permanent, occur and that certain meat department personnel have been involved in these transfers." The NLRB then explicitly ruled that that was one of the "factors" which would "appear to militate in favor of an overall employee unit." (A.5)

It was not unreasonable for the NLRB in determining the appropriate unit to give greater weight to the views of employees—whether meat cutters or meat clerks or both—than to the views of the employer as to the importance of the transfers. Particularly in light of the § 9(b) declaration that the NLRB is to "decide each case * * * in order to assure to employees the fullest freedom in exercising the rights guaranteed by this Act," the Board is entitled to give greater weight to the employees' than to the employer's view of the appropriate boundaries of the unit.[12] Nothing that we held or said in NLRB v. Purity Food Stores, Inc., 354 F.2d 926, 931 (1st Cir. 1965) is to the contrary. There we merely indicated that "We believe, also, that there should be some minimum consideration given to the employer's side of the picture, the feasibility, and disruptive effects of piecemeal unionization." (Emphasis added.)

---

[11] The figures with respect to "permanent" transfers show only how many individuals were transferred but do not show how many were not. The figures as to temporary transfers do not even make clear how many individuals were transferred.

[12] In NLRB v. The Western and Southern Life Ins. Co., 391 F.2d 119, 123 (3 Cir. 1968), it was held > "* * * that the overriding policy of the Act is in favor of the interest in employees to be represented by a representative of their own choosing for the purposes of collective bargaining, and the Board was entitled to give their interest greater weight than that accorded to the employer in bargaining with the largest, and presumably most convenient possible unit * * *."

This principle was followed in Michigan Hospital Service Corp. v. NLRB 472 F.2d 293-296 (6th Cir. 1972).

We conclude that the NLRB was not unreasonable in not having given greater weight to the Company's view of the transfers of employees between the meat department and other departments.[13] Whether we ourselves would have done so is wholly irrelevant; all that we as a reviewing court are authorized to consider is whether the administrative agency failed to give fair and reasonable consideration to the relevant factors; the weight assigned by the agency to each factor it has fairly considered is a matter for it to determine. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464-465, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power v. NRDC, 435 U.S. 519, 558, 98 S.Ct. 1197, 1219, 55 L.Ed.2d 460 (1978); Strycker's Bay Neighborhood Council v. Karlen, 444 U.S. 223, 227-228, 100 S.Ct. 497, 499-500, 62 L.Ed.2d 433 (1980).

5. The NLRB was not arbitrary in not applying in the instant case its holding in Pueblo International, Inc. d/b/a Pueblo and Local 568, Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of Puerto Rico, AFL-CIO, 203 NLRB 629, 83 LRRM 1154 (1973). In that case the critical fact—wholly absent from the instant case—was that the employees there involved had a history of collective bargaining as part of an established multi-department unit.

6. The Company's contention that § 9(c)(5) has a bearing on this case has no merit inasmuch as "the extent to which the employees had been organized" was not one of the factors which the NLRB considered in making its determination. Whatever may have been the agreements between the Meat Cutters union and the Retail Clerks union, the NLRB did not take them into account in deciding that the Meat Department was the appropriate unit.

NLRB v. Sheraton Puerto Rico Corp., d/b/a Puerto Rico Sheraton Hotel

651 F.2d 49 (1st Cir.), June 11, 1981—248 NLRB 867

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before COFFIN, Chief Judge, CAMPBELL and BREYER, Circuit Judges

49

BREYER, Circuit Judge: This case is before the court upon the application of the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of its April 1, 1980 order issued against Sheraton Puerto Rico Corp.[1] The Board found that Sheraton violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by discharging four employees, two of whom Sheraton claimed were supervisors, for signing a letter to the president of Sheraton protesting working conditions at the Puerto Rico Sheraton Hotel under General Manager Arnold Orenstein and requesting Orenstein's dismissal. The text of the letter is reprinted in full in Appendix A to this opinion. The Board also found that Sheraton violated section 8(a)(1) by discharging seven supervisory or managerial employees for their participation in the letter where the discharges tended to interfere with employees' rights under section 7.[2] The Board's order requires Sheraton to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found and from interfering with employees' statutory rights. The Board's order also requires Sheraton to reinstate and make whole the 11 discharged individuals and to post an appropriate notice. Because we find a lack of substantial evidence that sending the letter was activity protected by section 7, we deny enforcement of the Board's order.

In those cases the limited functions of the meat cutters, the absence of an apprentice program, and adequate proof of how an extensive interchange of meat department and other employees affected the percentage of a meat clerk's time spent out of the meat department constituted special circumstances not present here. The factual differences in the cases justified the NLRB in reaching different determinations of the appropriate unit.

[2] The Board also found that Sheraton violated section 7 by coercively interrogating and threatening to discharge employees and by discriminatorily denying access to the hotel's public areas to dischargees.

I.

The facts of this case are essentially undisputed. In August 1974 Arnold Orenstein was appointed general manager of the Puerto Rico Sheraton. At the time the hotel was failing and had an accumulated loss of over $11 million. By 1977, the hotel was reporting an annual profit of over $1 million. Yet there was discord among the managerial staff. In March 1977, several supervisory employees met, discussed two recently circulated anonymous letters hostile to Mr. Orenstein, and decided to draft an open letter, criticizing him, that would be sent to his superiors in Boston. After consulting an attorney, they formed a steering committee with themselves as members. The committee was composed of:

Ramon Castro	Credit Manager
Armando Gutierrez	Executive Assistant Manager
Rodrigo Rodrigues	Banquet Sales Representative
Fofito Vasquez	position unidentified in the record [3]

They then drafted the March 25 letter—printed in Appendix A—with the help of two more supervisory employees:

Angel Gutierrez	Guest Service Manager
Joan Rodriguez	Reservations Manager

On March 25, at a meeting at Fofito Vasquez's house, the committee met with various supervisory and non-union, non-supervisory employees seeking signatures. Ultimately, they obtained 22 signatures; 4 were written at the bottom of the last page of the letter; and 18 were written on a blank piece of paper attached to the letter. The signed copies were sent on March 29 to the president of the Sheraton Hotel Corporation and three other chain executives.

The letter itself, as a reading of it will verify, starts by listing eight factors apart from Mr. Orenstein's work that helped the hotel become profitable. It then lists eight problems: (1) inadequate communication between Mr. Orenstein and the hotel staff, "communication being the basis of a sound, strong management", (2) "innovations for better management" are discouraged, (3) an insufficient number of staff meetings, (4) Mr. Orenstein's "closed door policy", (5) "promotions, salary scales and working conditions * * * includ[ing] company car, expense account, room and board" which discriminate against employees with Spanish surnames, (6) cost control that is too stringent, to the point where one must have Mr. Orenstein's approval "for rubber bands or pencils", (7) persons in key positions being given responsibility without adequate authority, (8) an inadequate plan for selling the hotel's services to the public. The letter concludes by suggesting that Mr. Orenstein be replaced.

When Mr. Orenstein heard about the letter, he called in those who had signed it, determined to his satisfaction that many of the employees did not know of (or would not stand by) its contents, and fired those that did for "insubordination", by which term he says he meant their failure to come to him before writing to his superiors. In addition to the five supervisors previously mentioned, he fired two other supervisory employees:

Francisco Acevedo Padilla	Guest Service Manager
Amos Langer	Head Waiter

two persons whom the hotel claims were supervisors but the Administrative Law Judge found were not:

Victor Pena	Food Clerk
Edgardo Pena	Engineering Supervisor

and two secretaries:

Bonnie Salvador
Carmen Bermudez.

A few days after these discharges, which took place around April 11, Mr. Orenstein sent a memorandum to all employees, discussing the "events of last week where several supervisory people were dismissed." In the memorandum he likened himself to a ship's captain faced with a mutiny and made clear he expected those with similar complaints in the future to come to him before writing to the firm's president. (The text of this memorandum is set out in Appendix B.)

[3] Fofito Vasquez is not an alleged discriminatee. The only information about him in the record is that he was discharged at approximately the same time the eleven alleged discriminatees were discharged for threatening to "kill" Orenstein, a threat he made while brandishing a pipe in a dispute with Personnel Director Mario Perez.

On the basis of these facts, the two documents, and very little other testimony, the Administrative Law Judge found that bettering employee working conditions was a significant object of the March 25 letter, that the writing and sending of the letter was "legitimate concerted activity by employees for mutual aid and protection" protected by section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, and that discharging the supervisors would discourage ordinary employees from engaging in legitimate concerted activity. The Board accepted the Administrative Law Judge's findings and ordered reinstatement of the seven superivsory, and four ordinary, employees.

II.

Before determining whether the Board's findings are adequately supported and within the bounds of the law, we note that the essential problem of this case stems from the fact that most of those concerned are supervisors. We therefore must begin with the Taft-Hartley Act, a specific determination by Congress to reverse the NLRB's (and the Supreme Court's) holding that supervisors might fall within the Labor Act's protections. See Packard Motor Car Co v. NLRB, 330 U.S. 485, 67 S. Ct. 789, 91 L.Ed. 1040 (1947). That Act amended the National Labor Relations Act's difinition of "employee" to exclude "any individual employed as a supervisor", 61 Stat. 137, 29 U.S.C. § 152(3). It defined "supervisor" broadly, 61 Stat. 138, 29 U.S.C. § 152(11), and it added that employers could not be forced to deem "supervisors" to be "employees" for the "purpose of any law * * * related to collective bargaining", 61 Stat. 151, 29 U.S.C. § 164(a). The House Report on the amendments stated that "Management, like labor, must have faithful agents", adding that "no * * * employer * * * need have as his agent one * * * whom for any reason, he does not trust". H.R. Rep. No. 245, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 16-17 (1947). (Emphasis in original.) And, the Senate Report spoke of the employer's need for "undivided loyalty". S.Rep. No. 105, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 5 (1947). The Supreme Court has held that these amendments excluded supervisors from the protections of the Act "because supervisors were management obliged to be loyal to their employer's interests. * * *" Beasley v. Food Fair of North Carolina, 416 U.S.653,659-60, 94 S. Ct. 2023, 2026, 40 L.Ed.2d 443 (1973); see also Florida Power & Light v. Electrical Workers, 417 U.S. 790, 806, 94 S.Ct. 2737, 2745, 4 L.Ed. 477 (1974). Thus, the Board is without power to protect concerted activities of supervisors (at least where they are related to legitimate supervisory activities). And, as this court pointed out in Abilities and Goodwill, Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 6 (lst Cir. 1979), when non-supervisory employees engage in activity directly related to the retention of supervisors or to supervisory activities, the Board must proceed with caution.

In Abilities and Goodwill we held that a one-week (non-supervisory) employee "sick-out" was not protected when it was engaged in to protest the firing of a supervisor—despite the preparation by the employees of a "report" that (to some extent) sought to relate their actions to their working conditions. We looked at all the circumstances—including the reasonableness of the means of protest, the extent to which the supervisor had daily, or direct, contact with employees and their working conditions, and the origin of the dispute that led to the supervisor's dicharge—before concluding that the employee action was not "in fact a protest over the actual conditions of the employment". Abilities and Goodwill, Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d at 9. In Puerto Rico Food Products Corp. v. NLRB, 619 F.2d 153 (1st Cir. 1980), we reversed an NLRB holding that non-supervisory employees could stop work on an assembly line to demand an explanation of why their supervisor had just been fired. We held that the means of protest about such matters must not only be reasonable but also directly related to their actual conditions of employment. We noted that employees were more legitimately concerned with low-level, than with high-level supervisors, but that the impact of such supervisors on working conditions must be special, or at least "distinct from the effect which supervisors usually have on employees", and that the critical issue was that of "the employee's subjective state of mind". Id. at 156-57.

Given the legal standards set forth in these prior cases, the Board order at issue here must be denied enforcement, for there is not substantial evidence in the record that the protest at issue here—reasonable as it was in respect to means—concerned the actual conditions of non-supervisory employment. That is to say, there is no evidence of impact on non-supervisory employees over and above that likely to exist whenever managers dispute about managerial activities. Although a few workers joined their supervisors in signing the letter, the record suggests that this was a protest of supervisors, by supervisors, and about supervisors.

First, those who originated the March 25 letter were supervisors. Those who assisted them in drafting it were supervisors. Non-supervisory employees were called in and asked to sign it only after it was completed. This would be a different case had non-supervisory employees written the letter, participated significantly in its drafting, or even had the drafting taken place after consultations with them, for any such facts would have provided evidence that this was an employee, rather than a supervisor's protest.

Second, the letter itself had only one object: the removal of Mr. Orenstein as the hotel's general manager. Mr Orenstein was not a "low-level foreman or supervisor who deals directly with the employees", cf. Abilities and Goodwill, Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d at 8, but, rather, the highest ranking officer at the hotel. Thus, management's interests in securing his loyalty, and maintaining his authority are unusually strong, while the interest in extending the National Labor Relations Act's protection to concerted employee activity related to his tenure of office is correspondingly weak (at least absent a distinct showing of a particular harmful effect on employee working conditions as preceived by employees).

Third, the complaints contained in the letter are almost exclusively managerial. They are complaints of lower level managerial staff about higher level managers. The list, taken at face value, particularly in light of its origin, describes inadequate managerial communication; lack of managerial innovation; insufficient management meetings; inaccessibility of the manager; discriminatory salaries, perquisites, promotions, cost controls; inadequate authority for subordinate managers; and a poor marketing plan. Even when the letter speaks of "promotions, salary scales and working conditions", it immediately uses as examples "company car, expense account, room and board". At least the first two of these do not sound as if they concern the ordinary worker. The occasional use of the words "working conditions" and the fact that some of the words used could refer to ordinary workers as well as managers is not enough to transform a letter that is managerial in tone and content into a letter that deals with the direct concerns of the average worker.

Fourth, the record testimony does not lead one to reread the letter as more "worker oriented" than it appears. To the contrary, the four non-supervisory employees who testified said nothing at all about concern with their working conditions. Rather, they spoke of the matter as being one "of principle", or they claimed that the letter was "self-explanatory". Nothing that they said supports the notion that the protest involved was primarily, or even in significant part, one of non-supervisory workers, or that the non-supervisory employee signators interpreted the letter, in whole or in part, as protesting their employment conditions.

Fifth, of the employees discharged, seven were managers, two were arguably supervisors, and only two were undisputedly non-supervisory employees. Orenstein testified without contradiction that he did not fire any employees whom he believed had signed the March 25 letter because they thought they were protesting working conditions. He fired only those whose motive, in his view, was his own removal as general manager.

The Administrative Law Judge, whose views the Board adopted, based his conclusion that a significant "object of the March 25 letter was the betterment of working conditions of employees" upon three pieces of evidence: (1) the text of the letter itself; (2) the testimony of three supervisors; and (3) Mr. Orenstein's April 20th memorandum indicating that the letter writers' concerns should have been directed to him and not to President James. The first of these has been discussed and is set out in Appendix A. A review of the testimony of the three supervisors, with one exception, reveals that they were concerned with their working conditions, not those of non-supervisory workers. The one exception is testimony of Reservations Manager Joan Rodriguez to the effect that she spoke to Mr. Orenstein about employee complaints and morale, that Mr. Orenstein's managerial methods made life unusually difficult for secretaries and that many employees had to work longer hours than the personnel director worked. In the context of two volumes of testimony including that of four non-supervisory employees, these few words simply do not seem sufficient to comprise substantial evidence—particularly when the four non-supervisory employees who testified did not directly relate the protest to their working conditions. The third piece of evidence—the letter or memorandum of April 20—is set out in Appendix B. That memorandum confirms, rather than refutes, the view that the dispute was essentially managerial and supervisory.

The facts reveal here a case very different from NLRB v. Phoenix Mutual Life Insurance Co., 167 F.2d 983 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 335 U.S. 845, 69 S.Ct. 68, 93 L.Ed. 395 (1948) and from NLRB v. Guernsey-Muskingum Elec. Co-op., Inc., 285 F.2d 8 (6th Cir. 1960), in both of which, courts allowed the NLRB to protect conduct related to the selection of a supervisor. In both Phoenix Mutual and Guernsey-Muskingum the employees' means of protest were reasonable—the writing of letters and the voicing of complaints (as the means used here were reasonable). In both cases, however, the deciding courts made clear that the protest at issue was one that originated with, and was conducted by, non-supervisory employees for reasons directly related to their own (non-supervisory) conditions of work. In the first of these cases insurance agents initiated a letter related to the choosing of a cashier. In the second, a group of laborers complained about the way in which their new foreman dealt with them on the job. Neither of those cases presents a dispute originated by, and primarily involving, supervisors, and both of them involved protests more directly related to ordinary employee working conditions than that at issue here.

Of course, every dispute over managerial employees involves working conditions to some degree; after all, the jobs of many managers in large part involve creating and maintaining such conditions. Yet, we have previously held that there must be a somewhat more direct relationship than this to the concerns of ordinary workers before concerted action aimed at the choice of managers enjoys the Act's protection. See, e.g., Puerto Rico Food Products Corp. v. NLRB, 619 F.2d at 155. Moreover, it was Congress' clear intent to place those disputes that are primarily among managers in the hands of management to resolve. This cannot be done if supervisors are allowed to immunize their own protest activities simply by adding a few sympathetic non-supervisory employees to their protesting group.

Finally, we do not believe that Mr. Orenstein's post-discharge memorandum converted his actions into a generalized threat against non-supervisory employee protests. The memorandum (set out in Appendix B) suggests to us that Mr. Orenstein believed (and made clear to others) that he was faced with a "revolt of the managers". While we recognize an obligation to defer to the Board's expertise in this area, NLRB v. Weingarten, Inc., 420 U.S. 251, 267, 95 S.Ct. 959, 968, 43 L.Ed.2d 171 (1975), we nonetheless are unable to find any reasons in the record for casting the memorandum in a more "anti-employee" light than an ordinary reading of it would indicate. (The record, if anything, suggests the contrary.) Indeed, the Board's finding that, on this record, the supervisors must be reinstated to avoid injury to non-supervisory employees does not suggest to us that there is more of an anti-employee nature here than meets the eye, but, rather, like the thirteenth chime of the clock, casts doubt on that which went before.

Because we cannot find record support for the view that this case involves more than a dispute among managerial employees into which several non-supervisory employees were drawn,

Enforcement of the Board's order is denied.

APPENDIX A

March 25, 1977

Mr. Howard P. James
Chairman and President
The Sheraton Corporation
470 Atlantic Avenue
Boston, Mass. 02210

Dear Mr. James:

The purpose of this letter is to inform you about the reality of the working conditions at the Puerto Rico Sheraton.

It is a known factor that our hotel has been losing money. This has been a situation that we all have tried very hard to change. During the past year our losing ratio has been greatly reduced.

This has, besides hard work, come about because of the following:

A. The beginning of the American economic recovery.

B. An unprecedented cold winter this year in the continental United States.

C. Unstable conditions in Jamaica.

D. Massive advertisement campaign by the Puerto Rican Tourist Development Co.

E. Worldwide marketing exposure on T.V. via satellite sponsored by major local commercial and industrial firms.

F. An already noticeable improvement in our laborer's attitude toward the tourist, due in part to sad memories of the past economic recession.

G. Main office efforts to increase better working conditions.

H. Our individual efforts and experience based on our deep sense of pride and responsibility towards our hotel, our Island and our families.

If all these causes are not taken into consideration when you study our financial statements, you could arrive at the wrong conclusion that our losing ratio could not have been reduced even more, or to the really tremendously wrong conclusion that, the reduction of the losing ratio was due to the efficiency or expertise of the present manager of the hotel or further that a peaceful working relationship has been existing between him and the hotel staff.

The following is a non all inclusive list of serious problem areas existing and caused exclusively by the lack of knowledge, tact and professionalism of Mr. Arnold M. Orenstein, whom we think is to be held accountable for the present and worse to come precarious working conditions.

A. Lack of bilateral communication between the manager and the hotel staff; communication being the basis of a sound, strong management. The expressions of ideas, suggestions or complaints are answered by "if you do not like it, leave".

B. Innovations for better management are all but prohibited.

C. Staff meetings are seldom called and have become monologues where discussion is not accepted and the information from the manager has to be numbly and most of all silently received.

D. The executive or manager's office is run on a closed door policy. An appointment is mandatory unless you are called for a scolding session.

E. The promotions, salary scales and working conditions to include: company car, expense account, room and board, among others, that have so far been established clearly represents that they are discriminatory against employees, with Spanish surnames. So far corrective measures have not been sought but could, should this situation worsen.

F. The principle of controlling expenses in the hotel is sui generis. A request of rubber bands or even pencils is supposedly more efficiently controlled by the need of the general manager's approval. On the other hand up to a couple of months ago we had the most glorified chief engineer this hotel has ever afforded. This person not only was grossly overpaid but also, as you probably know by now, did not perform for what could be considered, the best interest of the hotel. This reminds us of the "Pennywise and Dollar foolish" theory.

G. Most of the key positions, except top management, are overloaded with responsibilities yet these individual's performances have been impaired because commensurate authority has not flowed downwards.

H. The marketing plan of this hotel, it's nowhere to be seen or found, it rests on one person's mind. The General Manager has stated that "He does not believe in it and after all it is not important". Here we have Hit & Miss management; which at best, shows his almost total lack of concern for the Corporation's policies, procedures and authority.

We, the undersigned, feel, that this enumeration which is based strictly on professional and business points clearly shows that something has to be done by you immediately if we are to work united for the betterment of our institution, and more, if this institution is to survive. The avoidance of what could have been determined or classified as personality problems or individual complaints is not to be constituted as a showing of their non-existence.

We sincerely hope that we have expressed our feelings, worries and fears. We feel, further, that if we have all been able to reduce our losing ratio working under these poor human relations conditions that have, and are still prevailing, our chances for business improvement are infinite if the General Manager is substituted for someone who could bring up everybody's morale and esprit de corps.

Good Human Relations go hand in hand with Productivity and Profitability. They are your insurance policy for a good working organization which we all want and deserve.

Hoping that this letter receives the importance it deserves.

We remain

APPENDIX B

MEMORANDUM

April 20, 1977

FROM: Arnold M. Orenstein
TO: All Employees

Many of you are aware of the events of last week when several supervisory people were dismissed.

So that you will be aware of what has happened I will briefly review the events:

1—In early March an unsigned letter was sent form the hotel to the President of the Sheraton demanding that I be removed from the hotel and threatening that if it wasn't done by March 31st there would be "a big problem at the hotel," as well as "big trouble for me."

I had a good idea of who sent the letter and by certain actions the group of people behind the first letter felt they had to send another letter. This time they signed it.

2—In this second letter they claimed that they didn't like the way the hotel was run and implied that they could do it better and that I must be removed. They claimed that the hotel was doing better for various reasons and that it had nothing to do with my being here.

I do not claim to be the best hotel manager in the world. I do want you to know that when I arrived here for the last months of 1974 the hotel was in terrible condition and finished the year with a loss of 3¼ million dollars. Guests would choose Sheraton as a last choice when there was no space elsewhere, the hotel was in disrepair, the casino was closed and many employees lost their jobs. In early 1975 the Sheraton Corporation saw no improvement in business and expenses and they decided to try to sell the hotel or close it, but in the meantime to cut all possible losses. Many people were laid off, the Zanzibar closed, the Alhambra closed and all advertising was stopped.

The only thing we continued to do was write and call personal contacts here and in the States who could assist in giving us business. We were very fortunate in getting the Skylark Charter program for early 1976 plus the Chevrolet group for late 1975 and March 1976.

This forecast of high occupancy and reduced losses made Sheraton decide to keep the hotel open after they bought the property in 1975. By June 1976 the company saw that our losses were cut substantially. We had gotten lots of winter and spring business, the Stake Penthouse had opened and was a great success. The only reason we were allowed to open the Stake Penthouse was that we needed more than a coffee shop for the winter, and it cost very little to set up the restaurant. The plan was to close it if it lost money. Fortunately it was well accepted by tourists and the local community.

Plans to sell or close the hotel were dropped when the company saw that we would end 1976 with only a $½ million loss, a contract for Skylark again in 1977, plus other business.

We had plans to lease the casino so that we would have an additional attraction for guests so they wouldn't check out and go elsewhere. These plans fell through, but after much arguing with our friends in heaven (the President of Sheraton and his staff), we convinced them to allow us to run the casino which is now an attraction helping us to entertain our guests and bring in revenue.

In all probability, barring wars, hurricanes, and other Acts of God we will make a small profit this year. More employees are working and the future of the hotel is looking brighter. This is important to you, the people who have worked hard, given good service and cooperated wherever you had to.

Fortunately the service employees of the hotel are more aware of what they have to do to put rice and beans on their families tables than certain other people here who felt they were more privileged than others. They felt they could do as they pleased for their own personal benefit, and even their own personal entertainment in violation of house rules and policy. They didn't like the controls and reporting procedures and because I established these procedures they didn't like me!!

Whenever I have tried to do in this hotel has been for the good of the hotel. I have lived in Puerto Rico for 11 years and don't plan to leave. The 11 years is longer than most of the ringleaders of this group have lived here!!

A hotel is like a ship. There is only one captain. If some of the crew creates a mutiny they have to be eliminated before the ship sinks. You can also compare this to cancer. If someone has it you operate on it before the patient dies.

Many of you, especially the delegates, have never hesitated to come here and personally ask for favors. Even some of those who were discharged were accorded favors which we did not have to do. The door still remains open to you.

One last comment, * * * you have heard that there were 22 employees discharged. That is not correct. There were several people tricked into signing the letter. They were given blank paper to sign and were told it was a petition to request a meeting with me to discuss improved benefits for non-union employees. They did not know what they were signing and after we determined who these people were we did not discharge them. There were a few people who were discharged because of signing who I really am unable to determine what their complaint was.

In any case these people did not see fit to come to me with their complaint but rather wrote to our President to demand my removal. This constitutes insubordination and is just cause for dismissal.

There is no need to go into further details but just to point out how juvenile all of this was one of these people was heard to make threatening remarks against my son and against me.

I will look forward to your continued support and understanding as well as to good future business. Thank you.

Spring City Knitting Company v. NLRB

647 F.2d 1011 (9th Cir.), June 12, 1981—249 NLRB 212

On petition to review Board Order

Before ANDERSON, FLECTCHER and FERGUSON, Circuit Judges

1012

J. BLAINE ANDERSON, Circuit Judge: Spring City Knitting Company (Spring City) petitions for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) directing it to bargain with the intervenor here, the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union (the Union), as the exclusive bargaining representative of a bargaining unit consisting of all production and maintenance employees and shipping and receiving employees at Spring City's Flagstaff, Arizona plant. The Board cross-petitions for enforcement of the order. We affirm and enforce the Board's order.

I. BACKGROUND

Spring City Knitting Co., a subsidiary of Cluett-Peabody and Co., Inc., operates a Western Division which consists of a main plant located at Glendale, Arizona, and two smaller "satellite" plants located at Flagstaff, Arizona, and Deming, New Mexico. Spring City manufactures men's and boys' underwear. Each of the Western Division plants performs substantially similar operations. The Glendale plant employees approximately 700 workers, while Flagstaff employs approximately 150 workers. The issues raised by Spring City's petition relate only to the Glendale and Flagstaff plants.

On May 3, 1979, the Union formally petitioned the Board for certification as the exclusive bargaining representative of all production and maintenance employees at the Glendale plant. On May 9, the Union filed a petition for certification as representative of a separate unit consisting of all production and maintenance employees at Flagstaff. The petitions were consolidated and a hearing was conducted on May 18 and 23. On June 6, the Regional Director issued a decision directing elections at Glendale and Flagstaff as separate units. In finding that each plant constituted a separate appropriate bargaining unit, the Regional Director relied mainly upon evidence which indicated that the local plant managers exercised "significant autonomy" over their respective facilities, evidence which failed to indicate significant employee interchange between the two plants, and the geographical separation between the plants. Spring City petitioned for review of the Regional Director's decision, a request which the Board denied on June 27 as raising no substantial issues warranting review. Such a denial constitutes affirmance under Board regulations. 29 C.F.R. § 102.67(f).

On June 28, 1979, a representation election was held at Flagstaff in which the Union received a majority of the votes cast. Spring City filed an objection to the election based upon certain alleged misrepresentations made by the Union prior to the election, and upon certain allegedly coercive campaign tactics practiced by the Union. On August 10, the Regional Director overruled Spring City's objections and certified the Union as the Flagstaff plant bargaining representative. Spring City requested Board review of Spring City's objections, again on the ground that the company had raised "no substantial issues warranting review."

Following certification, the Union requested Spring City to bargain collectively. Spring City refused the request, and the Union responded with the filing of an unfair practice charge. the Regional Director issued a complaint on January 2, 1980, alleging that Spring City had committed an unfair labor practice by refusing to bargain with the Union. In its answer, Spring City admitted that it had refused to bargain, but raised as affirmative defenses the Regional Director's allegedly erroneous bargaining unit determination, and also the Director's overruling of its election objections without a hearing. After the matter was formally transferred to a Board panel, the Board granted on May 1, 1980, the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment on the ground that both the unit determination and the election objections had been raised and rejected in earlier proceedings. Accordingly, the Board ordered Spring City to cease and desist from refusing to bargain collectively with the union as the Flagstaff representative, affirmatively ordered it to so bargain, and directed that appropriate notices be posted. Spring City's timely petition for review followed.[1]

Spring City raises two issues in its petition: the appropriateness of the initial unit determination, and the Union's alleged election misconduct. Further facts will be developed in the course of the opinion.

II. APPROPRIATE BARGAINING UNIT

Our review of a Board determination that a particular bargaining unit is appropriate is narrowly circumscribed. Definition of an appropriate bargaining unit is a matter committed to Board discretion, see § 9(b), National Labor Relations Act of 1947, 29 U.S.C. § 159(b), and a bargaining unit determination should not be overturned unless the Board has abused its discretion. See e.g., N.L.R.B. v. J.C. Penney Co., Inc., Store No. 29-9, 620 F.2d 718 (9th Cir. 1980); N.L.R.B. v. Retail Clerks Local 588, 587 F.2d 984 (9th Cir. 1978). The Board is not required to select the most appropriate bargaining unit so long as the unit chosen is within the range of units appropriate under the circumstances. N.L.R.B. v. J.C. Penney Co., supra. The present case involves the question whether a unit consisting of a single plant or a multiple plant unit should be designated. In making such a determination, the list of factors which the Board ordinarily considers includes:

[1] Both the Regional Director's unit determination and certification of representative decisions are properly before us. Subject to certain narrow exceptions not relevant here, a Board decision on certification is not subject to judicial review on the employer's behalf except as a defense to a subsequent unfair labor practice charge based upon the employer's refusal to bargain with a certified bargaining representative. See, e.g., Boire v. Greyhound Corp., 376 U.S. 473, 84 S.Ct. 894, 11 L.Ed.2d 849 (1964); N.L.R.B. v. St. Francis Hospital of Lynwood, 601 F.2d 404 (9th Cir. 1979).

> "* * * functional integration of the business, centralized control of management, similarity of working conditions, collective bargaining history, local power to hire and fire, lack of employee interchange, geographical distance."

N.L.R.B. v. Sunset House, 415 F.2d 545, 548 (9th Cir. 1968). There is a presumption that a single plant is an appropriate bargaining unit. N.L.R.B. v. Lerner Stores Corp., 506 F.2d 706 (9th Cir. 1974). We find in this case that the Regional Director's reliance primarily on the last three elements of this analysis was proper and that his findings were supported by substantial evidence.

The evidence presented at the unit determination hearing consisted mainly of testimony given by Spring City Western Division President Allan Riley and certain documentary evidence. Riley's testimony painted a picture of the Western Division as a centralized unit whose production and personnel "brain" is located at the Glendale plant. Production control is implemented from Glendale. Division-side finance, data processing, and accounting records are maintained at Glendale. Riley sets the annual budget for all three plants, and also sets inventory controls for each. Local plant managers may not deviate from their respective budgets without Riley's approval. The evidence also indicated a high degree of functional integration between Glendale and Flagstaff. Riley described in some detail the production operations performed at each plant. It is clear from the evidence that few functional differences exist. The Flagstaff plant is substantially similar to Glendale in terms of production methods, employee skill requirements, and finished products, the primary difference being that Flagstaff is run on a considerably smaller scale.

The record is also clear that formulation and implementation of labor relations and personnel policies takes place mainly at Glendale under Riley's supervision. All full-time employees within the division enjoy practically identical fringe benefits, including inter alia paid vacations, health insurance, life insurance, eight paid holidays annually, and a variety of smaller amenities. Compensation for employees of various skill classifications is uniform throughout the division. Personnel decisions such as promotions, transfers, layoffs, and recalls are made by Riley personally. All payroll processing takes place at Glendale, and all employee time records are maintained there. Manpower quotas for each plant are established by Glendale. Overtime requests must be approved by Rilely. None of the local plant managers may deviate from these division-wide policies without approval from someone at Glendale, usually Riley.

The local plant managers are subject to a certain degree of direct oversight from Glendale on all phases of plant operation. Riley testified that he personally travels to Flagstaff "once a month" to check on the plant, while other supervisory personnel from Glendale go to Flagstaff every two or three weeks "on the average." Various types of telecommunications also keep Flagstaff in touch with Glendale on an everyday basis. There is a "constant" exchange of production information between the plants.

It was also clear from the evidence, however, that the local plant managers are not totally bereft of discretion in personnel matters. The local managers have the authority to hire and discharge within the manpower quotas established at Glendale. Plant managers may also "effectively" recommend promotions and merit increases, although none is final without Riley's approval.

Sping City introduced an exhibit at the hearing (Exhibit #7) which listed by name a number of employees who had transferred from one plant to another within the division from 1973 until the date of the hearing. While Riley pointed out that the list did not include all employees who had transferred during that time period, he did describe the exhibit as an "extensive" example of employee interchange within the Western Division. In the absence of something more concrete, we must treat Exhibit #7 as fairly approximating the frequency of inter-plant transfers during the six-year period from 1973 until 1979. The exhibit lists 21 employees who were transferred on a temporary basis, in most cases for not longer than a few days, during that period. Of these 21, Riley identified eight as "supervisors." While we are not prepared to adjudicate the supervisory status of each within the meaning of federal labor law, we take Riley's comments on each as an indication that those eight employees would likely not be included in the bargaining unit.[2] Of the remaining 13 who were either not described as "supervisors" or whose supervisory status at the time of the transfers was not clear to Riley, 6 were involved solely in transfers between Glendale and Deming.[3] Thus, only seven of the listed temporary transfers involving persons not clearly outside of the proposed bargaining unit involved a move between Flagstaff and Glendale, the longest of which was only a week in duration.[4] Of the 11 permanent transfers listed, seven were not within the requested bargaining unit.[5] Of the four permanent transfers by employees who apparently would be included within the bargaining unit, one was a Deming to Glendale transfer. Thus, Spring City produced evidence of only three permanent transfers within its proposed two-plant bargaining unit over the six-year period immediately proceding the hearing.

The frequency of employee interchange is a critical factor in determining whether employees who work in different plants share a "community of interest" sufficient to justify their inclusion in a single bargaining unit. We have in past cases cited a relatively low degree of actual employee interchange among different plants as a strong indication that there is no collective "community of interests" among a proposed multi-plant bargaining unit. See Victoria Station, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 586 F.2d 672 (9th Cir. 1978) (8% yearly transfer rate among seven San Francisco Bay Area restaurants); N.L.R.B. v. Lerner Stores Corp., supra (10% interchange among seven chain stores); N.L.R.B. v. Sunset House, supra (no interchange at all). The Regional Director's finding that no significant interchange took place within the Western Division is supported by the record.

Spring City has argued that the Regional Director erred by attributing too much authority to the Flagstaff plant manager. The evidence, however, showed that the local plant manager has the authority to hire and discharge employees. Spring City cites decisions in which insufficient local autonomy has been held to overcome the presumption that a single-plant unit is appropriate. See N.L.R.B. v. Solis Theatre Corp., 403 F.2d 381 (2d Cir. 1968); N.L.R.B. v. Davis Cafeteria, Inc., 396 F.2d 18 (5th Cir. 1968); N.L.R.B. v. Purity Food Stores, Inc., 376 F.2d 497 (1st Cir.), cert denied, 389 U.S. 959, 88 S.Ct. 337, 19 L.Ed.2d 368 (1967); N.L.R.B. v. Frisch's Big Boy Ill-Mar, Inc., 356 F.2d 895 (7th Cir. 1966). In only one of these cases, however, N.L.R.B. v. Frisch's Big Boy Ill-Mar, Inc., did the authority of the local manager extend to hiring and discharge decisions. The geographical proximity of the various plants involved in Frisch's Big Boy serves to adequately distinguish that case from the present dispute. The plants involved here are approximately 140 miles apart.

The balancing of salient factors which we achieved in Victoria Station, In. v. N.L.R.B., supra, serves as a example here. We there held that a Board determination that a single restaurant constituted an appropriate bargaining unit instead of the employer's proposed seven restaurant unit was not arbitrary, capricious, or unsupported by the evidence. A combination of low employee interchange among the restaurants, significant local managerial autonomy, and a "wide" geographic dispersion over the Bay Area was held sufficient to justify the Board's decision.

In the present case, while the degree of local control over labor relations is apparently not as great as in Victoria Station, neither is it so inconsequential as to require a multiple plant unit. The Flagstaff manager does exercise a degree of control over collective bargaining subjects. The degree of employee interchange is even lower than in Victoria Station, while the geographic dispersion of the plants is much wider. When we consider the additional factor of a lack of collective bargaining history, we must conclude that a rational basis existed for the Regional Director's decision, and that it was neither arbitrary nor capricious. The unit chosen was appropriate.[6]

[2] Riley identified Roy Carson, John Dennis, Jerry Fredericksen, Lacy Parker, Gene Rios, Gary Vandever, Bill Carlton, and Luther Dill as "supervisors" at the time of their respective transfers. Riley wasn't sure whether Jim Jackson, Lina Lopez or Elsa Pagotto were supervisors at the time of their transfers. Giving Spring City the benefit of the doubt, we do not include those three in the list of supervisors transferred.

[3] Lina Lopez, Elsa Pagotto, Armida Delgado, Irene Orth, Harry Hampson, and Marie Rivera are all listed as employees based in Glendale who spent short periods of time working in Deming.

[4] Jim Jackson, Virginia Romo and Wanda Richie each spent a few days in Flagstaff as instructors. Richie had recently been named a supervisor at the time of the hearing, but apparently had not been so designated during her three-day stint at Flagstaff in 1973. Clyde Brandt spent a week in Flagstaff in 1974 for maintenance purposes. The status of Dee Vandever, who spent two days in Flagstaff in 1975, was unknown to Riley. Connie Castillo spent two days in Flagstaff in 1975 as an instructor. Vida Posey was in Flagstaff for two days in connection with a retail outlet selling Spring City products.

[5] Salomon Castillo, Jr., Herb Nation, and Susan Nation were described by Riley as "supervisors." Bill Romo, Cletus Hicks, James Barrier, and Arvel Wyant are listed as "mechanics," a classification expressly excluded from the bargaining unit.

III. UNION ELECTION MISCONDUCT

Following the Union's victory, Spring City filed an objection to the election based upon two allegations of Union misconduct in the course of the election campaign. Spring City challenged several misrepresentations which appeared in Union campaign literature circulated eight days prior to the election, and also claimed that the actions of Union organizers during the campaign interfered with, restrained and coerced Spring City employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157. The Regional Director denied Spring City's objections without a hearing. Spring City here alleges as error not only the denial of the substance of its charges, but also the denial without a hearing.

1017

In reviewing the Regional Director's overruling of election objections which charge union misconduct, we are guided by principles well-established in cases far too numerous to cite in detail. The Board enjoys a wide discretion in conducting and supervising representation elections. Summa Corp., v. N.L.R.B., 625 F.2d 293 (9th Cir. 1980); N.L.R.B. v. Masonic Home of California, 624 F.2d 88 (9th Cir. 1980). We apply the abuse of discretion standard to Board denials of evidentiary hearings on election objections. N.L.R.B. v. Miramar of California, Inc., 601 F.2d 422 (9th Cir. 1979). In order to obtain a hearing on post-election objections, a party must make a prima facie showing of facts that present "substantial and material factual issues" which, if true, would constitute grounds for the Board to set aside the election. N.L.R.B. v. Masonic Homes, supra. In order for an election to be overturned, the objecting party must present evidence of proscribed conduct which prevented the employees from freely registering their choice of a bargaining representative. Hecla Mining Co. N.L.R.B., 564 F.2d 309, 314 (9th Cir. 1977).

A. Union misrepresentations

On June 19, 1979, eight full days prior to the representation election on June 28, the Union distributed a handbill at the Flagstaff facility which charged, in essence, that an earlier announcement by Spring City that it would be closing its Deming, New Mexico facility was false and that management had made the announcement for the sole purpose of intimidating the employees into voting against union representation at Flagstaff. The handbill asserted that Spring City had earlier attempted the same sort of scare tactic at its Georgia plants and had failed. The Regional Director overruled Spring City's objection because the eight-day interval between publication of the handbill and the election gave the company a sufficient amount of time to respond to any portion of the handbill which it considered inaccurate.

Contrary to Spring City's assertions before this court, the presence or absence of an opportunity to respond is a factor which the Regional Director may properly take into account in determining whether to overturn a representation election on the basis of alleged campaign misrepresentations. An election is set aside due to misrepresentations " 'only where one party has misrepresented material facts, the other had no opportunity to reply, and the resulting distorted presentation significantly impaired the election process.' " Heavenly Valley Ski Area v. N.L.R.B., 552 F.2d 269, 272 (9th Cir. 1977),

[6] Spring City has also raised the issue of the allegedly improper issuance of a large number of subpoenas to Spring City employees by counsel for the Union to compel attendance at the unit determination hearing. According to Spring City, Union counsel conceded during a hearing recess that he did not intend to call any of the subpoenaed witnesses and that they had been subpoenaed for "propaganda" purposes. When on the record, he backed off somewhat and stated that while he did not presently intend to call any of the witnesses, it might become necessary to do so in order to rebut Riley's testimony. He justified the large number of subpoenas on the ground that representation from each of Spring City's many production departments was necessary. The hearing officer denied Spring City's motion to revoke the subpoenas.

Spring City claims that the Union's alleged abuse of process constituted "prejudicial error." We do not see how the mere presence of a large number of employees could prejudice the outcome of the unit determination hearing in any significant fashion. We must comment, however, on what we perceive as an egregious abuse of the subpoena power if indeed the employees were summoned for the sole purpose of "propaganda" on the Union's behalf. Since counsel's remarks do not appear on the record, we cannot determine whether his "propaganda" purpose has been established. The hearing officer accepted counsel's alternative explanation. We condemn any misuse of legal process, and caution that the type of misuse alleged here by Spring City should be regarded as a gross breach of professional ethics. Spring City complains that it has suffered economic injury as the result of the Union's action because many of the subpoenaed employees were away from their work stations during the hearing. We cannot express strongly enough our disapproval of the misuse of the legal system as a subtle "weapon" in labor conflicts. The role of the federal labor law is to discourage industrial strife, and all who come before the Board or this court are bound to respect that role, not to engage in conduct which flagrantly subverts it.

quoting N.L.R.B. v. G.K. Turner Associates, 457 F.2d 484 (9th Cir. 1972). See also N.L.R.B. v. Masonic Homes of California, supra. We have recently upheld denial of an evidentiary hearing where the employer made no attempt to dispel alleged misstatements made by union officials eight days prior to a representation election, and the employer presented no evidence that the vote of any employee was actually affected by the misrepresentation. N.L.R.B. v. Calco-Imports-Exports, 621 F.2d 1029 (9th Cir. 1980). Spring City's contention that it lacked a meaningful opportunity to respond is without merit.

Another factor not cited by the Regional Director supports the decision. The alleged misrepresentations related to a matter of company policy, and not a matter of union policy. We have held that in such cases the objecting employer should present evidence that the employees were likely to "accept uncritically" the union's assertion. El Monte Tool & Die Casting, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 633 F.2d 160 (9th Cir. 1980). We conclude that the Regional Director did not err in overruling Spring City's first objection without an evidentiary hearing.

B. Coercive Union conduct

Spring City alleged several specific instances of Union conduct during the election campaign which it claims were sufficient to warrant an evidentiary hearing on its charge of Union coercion. A subsequent investigation by the Regional Director uncovered other potentially coercive acts. The Regional Director nonetheless overruled Spring City's second objection. We review briefly the evidence reflected by the record.

An affidavit by Dorothy LeFountain, an office clerk at Flagstaff, related an incident which occured sometime in mid-April, 1979. LeFountain observed two men, one of whom wore a jacket bearing the Union insignia, enter the plant during working hours and begin inspecting employee time cards. The two men ignored LeFountain's request that they leave, until other male employees intervened. LeFountain was not sure whether cutting room employees could overhear the conversation. LeFountain was not a member of the proposed bargaining unit.

A pair of affidavits by employee Josie Vasquez, a member of the bargaining unit, related a series of attempts by union adherents to persuade her to vote for the union. Three weeks prior to the election, employees Maria Hamet and Leonora Rivas came to her home, accompanied by a Union organizer. The organizer allegedly charged the company with "cheating" the employees, and told Vasquez that the Union could get the company to pay vacation time and sick leave. After a discussion with the organizer, Vasquez accepted a proffered authorization card and some union literature, but immediately threw both in the trash in the presence of the organizer. On June 23, another employee told Vasquez that the company had "lied" about the Deming closing, but the subject was dropped at Vasquez' request. On June 26, Hamet again came to Vasquez' home and attempted to enlist the aid of her husband and her brother in recruiting her to the Union cause. On June 28, the day of the election, Vasquez was greeted by the same Union representative, who told her that she "had" to take a card that was offered. When Vasquez refused the card, the organizer's male companion told Vasquez to "cool it." Vasquez also stated that every day during the week immediately before the election, someone would place union literature at her work station.

An affidavit by Fern Luna, a quality control supervisor at Flagstaff, stated that on June 27 she observed through a glass door several Union organizers who were handing out campaign literature to employees leaving the plant at the close of the work day. Luna observed one man whom she believed to be a Union organizer hold a camera up to his eye as if he were taking pictures of everyone who was leaving the plant. She also observed at about the same time one Union organizer attempt to hand literature to a female employee who ignored the organizer. Rather than give up, the organizer persisted and began walking backwards in front of the employee, blocking her path when she attempted to pass. The organizer did not relent until the employee crossed the street.

Rick Jones, a cutting room supervisor, stated that on June 26 he observed several Union organizers passing out literature at the end of the shift. The resulting congestion forced the departing employees to exist four or five abreast. One female organizer had a camera in her hand and made several motions as if to take pictures of the employees. Jones stuck his head out the door and asked the organizers to step back to the public driveway and off company property. While the organizers complied, Jones reported that they almost immediately returned to their original position five to six feet away from the exit doors. Fifteen minutes later, an employee approached Jones and asked if Jones could get "those damned people" away from the door. Jones related that on five or six different occasions that week he asked the organizers to step back, and that each time they would resume their original positions after he left.

Salomon, Castillo, Flagstaff plant manager, described in general terms the pattern of literature distribution. Begining approximately two months before the election, anywhere from two to five organizers would position themselves on company property approximately six feet in front of the doorway. The organizers at first appeared approximately twice a week. As election time grew nearer, the organizers showed up on an almost daily basis. Sometimes the delay in leaving the plant would last up to five minutes because of the congestion resulting from the organizer's activities. Castillo also asked the organizers to step back a few feet to the public driveway on several occasions, only to have his request ignored after he left. On June 24, as he was leaving the plant with two company officials, Castillo was "sarcastically" asked by one of the female organizers if she was on company property. Apparently, some unit employees were near enough to have overhead the organizer's comments. The affidavit of Josie Vasquez corroborates Castillo's observation of considerable congestion and delay caused by literature distribution.

Irene Espino, a sewing room supervisor at Flagstaff, related that an employee approached her approximately two weeks prior to the election and asked if she could leave via the rear entrance so as to avoid the organizers and their literature. Espino replied that she could not because the rear entrance was reserved for truck loading only. No other employee complained to Espino.

Spring City argues that these affidavits raise substantial and material issues of fact regarding Union coercion of employees. Spring City contends that the acts described individually and collectively demonstrate coercive action on the part of the Union. According to Spring City, the Union's distribution methods were more serious than a simple trespass. Spring City cites the instances wherein certain employees complained of the Union's activities, and the incident wherein one employee's path was blocked as she walked from the plant to the street as evidence of the coercive impact which the Union campaign tactics carried. Spring City also cities a number of other incidents, including the taking of employee pictures as they left, and further points to the Union's misuse of its subpoena power. We have considered the record and each of the incidents, and find no merit to Spring City's contentions.

An objecting party who claims that campaign tactics in a representation election were so coercive as to require overturning the election faces a heavy burden. The question is "whether the coercive conduct so influenced potential voters that a free choice by employees was impossible." N.L.R.B. v. Masonic Homes of California, supra, 624 F.2d at 90. The critical element which is lacking in Spring City's presentation is evidence that any employee felt so coerced by the Union's activities that he or she was unable to exercise a free choice at the polls.

None of the activities alleged was so inherently intimidating that we are free to presume coercive effect. The record reflects an election campaign marked by Union conduct which was uniformly aggressive, sometimes overbearing, and occasionally obnoxious. The Union's tactics did not, however, involve any violence, threat of violence, or vandalism. No overt threat of reprisal appears in the record, and we find no subtle threats implied. This is not a case such as N.L.R.B. v. Masonic Homes, supra, wherein employee fears of union reprisal appeared in the record, nor a case such as N.L.R.B. v. Hale Manufacturing, 602 F.2d 244 (2d Cir. 1979), wherein, on the day of the election, an act of violence was directed toward an employee who had made remarks disparaging the union. That many of the employees at Spring City found the Union's tactics distasteful and irritating is clear. The recorded, however, is devoid of any indication of intimidation. The only affidavit authored by a unit employee, that of Josie Vasquez, discloses no feeling of coercion. While the taking of employee photographs might in some instances rise to an implied threat of reprisal, we see no evidence here to support such a conclusion. In sum, we find that none of the individual incidents appearing in this record would have justified overturning the election.[7]

We also reject Spring City's argument that the Union's disregard of its requests to stay off company property demonstrated to the employees the company's inability to stand up to the Union. No evidence suggests that any employee so viewed the incidents. Also, Spring City offers no explanation why it was powerless to stop the Union from trespressing. There is similarly no merit to Spring City's contention that the alleged misuse of subpoenas at the unit determination hearing also put the company in a bad light in front of the employees.

Finally, we reject Spring City's argument that the cumulative impact of each of the incidents alleged requires us to find improper coercion. We heed the admonition of Melrose-Wakefield Hospital Assn. v. N.L.R.B., 615 F.2d 563 (1st Cir. 1980) that "totality" arguments in this context should be approached cautiously. The First Circuit requires "detailed evidence of the pattern the activity formed and its influence on the election." Id. at 570. There certainly was no such detailed showing here. We decline to hold that the aggregation of the Union's legal, if not entirely ethical, activities indicated any degree of employee coercion.

We hold that the Regional Director did not abuse his discretion in overruling Spring City's objections without an evidentiary hearing.

IV. CONCLUSION

The Board acted properly in certifying the Union as the Flagstaff bargaining representative, and in ordering Spring City to bargain with the Union. The record discloses no abuse of discretion. We deny Spring City's petition to deny enforcement, and grant the Board's petition to enforce.

In reponse to an organizational campaign initiated by the Muncie Printing and Graphic Communications Union No. 126, the Company sent a letter to its employees which read in pertinent part:

> * * * If you sign your name to a union card, you give up the right to talk to us about your hours, your work, your working conditions, your pay, and everything else concerning your future and continued employment. If anyone tries to cause you any trouble at your work, or puts you under any kind of pressure to join a union, you should let the company know of it immediately, and we will promptly stop this illegal and immoral practice.

> Don't be fooled into signing misleading union cards. It is said that when you sign such a card, no one other than a Union Representative, or a representative of the National Labor Relations Board will ever see this card. This is not the [7] We do not find support in the record for Spring City's assertion that the Union "repeatedly" promised that certain benefits would result from it becoming the plant's bargaining representative. Only the Vasquez affidavit reflects the oral promise of such benefits. There is no evidence that any Union organizer made promises to other employees.

---

*The Honorable William J. Jameson, United States Senior District Judge for the District of Montana, is sitting by designation.

> truth. In many instances, the signed card is disclosed to the company by the union, the NLRB, or both of them. Be careful about what you sign—don't sign ANYTHING unless you KNOW what you are signing and what it might mean to you, your family, or your fellow employees.

(emphasis in original) That letter provided the basis for the Union's charge. The General Counsel of the NLRB issued a complaint against the Company, and both the General Counsel and the Company filed motions for summary judgment. The Board transferred the proceeding to itself and granted the General Counsel's motion finding that the Company had violated section 8(a)(1) by threatening its employees with the loss of their right to speak directly with management about the terms and conditions of employment; by requesting employees to report efforts of union supporters to persuade them to sign authorization cards; and by threatening employees that the Company would discover the identity of card signers and take reprisals against them.

II

This court has previously held that threatening employees with the loss of their right to speak directly with management if they choose to have a union represent them in collective bargaining is a violation of section 8(a)(1). NLRB v. Graber Mfg. Co., 382 F.2d 990 (7th Cir. 1967); accord, Tipton Electric Co. v. NLRB, 621 F.2d 890 (8th Cir. 1980). Section 9(a) explicitly provides that the selection of a collective bargaining representative does not preclude employees from presenting grievances directly to their employers so long as the bargaining representative is given the opportunity to be present. Here the Company stated that signing a union card meant giving up > the right to talk to us about your hours, your work, your working conditions, your pay and everything else concerning your future and continued employment.

> * * * * *
> * * * Do not sign if you want to continue to speak for yourself, and be your own person. * * *

(emphasis in original) We hold that the Board did not err in finding that language to be a violation.

Next the Board found that the Company had violated section 8(a)(1) by urging employees to report anyone who "tries to cause you any trouble at your work, or puts you under any kind of pressure to join a union. * * *" In Lutheran Hospital of Milwaukee, Inc. v. NLRB, 564 F.2d 208, 211 (7th Cir. 1977), vacated on other grounds, 438 U.S. 902, 98 S.Ct. 3118, 57 L.Ed.2d 1145 (1978), this court enforced a Board order because we > agree[d] with the administrative law judge that the letter * * * invited employees to report the names of union organizers to the director. The letter in no way distinguished between organizing activities that are statutorily protected and conduct that is illegal in asking employees to report cases of "pestering or pressure to join." It would have been reasonable for an employee who received the letter to draw the inference that any organizational activity on behalf of the union would be reported to the director and that the identified participants in the organizational campaign would be punished.

The letter at issue here also fails to distinguish between coercive conduct and lawful organizing activity. It urges employees to report anyone who "puts you under any kind of pressure. * * *" We thus uphold the Board's finding. Accord, Bank of St. Louis v. NLRB, 456 F.2d 1234, 1235 (8th Cir. 1972); NLRB v. Sunnyland Packing Co., 557 F.2d 1157, 1159–61 (5th Cir. 1977).

Third, the Board determined that the Company violated section 8(a)(1) by threatening to discover the identity of union card signers and take reprisals against them. The disputed paragraph read:

> Don't be fooled into signing misleading union cards. It is said that when you sign such a card, no one other than a Union representative, or a representative of the National Labor Relations Board will ever see this card. This is not the truth. In many instances, the signed card is disclosed to the company by the union, the NLRB, or both of them. Be careful about what you sign—don't sign ANYTHING unless you KNOW what you are signing and what it might mean to you, your family, or your fellow employees.

The Company contends that our decision in NLRB v. Sparton Mfg. Co, 355 F.2d 523 (7th Cir. 1966), and the Sixth Circuit's decision in NLRB v. Hobart Bros. Co., 372 F.2d 203 (6th Cir. 1967), are controlling and preclude enforcement on this issue. We do not agree.

In NLRB v. Sparton Mfg. Co., supra, our court considered only the last sentence of the above-quoted paragraph, which in that case was contained in a speech given by the company's general manager. We there concluded that in the absence of any history of antiunion or other coercive conduct by the employer, the Board was unreasonable to rely on that single portion of the speech to find an unlawful threat. The case at bar is distinguishable from Sparton because here we are considering the sentence containing the "be careful" message at issue in Sparton together with the immediately preceding sentence warning that signed union cards might be disclosed to the company. Taken as a whole, that paragraph could well lead employees to believe that the identity of card signers would probably be disclosed, and that there was a reason such disclosure should be carefully avoided.

Moreover, in our case we have already noted two other parts of the same letter that violate the Act. Thus we cannot say as we did in Sparton that the disputed language occurs in the absence of any other illegality.

Although we are not of course bound by the Sixth Circuit's decision in NLRB v. Hobart Bros. Co., supra, that case is also distinguishable. The majority in Hobart found a likely "legitimate company purpose" in the warning that authorization cards might not be kept secret. There the union had itself initiated the issue of secrecy in its own letter to the employees by promising that the identity of those who signed would not be revealed.

> Like the union's promise of increased economic benefits, its promise of secrecy in signing cards could also be disputed by the company. After initiating this issue in its original message, the union cannot complain if the company seeks to reply thereto.

1372 F.2d at 205.[1] In our case there is no evidence that the company was responding to any union-initiated claim.

Further, as was the case in Sparton, the majority in Hobart looked to the surrounding circumstances in order to determine whether the language was threatening. Noting that the Board found nothing more to support its interpretation of the letter and that another alleged unfair labor charge had been rejected by the trial examiner, the majority found the evidence insufficient to support the Board's finding of a violation. Here there were two other violations of the Act in the same letter.

Mindful of the fact that we must assess the disputed language from the employee's point of view, NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 617, 89 S.Ct. 1918 1941–42, 23 L. Ed.2d 547 (1969), we conclude that the Board's interpretation in this case was reasonable. Enforcement is granted in full.

[1] Judge Edwards, dissenting in Hobart, remarked:

> What legitimate company purpose could conceivably be served by its disputing the union's pledge of secrecy of the employee's signature? The Board found, and I think common sense tells us rightly, that the purpose of the company letter was to tell its employees that fear of economic reprisal was a realistic one, and hence, they should "be careful" about what they signed unless they knew what it meant to themselves and their families.

Florida Steel Corporation v. NLRB

NLRB v. Florida Steel Corporation

648 F.2d 233 (5th Cir.), June 15, 1981

On petition for adjudication in civil contempt

Before KRAVITCH and THOMAS A. CLARK, Circuit Judges, and LYNNE,* District Judge

234

KRAVITCH, Circuit Judge: The allegedly unlawful conduct of Florida Steel Corp. [Florida Steel] now before us [1] is the showing of an anti-union videotape. The National Labor Relations Board [the Board] petitioned this court for an adjudication of civil contempt against the company on the ground that the showing violated three previous orders of this court,[2]

---

*District Judge of the Northern District of Alabama, sitting by designation.

[1] Florida Steel has a long history of litigation before this court. See infra. In an earlier case, we noted that "the controversy has gone on so long between (unions and the company) it reminds one of the legendary feud between the 'Hatfields and the McCoys.'" N.L.R.B. v. Florida Steel Corp., 586 F.2d 436 (5th Cir. 1978).

prohibiting Florida Steel from, inter alia, in any manner interfering with, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights protected by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act in violation of § 8(a)(1).[3] The Special Master appointed by this court to make findings of fact and conclusions of law found that the company's use of certain portions of the videotape violated our previous orders. He recommended that Florida Steel be held in contempt and various remedies be imposed. The Company here challenges the Special Master's conclusions; the Board in turn urges us to impose greater sanctions than those suggested.[4] We conclude that the Special Master correctly found Florida Steel in contempt and that the proposed remedies are sufficient. Hence, we adopt those recommendations.

Florida Steel manufactures, processes and sells steel and steel-related products. It maintains facilities at Tampa, Jacksonville, Miami, Fort Lauderdale, Fort Meyers, Orlando, and Indiantown, Florida; Charlotte and Raleigh, North Carolina; and Aiken, South Carolina.[5] The Steelworkers Union represents employees at the Charlotte and Indiantown plants. The instant controversy arose during that union's organizational campaign at the Tampa facility during which Florida Steel produced and exhibited a videotape designed to "prevent" employees from signing union authorization cards.[6] The film was aimed primarily at newly hired hourly employees although salaried and supervisory personnel were to view it as well. To produce the film, the company's Public Relations Manager, Bobbie Willis, hired an independent advertising and public relations firm that had previously done anti-union campaign work for the company. James Hogue, Vice President Industrial Relations, approved the finished product entitled "Look Out for the Cards" and directed that it be distributed to Florida Steel plants to be shown to all current employees and those hired in the future. Only those employees represented by the Steelworkers at Indiantown and Charlotte were excluded from this directive.[7] No active organizing, save minor activity at Jacksonville and Tampa, occurred after the videotape's distribution.

[2] 221 NLRB 371 (1975), enf'd, 534 F.2d 1405 (5th Cir. 1976). In this case, the Board found that the company violated § 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by refusing at its Tampa plant to institute its corporate-wide quarterly wage review policy and to grant wage increases thereunder to employees within the proposed bargaining unit covered by the union's election petition.

222 NLRB 955 (1976), enf'd, 536 F.2d 1385 (5th Cir. 1976). Here, the Board found that the company violated § 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by delaying the regularly scheduled wage increases due its Jacksonville employees because the union had filed a petition for a Board election among these employees. The Board's order, as enforced by this court, required, in addition to its injunction that it refrain from violating § 8(a)(1) infra, that the company cease and desist from "withholding pay raises and/or fringe benefits from any of its employees throughout its entire operations corporate-wide because employees have chosen a union to represent them, or because a union has filed a petition for certification to become the bargaining representative for its employees."

224 NLRB 587 (1976), enf'd, 552 F.2d 368 (5th Cir. 1977). The Board here found that the company violated § 8(a)(1) and (3) by discharging and refusing to reinstate a Tampa employee because of his union activities and that it additionally violated § 8(a)(1) by coercively interrogating an employee, unlawfully polling employees during the representative election campaign and threatening an employee with loss of work if he voted for the union.

In a fourth case, not heard by this court, Board Case No. 12–CA–6881, Board Approved Settlement Stipulation October 21, 1977 (DS–1002), consent judgment entered March 7, 1978 (5th Cir. No. 78–1370) (Tampa), the Board entered an order, upon the settlement stipulation, requiring the company, inter alia, to cease and desist from "engaging or soliciting or employing Wackenhut corporation or any other internal intelligence investigators to engage in the surveillance of and to report on the union activities of its employees [in] any of its corporatewide facilities." The stipulation additionally provided that "this settlement stipulation and ensuing Board Order or Court Decree may be used by the board in any other proceeding before the Board or an appropriate Court to the same extent as an adjudicated decision of the Board enforced by a United States Court.* * *

[3] 29 U.S.C. Sec. 151 et seq.: Section 8(a)(1) of the Act (29 U.S.C. Sec. 158(a)(1)) states that it shall be an unfair labor practice "to interfere with, restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7." Section 7 (29 U.S.C. Sec. 157), reads in pertinent part: "Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.* * *"

[4] The Board does not contest the Special Master's conclusions with respect to those portions of the tape it earlier argued violated § 8(a)(1) and which the Special Master found benign.

[5] In addition, Florida Steel maintains several reinforcing and fabricating facilities throughout the Southeast.

[6] The memorandum James Hogue, Vice President for Industrial Relations, sent to Bobbie Willis, Public Relations Manager, defined the videotape's objective:

> To prevent the employee from signing a union authorization card whether he is approached by the professional union organizer or by a fellow employee.* * *
> [T]he prime objective is to make the employee apprehensive so that he will ask questions and not readily sign an authorization card whether it is put to him from a fellow employee or from a union organizer.

The Special Master found that two aspects of the videotape violated the earlier orders of this court: 1) the description of comparative wage increases given by the company at a union (Fort Lauderdale) and a non-union (Miami) plant; and 2) a segment suggesting that employees who had signed an attendance roster at a union meeting at the Indiantown facility were later forced to give testimony at a government hearing. The Special Master found that both of these segments violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act in that they contained "threats of reprisal" [8] as a result of union support. We agree.

In reaching these conclusions, the Special Master held that where the Board seeks an adjudication of civil contempt, it must do so by clear and convincing evidence. This is the proper standard of proof. N.L.R.B. v. Alamo Express, Inc., 395 F.2d 481 (5th Cir. 1968). Since this proceeding is in civil, not criminal, contempt, the company's intent is not at issue, only its actual compliance with this court's orders. N.L.R.B. v. Crown Laundry & Dry Cleaners, Inc., 437 F.2d 290 (5th Cir. 1971); N.L.R.B. v. Lawley, 182 F.2d 798 (5th Cir. 1950). We need not, therefore address the question of wilfulness.[9] Finally, in reviewing the Special Master's findings of fact, we are bound by the clearly erroneous standard. Fed.R.Civ.P. 53(e)(2); N.L.R.B. v. J.P. Stevens & Co., Inc., Gulistan Div., 538 F.2d 1152 (5th Cir. 1976). Our review of those findings shows that they meet that standard.

The Supreme Court, in N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1942, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), recognized an employer's right to comment on unionism or particular unions provided that such communications do not contain a "threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit." Any prediction as to the consequences of unionization "must be carefully phrased on the basis of objective fact to convey an employer's belief as to demonstrably probable consequences beyond his control." Id. Furthermore, the evaluation of whether a prediction passes muster under the above standard must include consideration not only of the content of the employer's remarks but also the context in which they are made and their cumulative effect. "The question is not only what the employer intended to imply but also what the employees could reasonably have inferred." N.L.R.B. v. Kaiser Agr. Chem. Div. of Kaiser A&C Corp., 473 F.2d 374 (5th Cir. 1973).

In this light it is appropriate to review the company's past practices that might affect employees' interpretation of the challenged portions of the videotape. Since 1966 it has been the company's practice to conduct periodic wage surveys at each of its facilities and to grant wage increases varying between plants as a result of such surveys. Since 1974 this practice has been an established benefit known of and expected by employees. This and other courts have held unlawful Florida Steel's withholding of such wage increases from those employees who selected union representation. Florida Steel Corp., 220 NLRB 260 (1975), enf'd, 543 F.2d 1389 (D.C. Cir. 1976); Florida Steel Corp., 220 NLRB 1201 (1975), enf'd, 538 F.2d 324 (4th Cir. 1976); Florida Steel Corp., 221 NLRB 371 (1975), enf'd, 534 F.2d 1405 (5th Cir. 1976) (the Tampa case supra); Florida Steel Corp., 222 NLRB 955 (1976), enf'd, 536 F.2d 1385 (5th Cir. 1976) (the Jacksonville case supra).

The segment of the videotape dealing with wage increases described the company's practices at its Fort Lauderdale and Miami plants between 1970 and 1973. In 1970 Fort Lauderdale employees had voted for representation, Miami employees against. The script read:

> At Fort Lauderdale, the Company was required by law to negotiate with the union before making any wage increase. Negotiations continued for 14 months at Fort Lauderdale with no agreement and no wage increase. In Miami, each employee averaged an increase of $500 in wages

[7] The company also did not air the film to employees at Orient Road, Tampa who had seen anti-union campaign material upon which the videotape was based.

[8] N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).

[9] In Crown Laundry, writing for this court, Judge Wisdom stated:

> The absence of wilfulness on the part of the Company's top management cannot relieve the Company from civil contempt. The crucial issue in civil contempt proceedings, as distinguished from criminal contempt, is not the employer's state of mind but simply whether the Court's order was in fact violated. McComb v. Jacksonville Paper Co., 1949, 336 U.S. 187 [190], 69 S.Ct. 497[499], 93 L.Ed. 599, 604; N.L.R.B. v. Lawley, 5 Cir. 1950, 182 F.2d 798, 800. Since clear and convincing evidence supports the Special Master's conclusion that the Company, through its agent Baxter, has violated the Act and this Court's earlier order, we have no choice but to adjudge the Company in civil contempt.

during the same 14-month period. Even when Fort Lauderdale employees wanted to accept a contract, the union refused because the Company would not agree to withhold union dues from employees' paychecks. After Florida Steel had negotiated with the union for 14 months with no agreement, the employees voted the union out. Then the Company was able to give wage increases without first bargining with the union, just like they had been doing all along in Miami.

A similar set of events were then described as being repeated in 1972. Accompanying the spoken message was a visual display that in capsule form spelled out the harsh effects of unionization:

Union abandons employees

From these facts, and our own viewing of the tape, we agree with the Special Master that "[t]he clear implication of the videotape then is that, but for the Union's unwillingness to agree to the terms of the entire contract package offered by the Company, employees at Fort Lauderdale would have received the wage increases which were given at Miami."

This segment of the videotape also contained the following statement:

> At Fort Lauderdale the Company was required by law to negotiate with the union before making any wage increases.

All parties agree that this sentence figures centrally in our determination of whether this portion of the tape violates our previous orders prohibiting violation of § 8(a)(1). We agree with the Special Master that the videotape's "clear implication" is that the above-quoted statement accurately describes the law. But, as note above, this is not the law: four courts to date have held that Florida Steel may not withhold the periodic pay increases based on its annual surveys to union employees.[10] By implying that it may lawfully do so (or because employees could reasonably infer such from the film), Florida Steel threatened employees to the effect that electing a union would delay or prevent wage increases and other benefits that would otherwise be granted. In three previous cases,[11] we held that Florida Steel may not so threaten its employees; the company has thus acted in contempt of those decrees.

The second portion of the tape[12] the Special Master found violative of § 8(a)(1) concerns an incident that occurred prior to an election at the Indiantown plant in 1974. Hogue, in a memorandum to Willis, suggested that she develop a part of the tape "around the Indiantown situation where the employee may end up finding himself testifying in court." The finished script read:

> The Sign the Union Card game is full of tricks. These tricks have been pulled on a number of Florida Steel employees. For example, * * * [employees at Indiantown] were induced while attending a union meeting to sign an attendance roster and they ended up with their name on [10] Those decrees, two of which were pronounced by this court, may not be collaterally attacked in this contempt proceeding. Maggio v. Zeitz, 333 U.S. 56, 68 S.Ct. 401, 92 L.Ed 476 (1948).

[11] See note 2 supra.

[12] The videotape catechism-style is divided into "lessons." This segment is titled "Lesson 2."

> some kind of a volunteer organizing committee much to their surprise. These employees were told that their signing would not obligate or bind them in any way. It was just a list to record who attended the meeting. So, the union might use your name without permission, and if the union does use your name, you might end up having to testify at a public federal government hearing. The point is Don't Sign Anything not a card or an attendance record or anything else, unless you know what it means and what affect it could have on you, your job, and your relationship with the Company. (emphasis and capitalization in original script)

The Special Master found that this segment violated § 8(a)(1) in two respects: it implied that the union had misused the names of employees who had attended the union meeting, despite the fact that the Board, in 1975, had found that no such misuse had occurred, and second, the last sentence's admonition implied that an employee's attending a union meeting, testifying at a public hearing, or signing a union card might bear adversely on his job and his relationship with the company. We agree with the Special Master that these implications constituted a "concealed threat." That conclusion is easily reached with respect to the description of the Indiantown incident based as it was on facts found not to have occurred. With respect to the Special Master's determination regarding the last statement, the seemingly innocent caution that employees refrain from signing anything unless they know its meaning and effects, we turn again to Gissel. There, the Supreme Court illuminated some of the factors bearing upon the determination of whether an employer's statement constitutes a threat. Most important in the present context, we believe, is the nature of the relationship between employer and employee, the backdrop against which such statements are made:

> [A]ny balancing of [an employer's rights of free speech and employees' rights to associate freely] must take into account the economic dependence of the employees on their employers, and the necessary tendency of the former, because of that relationship, to pick up intended implications of the latter that might be more readily dismissed by a more disinterested ear.

In our judgment an employee viewing "Look Out for the Cards" might readily conclude from the last line of the above quoted "lesson" that signing a union card—or even an attendance roster at a union meeting—might have adverse consequences upon his job in any of a number of ways including his longevity, grade, salary, and working conditions.[13] Though camouflaged with laudable aphorism, such threats are impermissible.

As a result of these conclusions, the Special Master recommended that Florida Steel be held in civil contempt and proposed a variety of remedies, including: 1) refraining from displaying "Look Out for the Cards" without first expurgating the two segments discussed above; 2) refraining from interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights; 3) posting notices of the contempt adjudication; and 4) paying all costs and expenditures of the Board. The Special Master refused, however, to impose extraordinary remedies requested by the Board on the ground that "this is not a case of flagrant violation of the Court's judgments." In particular, he noted that Florida Steel had deleted the segment of the tape concerning wage increases at Miami and Fort Lauderdale in December 1978 after learning that the Board viewed it as impermissible. On appeal, the Board argues that the Special Master's conclusion was erroneous—Florida Steel flagrantly violated the court's orders—and that extraordinary remedies should therefore be imposed.[14]

In adopting this stance, the Board correctly notes that the proper aim of judicial sanctions for civil contempt is "full remedial relief," McComb v. Jacksonville Paper Co., 336 U.S. 187, 193, 69 S.Ct.

[13] The Special Master, in concluding that this segment violated § 8(a)(1), evinced his awareness that the statement in question must be viewed in the context of the tape in its entirety.

> Although the Company might argue that the intent of this segment was merely to insure that employees were fully aware of what they were in fact signing so that their actions would not be taken out of naivete or ignorance, one must ask the question how would a signature on a union document and a subsequent appearance at a government hearing affect the employee's job and relationship with the Company? In the context of an anti-union film, one is compelled to conclude that the intended message is that the job and the relationship would be in jeopardy. An isolated admonition to "be careful what you sign" is not what is presented by the videotape. It is a threat of adverse consequences to an employee who signs an attendance roster whether that threat pertains to the fear of testifying at a hearing or to the fear that the employee may lose his job.

[14] The union, as amicus, strongly urges the same position.

497, 93 L.Ed. 599 (1949), that such sanctions should be "adapted to the particular circumstances of each case," West Texas Utilities Co., Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 206 F.2d 442, 448 (D.C. Cir. 1953), and that the only limitation upon the sanctions imposed is that they be remedial or coercive but not penal, Lance v. Plummer, 353 F.2d 585, 592 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 384 U.S. 929, 86 S.Ct. 1380, 16 L.Ed.2d 532 (1965). Specifically, it urges this court to impose a prospective fine, union access, and notice distribution.[15]

The Board's essential argument in favor of a prospective fine is first, that such a fine is not an extraordinary remedy (as the Special Master concluded), and second, that it is the remedy that hits the company where it hurts most—the pocketbook—and thus the remedy most likely to be effective.[16] While we agree with the second contention—prospective fines are a strong inducement toward compliance—we disagree with the first: the remedy is extraordinary and should be imposed only where violations have been flagrant and lesser remedies appear likely to fail. Since we agree with the Special Master's finding that "this is not a case of flagrant violation" and we believe that Florida Steel as a result of the remedies recommended by the Special Master will comply with this court's orders, we reject the Board's request.

The Special Master concluded that "flagrant violation" of this court's judgments was not at hand primarily because Florida Steel had corrected that conduct forming the principal basis for his finding of contempt[17] it: had deleted the portion of the videotape discussing wage and benefit practices at Miami and Fort Lauderdale after learning that the Board viewed that segment as impermissible. The only remaining portion of the tape found contumacious was that relating to misuse of employees' names. Hence, he determined extraordinary remedies were not in order and refused to impose prospective fines, union access, and notice distribution.

In support of its claim that prospective fines are "frequently employed by this Court and others," the Board directs us to several cases which in our view do not support this proposition. In N.L.R.B. v. J.P. Stevens & Co., Inc., 563 F.2d 8 (2d Cir. 1977), the court held that strong arguments favored a compliance fine because Stevens had acted in contempt of its orders twice, with more than thirty individual violations.[18] Likewise, in N.L.R.B. v. Shill Steel Products, Inc., 480 F.2d 586 (5th Cir. 1973), we found a prospective fine appropriate where the company had a history of "extreme anti-union activities," id. at 594, and we found the challenged conduct a "flagrant attempt to avoid the conseqeunces of an order of this court," id. at 596.[19] Hence, we conclude that a prospective fine is an extraordinary remedy, not called for in the instant case.[20]

For like reasons, we conclude that union access and additional notice i.e., mailing and reading aloud the court's order to employees, are not, as the Special Master concluded, necessary to effect full remedial relief. The Board's argument that these are the only ways in which the union can respond to the company's illegal assertions

[15] The Board requested the following remedies, respectively, regarding union access and notice distribution:

(1) Upon request of any union or unions made within six months from the date hereof, immediately granting to such unions and their representatives reasonable access to the Company's bulletin boards and all places where notices to employees are customarily posted for a period of one year from the date of such request, and afford such unions reasonable access to all non-work areas to communicate with employees in such areas during non-work time. This is not intended to effect or limit access to the Company's premises to which unions may be entitled by law during work-time.

(2) a. Mailing copies of said signed notice and contempt adjudication to each of its employees and providing to the Director of the Twelfth Regional Office of the Board a list of the names and addresses of all employees to whom said documents were mailed, together with proof of mailing; and

b. Convening during working hours all of the Company's employees, reading to its employees the contents of the said Board notice in the presence of a Board representative.* * *

[16] It notes that if a prospective fine is not levied here it may be imposed for future violations only via a criminal contempt proceeding, a far more difficult hurdle.

[17] In pointing to this fact, the Special Master noted that he did so not to denigrate the seriousness of the company's contumacious conduct but to formulate appropriate remedies.

[18] Stevens' violations had already been described as "massive, cynical, and flagrantly contemptuous." The Second Circuit wrote: "There is no need to add any further adjectives to this chorus." 583 F.2d at 25.

[19] The Board also directs our attention to N.L.R.B. v. Johnson Manufacturing Co. of Lubbock, 511 F.2d 153 (1975). There, too, we found the company in "flagrant contempt." Id. at 154. Johnson does not, however, lend support to the Board's argument for a prospective fine of the sort the Board seeks. In Lubbock we did not impose a fine conditioned upon future noncompliance but rather a fine conditioned upon the employer's failure to purge himself of contempt by a specified date. The former, the remedy the board requests here, is a harsher sanction in that it allows a fine for conduct not already found violative of the Act. Where a fine is conditioned on compliance with orders based upon a specific finding of contempt, the path the employer must take to avoid such fine is much more clear.

[20] In noting (n.1 supra) the long history of litigation Florida Steel has had before this court, we do not contradict this conclusion. The remedy formulated, while not blind to the history of the company's union relations, must be proportionate to the illegal conduct at hand.

in the videotape fails because the posting of the Special Master's recommendations and this court's orders will serve as notice of the falsehoods and threats contained within the tape, and their illegality. Additionally, as the Special Master noted, no employee has viewed the segment of the tape dealing with Miami and Fort Lauderdale wage increases for the past two years. Under these circumstances and in light of our determination that a flagrant violation has not occurred, we conclude that the remedies recommended by the Special Master adequately correct the instant wrongs.

We therefore approve and adopt the Report of the Special Master recommending that Florida Steel be held in contempt. The motion of the Board for adjudication of respondent in civil contempt is thus granted. We direct respondent to purge itself of contempt by compliance with the remedies set forth within the Report and Recommendations of the Special Master.

Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL-CIO v. Standard-Coosa Thatcher Carpet Yarn Division, Inc.

516 F. Supp. 1078 (N.D. Ala.), June 16, 1981

On action for informal settlement agreement

GUIN, District Judge: This cause came before the court upon cross-motions of the plaintiff, Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL-CIO, CLC, and the defendant-intervenor, the National Labor Relations Board, for summary judgment, and upon reconsideration of a motion to dismiss by the defendant Standard-Coosa-Thatcher Carpet Yarn Division, Inc. Having considered the pleadings, submissions of counsel, and applicable law, the court is of the opinion that judgment is due the defendants as a matter of law, that there is no genuine issue of material fact, that there is no just reason for delay in issuing a final judgment, and that, therefore defendants' motion should be granted and plaintiff's denied, in conformity with the Memorandum Opinion entered contemporaneously herewith.

Accordingly, it is ORDERED, ADJUDGED and DECREED that defendant-intervenor's motion for summary judgment be and the same hereby is GRANTED; and it is

FURTHER ORDERED that defendant Standard-Coosa-Thatcher's motion to dismiss, upon reconsideration be GRANTED; and it is

FURTHER ORDERED that plaintiff's motion for summary judgment be and the same hereby is DENIED; and it is FURTHER ORDERED that final judgment be and the same hereby is GRANTED in favor of the defendant and defendant-intervenor and against the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff shall have and recover nothing of the defendant in this case.

Costs are taxed against the plaintiff.

MEMORANDUM OPINION

GUIN, District Judge: This cause is before the court upon motions by the plaintiff and the defendant-intervenor, the National Labor Relations Board, for summary judgment and upon reconsideration of the defendant Standard-Coosa-Thatcher's motion to dimiss. The National Labor Relations Board was granted leave to intervene by order of this court dated January 18, 1980.

The facts in this case are undisputed. Plaintiff-union and defendant-employer entered into an informal settlement agreement under 29 Code of Federal Regulations § 101.7 on February 5, 1979. The terms of the settlement agreement provided that the employer pay back wages to one employee for alleged discrimination and post a standard National Labor Relations Board notice stating that the employer would repay the back wages and refrain from future activities in violation of the National Labor Relations Act.

The informal settlement agreement provides in pertinent part:

> Refusal to Issue Complaint—In the event the Charging Party fails or refuses to become a party to this Agreement, and if in the Regional Director's discretion it will effectuate the policies of the National Labor Relations Act, Regional Director shall decline to issue a Complaint herein (or a new Complaint if one has been withdrawn pursuant to the terms of this Agreement), and this Agreement shall be between the Charged Party > and the undersigned Regional Dicretor. A review of such action may be obtained pursuant to Section 102.19 of the Rules and Regulations of the Board if a request for same is filed within 10 days thereof. This

> 1080
> Agreement is contingent upon the General Counsel sustaining the Regional Director's action in the event of a review. Approval of this Agreement by the Regional Director shall constitute withdrawal of any Complaint(s) and Notice of Hearing heretofore issued in this case. [Emphasis added]

Furthermore, the settlement agreement provides:

> Notification of Compliance—* * * Contingent upon Compliance with the terms and provisions hereof, no further action shall be taken in this case.

Subsequent to the execution of the settlement agreement by both the union and the employer, the agreement was approved on March 1, 1979, by the NLRB Regional Director; this approval is required by 29 C.F.R. § 101.7 and the terms of the agreement itself. On March 26, 1979, the employer notified the Regional Direcetor of the NLRB that it would not honor the settlement agreement, and the Regional Director thereupon withdrew his approval of the agreement on March 27, 1979.

Plaintiff now petitions this court for relief, claiming that the informal settlement agreement, once executed by the parties and approved by the Commissioner, constituted a complete and binding contract. Plaintiff requests the court to grant specific performance of the contract.

Defendant Standard-Coosa-Thatcher and Defendant-intervenor, the National Labor Relations Board, claim that this court has no jurisdiction to hear the complaint, asserting that jurisdiction is preempted by the unfair labor practice proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board. Defendants also claim that the contract was rendered null and void by the action of the Regional Director in rescinding his approval thereof.

Jurisdiction is asserted under Section 301(a) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, 29 U.S.C. § 185(a) which provides:

> (a) Suits for violation of contracts between an employer and a labor organization representing employees in an industry affecting commerce as defined in this chapter, or between any such labor organizations, may be brought in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties, without respect to the amount in controversy or without regard to the citizenship of the parties.

Plaintiff asserts that under the authority of Retail Clerks International Association v. Lion Dry Goods, Inc., 369 U.S. 17, 82 S.Ct. 541, 7 L.Ed.2d 503 (1962) and Deaton Truck Line, Inc. v. Local Union 612, etc., 314 F.2d 418 (5th Cir. 1962), the settlement agreement was a "contract" within the meaning of Section 301(a), assuming that the settlement agreement is a valid contract.

The plaintiff further claims that jurisdiction of this dispute is not preempted by the doctrine espoused in San Diego Building Trades Council v. Garmon, 359 U.S. 236, 79 S.Ct. 773, 3 L.Ed.2d 775 (1959), which stated that if an unfair labor practice is "arguably involved", the courts must defer to the administrative expertise of the National Labor Relations Board. In support of his position, the plaintiff cites Smith v. Evening News Association, 371 U.S. 195, 83 S.Ct. 267, 9 L.Ed.2d 246 (1962), which carved out an exception to the Garmon preemption doctrine for suits brought under Section 301 in which an unfair labor practice is also involved. However, the pertinent language in Smith v. Evening News Association, infra, provides:

> In Lucas Flour [Local 174, Teamsters, etc. v. Lucas Flour Co., 369 U.S. 95, 82 S.Ct. 571, 7 L.Ed.2d 593] as well as in Atkinson [v. Sinclair Refining Co., 370 U.S. 238, 82 S.Ct. 1318, 8 L.Ed.2d 462] the Court refused to apply the preemption doctrine of the Garmon case; and we likewise reject that doctrine here where the alleged conduct of the employer, not only arguably, but concededly, is an unfair labor practice within the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. The authority of the Board to deal with an unfair labor practice which also violates a collective bargaining contract is not displaced by Section 301, but it is not > exclusive and does not destroy the jurisdiction of the courts in suits under Section 301.
> 1081

371 U.S. at 197, 83 S.Ct. at 268–269. [Emphasis added].

The position that the exception to the Garmon preemption principle for section 301 which the Court carved out in Smith relates only to collective bargaining agreements is restated in Motor Coach Employees v. Lockridge, 403 U.S. 274, 91 S.Ct. 1909, 29 L.Ed.2d 473 (1971), which provided:

> We have exempted Section 301 suits from the Garmon principle because of the evident Congressional determination that courts should be free to interpret and enforce collective bargaining agreements even where that process may involve condemning or permitting conduct arguably subject to the protection or prohibition of the National Labor Relations Act.

403 U.S. at 300, 91 S.Ct. at 1925. [Emphasis added].

The Court in Motor Coach rejected the Section 301 suit before it which was based on the implied-in-law contract between a union and an employee. "That is why" concluded the Court, "the principle of Smith v. Evening News is applicable only to those disputes that are governed by the terms of the collective bargaining agreement itself." 403 U.S. 274, 301, 91 S.Ct. 1909, 1925, 29 L.Ed.2d 473, 491 (1971).

The plaintiff's arguments, however, without reaching the clarification of Smith v. Evening News, that is outlined in Motor Coach v. Lockridge, infra, do not appear to be applicable in light of the language and nature of the informal settlement agreement involved in this cause. The settlement agreement in this case is a form agreement that provides, consistent with the policies of the National Labor Relations Board, that the agreement is between the charged party, the employer-company, and the Board. See the terms of the agreement as outlined, infra. The Fifth Circuit has clearly stated that the National Labor Relations Board may set aside a settlement agreement and reinstitute unfair labor practice charges when the terms of the agreement have been breached. National Labor Relations Board v. Southeastern Stages, Inc., 423 F.2d 878 (5th Cir. 1970). See also Gulf States Manufacturers, Inc. v. NLRB, 598 F.2d 896 (5th Cir. 1979). It is undisputed that the charged party (the employer-company) has breached the terms of the agreement in this cause as the employer notified the Regional Director of the National Labor Relations Board on March 26, 1979 that it would not honor the agreement. Thus, it appears that the union cannot even claim that it is a third party beneficiary to the contract because the contract has been validly set aside and is no longer in existence.

Thus, it appears that under the preemption doctrine outlined in San Diego Building Trades Council v. Garmon, 359 U.S. 236, 79 S.Ct. 773, 3 L.Ed.2d 775 (1959), this court must defer to the administrative expertise of the National Labor Relations Board and, therefore, does not have jurisdiction over this dispute.

Judgment is entered in favor of all defendants upon reconsideration of the motion to dismiss filed by Standard-Coosa-Thatcher and under the authority of Black Warrior Electric Membership Corporation v. Mississippi Power Co., 413 F.2d 1221 (5th Cir. 1969).

An order consistent with this memorandum opinion will be entered contemporaneously herewith.

Arthur Eisenberg, Reg. Dir. v. Wellington Hall Nursing Home, Inc.

651 F.2d 902 (3d Cir.), June 17, 1981; amended
June 30, 1981

On appeal from D.C.N.J.

Before GIBBONS, HUNTER and GARTH, Circuit Judges

904

GIBBONS, Circuit Judge: This is an appeal by the Regional Director of the Twenty-second Region of the National Labor Relations Board on the Board's behalf from an order of the District Court of the District of New Jersey denying in part a petition, pursuant to section 10(j) of the National Labor Relations act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(j), for a temporary injunction pending Board resolution of unfair labor practice charges.[1] The employer, Wellington Hall

---

[1] Section 10(j) provides:

> The Board shall have power, upon issuance of a complaint as provided in subsection (b) of this section charging that any person has engaged in or is engaging in an unfair labor practice, to petition any United States district court, within any district wherein the unfair labor practice in question is alleged to have occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order. Upon the filing of any such petition the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon Nursing Home, Inc., cross appeals from the same order to the extent that it granted injunctive relief. On the Board's appeal we reverse and remand for the entry of an order reinstating certain employees. On the employer's cross-appeal we affirm.

I.

Wellington Hall owns and operates a nursing home in Hackensack, New Jersey. On October 1, 1976, Local 1115 Nursing Home & Hospital Employees Union, Division of 1115 Joint Board (the Union) was certified by the Board as the exclusive bargaining representative of approximately 85 of Wellington Hall's service and maintenance employees. The certification did not lead to a mutually satisfactory collective bargaining relationship, and beginning in October 1976 the Union filed a series of unfair labor practice charges alleging refusal to bargain and various forms of retaliations for and threats about employees engaging in protected activity. Several of the Union's charges resulted in unfair labor practice hearings before the Board, and at least two Board orders against Wellington Hall were enforced by this court.[2] One of our judgments, dated December 5, 1979, enforced a Board order that Wellington Hall bargain in good faith with the Union and refrain from interfering with restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of rights protected by section 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157. See Wellington Hall Nursing Home, Inc., 240 N.L.R.B. 639 (1979), enforced, NLRB v. Wellington Hall Nursing Home, Inc., No. 79-1415 (3d Cir. Dec. 5, 1979). Additional unfair labor practice charges were made thereafter. Those giving rise to this appeal grow out of the Union's attempt to bargain. On June 9, 1980, the Union initiated a request for a 905 bargaining meeting, offering alternative dates. Wellington Hall indicated these were inconvenient and suggested other dates. While negotiations over a time for a bargaining session were going on, the Union held a meeting of bargaining unit members to discuss demands and designate an employee negotiating committee. A bargaining meeting finally was scheduled for June 25, 1980, but prior to that time several of the employees named by the Union as members of the employee negotiating committee were discharged after June 25. In addition, Wellington Hall discharged other employees who had attended the Union meeting, or solicited employees to attend. On June 24, Wellington Hall cancelled the June 25, scheduled meeting. It also cancelled a subsequently scheduled August 28 meeting. The excuses offered in each instance fail to mitigate the effect of employer resistance, especially in light of the totality of the circumstances. The Union filed unfair labor practice charges with the Board with respect to the employee discharges, and a complaint and notice of hearing issued. The complaint alleges that the employees were discharged because they engaged in, or sought to engage in concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining or mutual aid and protection. Wellington Hall Nursing Home, Inc., Case No. 22-CA-10108 (Sept. 5, 1980).

On October 8, 1980, the Regional Director filed in the District Court a petition for an injunction under section 10(j) of the Act, setting forth the appropriate jurisdictional facts, appending a copy of the unfair labor practice complaint about employee discharges pending before the Board, and alleging that he has reasonable cause to believe the unfair labor practices have been committed and are likely to be continued. On the return of an order directing Wellington Hall to show cause why a temporary injunction should not issue the court heard testimony, and on November 18, 1980 it entered the order from which both parties appeal. The court restrained Wellington Hall from discharging employees in the bargaining unit without first giving written notice to the employee, the Union, and the Board. The order gives the Board and the Union five business days to object to any discharge and to request that a disputed discharge be referred to a special master for resolution. Wellington Hall's appeal puts the injunction in issue. The court refused to order reinstatement of the eight employees whose discharge is the subject of the pending Board complaint. The Board appeal seeks a reversal of that refusal. On February 4, 1981 a panel of this court granted the Board's motion for an injunction pending appeal, directing reinstatement of five of the discharged employees.

shall have jurisdiction to grant to the Board such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper.

29 U.S.C. § 160(j).

II.

Wellington Hall contends that the district court erred in holding that the regional director had demonstrated his reasonable cause to believe that the elements of an unfair labor practice are present. Thus, it contends, no injunction should have issued. In Eisenberg v. Hartz Mountain Corp., 519 F.2d 138, 143 (3d Cir. 1975), we held that reasonable cause to believe a violation of the act has occurred, a standard for injunctive relief originally developed in cases arising under section 10(l) of the Act, is also applicable to section 10(j) proceedings. The trial court's determination that this low threshold of proof was met is reviewed by a clearly erroneous standard. Angie v. Sacks, 382 F.2d 655 (10th Cir. 1967). The trial court found that the Board had reasonable cause to believe the discharges were motivated by anti-union animus. There is evidence of a history of employer resistance to collective bargaining. Each employee discharged was an active union supporter, and five of the eight who were discharged were designated members of the union-sponsored six employee negotiating committee.[3] Wellington Hall 906 maintains all were discharged for poor work quality, tardiness, and absenteeism. However, many of the problems referred to in its notices of discharge were remote in time or of minimal gravity. Thus the Board could reasonably believe that the notices were records compiled as a basis for discharge from payroll records and time cards long after the fact.

Wellington Hall relies on caselaw dealing with mixed motive discharges, such as Edgewood Nursing Center, Inc. v. NLRB, 581 F.2d 363, 368 (3d Cir. 1978). The cases relied on, however, are all cases reviewing final Board action, in which we review for substantial evidence in the record as a whole of the employer's anti-union motivation. In a section 10(j) or 10(l) case the court need not, indeed should not, make a finding of employer motivation. It need only find a reasonable cause for belief that there was such a motivation. That standard of proof is fully satisfied on this record.

III.

Although the district court properly held that the Board satisfied the reasonable belief standard for section 10(j) relief, and properly enjoined future retaliatory discharges or intimidations of union supporters, it refused to order reinstatement of the eight discharged employees. In doing so it relied upon the provision in section 10(j), found also in section 10(l), that, in the public interest, the court may grant "such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper." The denial of reinstatement was not predicated on a finding that the Board would be likely, ultimately, to find good cause for the discharge independent of the employees' union activity. Rather the court fashioned a new and unprecedented rule of law that reinstatement pending a board hearing is not a proper section 10(j) remedy. The court advanced two reasons for this rule, neither of which are persuasive.

First, the court noted that when the Board sought temporary injunctive relief it was not required to post an injunction bond. That is so, but the lack of such a requirement reflects a congressional decision that in protecting the public interest the Board must in section 10(l) cases, and may in section 10(j) cases, preserve the status quo. Even though enormous economic interests may be at stake, as in Consolidated Express, Inc. v. New York Shipping Ass'n., Inc., 641 F.2d 90 (3d Cir. 1981), mandamus and prohibition denied,——U.S.——, 101 S.Ct. 2008, 68 L.Ed.2d 318 (1981), and Pascarell v. New York Shipping Ass'n. Inc., 650 F.2d 19 (3d Cir. 1981), the unavailability of an injunction bond is no reason for permiting a change in status quo which risks giving ongoing effect to what may be an unfair labor practice. Moreover the concern about protecting the employer from the harm from an injunction is in the employee reinstatement context entirely misplaced. The employer will receive the benefit of the reinstated employees' labor in the interim. If there is a serious question about the quality of any employee's future work performance he can be discharged when the question arises. The injunction which was fashioned here with respect to those employees who were not discharged demonstrates that there is ample room for accommodation of management's legitimate need to supervise the workforce.

The court also noted that there was no need for a reinstatement order because the Board, if it found that the discharges were in retaliation for engaging in protected activity, could order reinstatement with back pay. That reasoning, however, misapprehends the purpose of section 10(j) relief. When the Board files an application for such relief it is not acting on [3] On February 4, 1981, this court ordered reinstatement of these five employees. The sixth member of the employee negotiating committee was also discharged, but reinstatement is not sought on her behalf.

907

behalf of individual employees, but in the public interest. See Eisenberg v. Hartz Mountain Corp., supra. That interest is in the integrity of the collective bargaining process. If union supporters are excluded from the bargaining process pending resolution of unfair labor practice charges, the position of the designated bargaining representatives will in all likelihood be substantially undermined. All members of the bargaining unit may be affected by such an erosion of union support. Furthermore, the discharge of "active and open union supporters * * * risk[s] a serious adverse impact on employee interest in unionization." Kaynard v. Palby Lingerie, Inc., 625 F.2d 1047, 1053 (2d Cir. 1980). When the Board, faced with an employer's resort to tactics calculated to undermine union support at a critical stage of the bargaining process, seeks section 10(j) relief, the focus of attention should not be on what relief may ultimately be granted to individual employees, but on the likelihood of harm to the bargaining process in the interim.[4]

This is not a case in which the Board tolerated erosion of union support by delaying for a long period after charges were filed before seeking section 10(j) relief. Cf. Boire v. Pilot Freight Carriers, Inc., 515 F.2d 1185, 1193 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 426 U.S. 934, 96 S.Ct. 2646, 49 L.Ed.2d 385 (1976) (delay is "some evidence that the detrimental effect of the discharges have already taken their toll" such that reinstatement would probably be no more effective than final Board order). See also Eisenberg v. Hartz Mountain Corp., 519 F.2d 138 (3d Cir. 1979) (six month time span can make difference in employee attitude). The Board moved promptly to preserve the status quo in an existing bargaining relationship already the subject of a fully litigated bargaining order, following a Board certification of the bargaining representative. The trial court's reasons for refusing to order resinstatment are legally insufficient. In view of the potential for irreparable harm to the designated bargaining representative from the loss of eight union supporters in the small bargaining unit, it was an abuse of the discretion that section 10(j) affords to refuse to order reinstatement. Brown v. Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Co., 218 F.2d 542 (9th Cir. 1954) (as amended in 1955 on denial of rehearing).

IV.

The order appealed from will be affirmed insofar as it granted injunctive relief pending final Board action. It will be reversed insofar as it denied the Board's request for an order requiring reinstatement of eight employees. The order of this court granting injunctive relief pending appeal shall remain in effect until such time as an order consistent with this opinion is entered in the district court.

NLRB v. General Time Corporation

650 F.2d 872 (7th Cir.), June 17, 1981—249 NLRB 1204

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before FAIRCHILD, Chief Judge, and SPRECHER, and WOOD, Circuit Judges

873

SPRECHER, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board has applied to this court for enforcement of its order issued against the Westclox Military Products Division of General Time Corporation ("Company"). The question we must decide is whether substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the Board's finding that the Company violated Sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, ("Act") [1] by deferring payment of vacation pay to striking employees who were members of the United Steelworkers of America AFL–CIO–CLC ("Union").

I

The Company is engaged in the production of military timing devices. The Union has served as the exclusive collective bargaining representative of the Company's production and maintenance employees since 1971.[2] [4] Judge Biunno was also concerned that reinstatement might raise "an appearance of prejudging the issue as to any employee." In light of the above analysis, as well as the fact that § 10(j) relief is not premised on a determination of the merits, such concern is unwarranted.

---

[1] Sections 8(a)(1) and (3), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (3), provide in pertinent part that it is an unfair labor practice for an employer:

Each year, for the last 20 years, the Company has scheduled a plant shutdown and workforce vacation during the last two weeks in July. Since at least 1966, the collective-bargaining agreements between the parties have explicitly set forth that period as the Union members' first two weeks of annual vacation. These collective-bargaining agreements also contained a formula for determining the amount of vacation pay due based on the employees' "straight time" earnings during a portion of the "vacation year," which ran June 1 to May 31. The contracts did not set forth when vacation pay was to be received by Union members in relation to the time of the plant shutdown. Since 1966, however, all of the Company's employees have received vacation pay for the last two weeks in July on the Friday before the Monday that vacation was scheduled to begin.[3]

The most recent collective bargaining agreement ran from June 7, 1976 through June 2, 1979. The parties failed to reach an agreement upon a new collective bargaining agreement, and, consequently, the Union struck on June 3, 1979. The Union remained on strike until August 29, 1979, when a new contract was ratified by the Union membership.

During the strike, the Company engaged in its normal July shutdown. The plant was shut down from Monday, July 16, through Friday, June 27. The Company paid vacation pay to all non-Union employees on Friday, July 13. Among those receiving such payments on July 13 were skilled craft unit employees represented by the International Association of Machinists ("IAM") who did not cross the Union's picket line.

The Company did not distribute vacation pay to the striking employees on Friday, July 13. Nor did the Company pay vacation pay on other dates thereafter, when requested by the Union. By letter dated July 30, the Company notified the striking empoyees that it was "not quarreling that eligible employees have vacation pay coming" but "[s]ince we do not have a contract the question of when this vacation pay is payable is an unresolved issue." The striking employees did not receive their vacation pay until after August 29, when a new contract was ratified.

The Union instituted this proceeding before the N.L.R.B. in response to the Company's refusal to distribute vacation pay until the new collective bargaining agreement was ratified. The Board found, in agreement with the Administrative Law Judge, that the Company violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by deferring the payment of vacation pay of its employees because they were engaged in protected concerted activity. In addition, the Board also found that the refusal to pay vacation pay was a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The Board's order requires the Company to cease and desist from continuing the unfair labor practices and from, in any like or related manner, interfering with, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act. The Board's order also requires the Company to make whole, with interest, all striking employees for any loss of wages they may have suffered as a result of the Company's failure to pay them vacation benefits on July 13. The Company must post appropriate notices, and, upon request, must make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, time cards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze and compute the amount of backpay due. We enforce the Board's order.

II

An employer violates Sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act if he unjustifiably denies accrued vacation pay to striking employes. N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc, 388 U.S. 26, 32, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 1796, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967); N.L.R.B. v. Knuth Bros.

---

[2] The Union and its predecessor, the International Union of District 50, Allied and Technical Workers of the United States and Canada, with whom the Union merged in 1971, have represented the production and maintenance workers since 1941.

[3] The single exception to this practice occurred during a strike in 1973. The Union struck after the parties failed to agree upon a new contract after the expiration of the previous contract. The strike continued through the traditional July shutdown. At that time, vacation pay was not distributed to Union members until a new contract was ratified. The Union did not file unfair labor practice charges in 1973.

The Company does not argue that the Union's failure to file charges in 1973 estops it from complaining of the Company's actions in 1979. But the Company argues that the withholding of vacation pay during the 1973 strike shows that the Company actions in 1979 were consistent with past practice. We disagree. The traditional practice unquestionably was to distribute vacation pay prior to the July plant shutdown. We can draw no inferences from the practice in 1973, since it was an isolated occurrence and the fairness of the practice was never challenged or decided.

Inc., 584 F.2d 813, 816 (7th Cir. 1978); Flambeau Plastics Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 401 F.2d 128, 135–36 (7th Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 1019, 89 S.Ct. 625, 21 L.Ed.2d 563 (1969). Paying vacation benefits to a group of employees while withholding them from other is "discrimination in its simplest form." Great Dane, 388 U.S. at 32, 87 S.Ct. at 1796. Postponement, as well as outright denial, of vacation benefits to striking employees violates the Act. See Allied Indus. Workers, AFL–CIO Local 289 v. N.L.R.B., 476 F.2d 868, 878 (D.C.Cir. 1973).

Thus, an employer is guilty of an unfair labor practice unless it can show that the refusal to grant vacation pay was justified in that it was motivated by legitimate objectives. Great Dane, 388 U.S. at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1797, *System Council T–4 v. 875

The Company advances several justifications for its refusal to grant vacation pay to striking Union members on July 13. The Company acknowledges that members of the Union had already accrued their entitlement to vacation pay when the collective bargaining agreement expired on June 3, 1979. But the Company argues that it was not obligated to distribute the vacation pay to Union members on July 13, 1979 for two reasons. First, there was no contract in effect, and, therefore, no vacation period specified. Second, the Union had submitted vacation proposals to the Company which could have changed both the amount of vacation pay due in 1979 and the time of the initial two-week vacation period. In short, the Company argues, the vacation period was just another negotiable term in the contract; in the absence of a contract, there could be no contract violation.

We find the Company's argument disingenuous. The right to vacation pay arose from the expired contract, the past practices of the Company, and the actual shutdown and payment of vacation pay to non-Union employees in July, 1979. Neither the expiration of the old contract nor alleged uncertainty as to the terms of the new contract has any bearing on the Company's refusal to pay vacation benefits.

First, even after expiration of a contract, employees' rights to traditional vacation pay do not expire. Hi-Grade Materials Co., 239 NLRB 947, 956 (1978).[4] Even if a new collective bargaining agreement had never been reached, the Union members still would have been entitled to the accrued vacation pay. The contractual provision for vacation pay to accrue in the "vacation year" of June 1, 1978 to May 31, 1979, would be a nullity if a new contract was necessary to distribute the benefits accrued under the expired contract. The vacation period and payment date should be linked to the year in which the pay accrued. That the expired contract did not specify the date of vacation pay is not relevant. The vacation pay date had never been specified in previous contracts. Past practice clearly established the payment date as the Friday before the first Monday of vacation. To condition the receipt of benefits which accrued under the old contract on ratification of a new contract was plainly coercive.

In addition to being coercive, the Company's actions were discriminatory. The Company distributed vacation pay to IAM members, who honored the Union's picket line, and to salaried employees. The Company attempts to justify paying IAM members by pointing to the IAM contract, which specifically mentions the July 16 to July 29, 1979, shutdown. The Company cannot point to a similar contract for salaried employees, but claims that the shutdown period for salaried employees had also been definitely scheduled for that period. But the Company's attempt to distinguish Union employees is unconvincing. We cannot see how the Company can profess uncertainty as to whether the last two weeks in July would have been the Union members' vacation period, when the plant was shut down for all of the salaried and skilled craft employees during that period. This common type of plant-wide shutdown would seem to depend on all employees getting the same vacation period. It would strain common sense to find, as the Company would have us, that the shutdown was merely a bargained-for item, unique to the Union's contract.

[4] In Hi-Grade Materials, the Board found that an employer should have paid employees for a contractually agreed holiday (Labor Day). The Board adopted the Administrative Law Judge's decision, which stated:

> Even if it is assumed, arguendo, that the contract was not continued on a day-to-day basis after September 6, payment for holidays was a practice of 10 years' standing, thus it was a condition of employment and the employees were entitled to pay for the holiday.

239 NLRB at 956.

The prohibition against withholding vacation benefits, first enunciated in Great Dane, has been applied to factual situations very similar to this one. For example, in Wallace Metal Products, Inc., 244 NLRB No. 10 (1979), the Board found Section 8(a)(1) and (3) violations in an employer's failure to distribute accrued vacation pay to striking employees at the time of the usual plant vacation of the first two weeks in July. In Wallace Metal, the expired contract stated that the plant would be shut down for two weeks beginning "the first Monday of July of each year." 244 NLRB No. 10 at 15. In this case, the vacation dates had been specified for the three years covered by the contract. In both cases, the contract explicitly setting the shutdown had expired. In Wallace Metal, the Board held that accrued vacation pay must be paid at the "usual" time, despite the absence of a current contract specifying the date. We agree, and we see no relevant factual differences between the situation in Wallace Metal and the situation here. To conclude that an expired contract that had set a vacation period beginning "the first Monday of July of each year" fixes the vacation date, while a contract that sets a vacation date specifically for each year of the contract—but for the same time each year, the last two weeks of July—does not fix a vacation date would be absurd.

The Company's reliance on G. C. Murphy, 207 NLRB 579 (1973) is misplaced. In Murphy, the Board held that the employer did not violate Sections 8(a)(1) and (3) by requiring employees who honored a picket line, and thus were not working at the time of their scheduled vacations, to reschedule their vacations. Only those employees who had scheduled their vacations and then were not working when the vacations were to begin were affected. At the close of the strike, the union requested that the employees be given a lump sum vacation payment instead of time off with pay. The employer refused, stating that vacations would be rescheduled after the strike. The employer acted consistently with the existing contract, which required employees to take their vacation benefits in the form of time off with pay and not a lump sum. The Board found that the employer did not commit an unfair labor practice in following the terms of an existing contract where there was no proof of anti-union animus.

The situation in the case before us is different from the situation in Murphy. Here, the Company cannot rely on an existing contract to justify its refusal to distribute vacation pay to Union members. Rather, the Company can only rely on the non-existence of a contract. As discussed above, we reject this reliance. In addition, unlike the employer in Murphy, the Company traditionally shut down the entire plant during the last two weeks in July. The Company followed this tradition in 1979, and it distributed vacation pay to all but striking Union members on the traditional date. Thus, the Murphy result offers no assistance to the Company.

Finally, the Company argues that vacation benefits were the subject of pending negotiations and, therefore, it was not bound to pay the accrued benefits on the traditional date. But the Board adopted the Administrative Law Judge's finding that the 1979 vacation benefits were not a subject of negotiations leading to the contract ratified in August, 1979. The Company argues that we should reject the Board's finding. We decline to reject this finding because it is amply supported by substantial evidence in the record as a whole. The record shows that the formula for calculation of vacation pay for the vacation year that ended May 31, 1979, was set by the expired contract. Moreover, the Union's proposals concerning a change in calculation of benefits were withdrawn prior to the strike. Although some testimony was disputed regarding whether the Union discussed taking the two-week vacation and pay after the strike, the ALJ and the Board found that the vacation pay issue never rose to the level of being a major bone of contention between the parties during the course of the strike. The resolution of conflicts in testimony is peculiarly within the domain of the trier of fact. Electri-Flex Co. v. N.L.R.B. 570 F.2d 1327, 1331, 1332 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 911, 99 S.Ct. 280, 58 L.Ed.2d 256 (1978). Thus, the Company cannot rely on the collective bargaining process to justify its refusal to distribute accrued vacation pay to striking Union members.

In summary, we find that neither the expiration of the contract nor the spending negotiations for a new contract can justify the Company's refusal to pay accrued vacation benefits to striking Union members on July 13, 1979, the traditional pay date. The Board properly found violations of Sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

III

The Board's remedial order requires the Company to pay interest on the vacation pay that was deferred from July 13 until August 29, 1979. Citing F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), enf. denied on other grounds, 322 F.2d 913 (9th Cir. 1963), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), the Company argues that interest on vacation pay accrues quarterly; thus, interest could accrue only if vacation benefits had been withheld beyond the quarter which ended September 30, 1979. The Company's interpretation of these cases is erroneous. These cases used quarterly accrual of interest on backpay awards because the amount of backpay due was calculated by offsetting actual quarterly earnings against each quarter of pay lost due to wrongful discharge. These cases do not imply that interest is not due for losses occurring over less than a quarter.

The purpose of allowing interest is to put the wronged employees in the position they would have been but for the unfair labor practice. Phelps Dodge Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 313 U.S. 177, 194, 61 S.Ct. 845, 852, 85 L.Ed. 1271 (1941). Interest has been routinely awarded in cases similar to the case before us. See N.L.R.B. v. Knuth Bros., Inc., 229 NLRB 1204, 1206 (1977), enforced, 584 F.2d 813 (7th Cir. 1978); Indiana & Michigan Elec. Co., 236 NLRB 986, 991 (1978), enforced mem., 610 F.2d 811 (4th Cir. 1979). Here, the employees should have received vacation pay on July 13, 1979. They did not receive that pay until August 29, 1979. Thus, we find that the Board was well within its remedial authority to charge interest in order to compensate the Union members for the delayed payment.

For the foregoing reasons, we order enforcement of the Board's order.

NLRB v. Antonino Carilli, d/b/a Antonino's Restaurant

648 F.2d 1206 (9th Cir.), June 22, 1981—246 NLRB 833

On petition to enforce Board Order

1208

EAST, District Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (Board) petitions for enforcement of its order against Antonino Carilli, d/b/a Antonino's Restaurant (Antonino's). The Board found that Antonino's engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1)[1] of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) by interrogating an employee about her Union[2] membership suggesting that employees withdraw or resign from the Union, implying to employees that it would be futile to join or support the Union, and by unilaterally implementing a new medical and dental insurance program in order to discourage Union membership.

The Board also found that Antonino's had violated Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5)[3] of the Act by withdrawing recognition from the Union, refusing to negotiate, and unilaterally terminating certain payments to the employees' health and pension trust funds. The Board's order essentially directs Antonino's to cease and desist from committing these and other unfair labor practices, to bargain with the Union upon request, and to pay delinquent contributions to the employees' trust funds.

We note jurisdiction pursuant to Section 10(e)[4] of the Act, and grant enforcement.

FACT

Antonino Carilli and his wife, Jean, operate Antonino's Restaurant in Hayward, California. The Carillis' two sons, Larry and Tom, work respectively as assistant manager and chef. It is admitted that all of the Carilli family are supervisors with the meaning of Section 2(11)[5] of the Act, even though Larry and Tom Carilli were represented by the Union.

[4] 29 U.S.C § 160(e).

Antonino's first recognized the Union in 1972. Thereafter, Antonino's joined a multi-employer bargaining group, the East Bay Restaurant Association (Association), and subsequently because a party to a 1973–1978 collective bargaining agreement. That agreement has an expiration date of August 6, 1978, subject to timely notice of termination, and contained a provision for reopening for wage negotiations. The agreement also included provisions for employer contributions into separate, jointly-administered trust funds for the administration of programs providing health and pension benefits to covered employees. Antonino's abided by the contract's terms and contributed to the trust funds during the duration of the 1973–1978 contract.

In the Spring of 1977, Antonino's gave timely notice to the Association that it was restricting the Association's authority to bargain on its behalf and that no changes or extensions to the contract were to be negotiated which would bind Antonino's beyond the August 6, 1978 termination date. The Association gave written notice to the Union of Antonino's action and thereafter negotiated a four-year extension of the 1973–1978 agreement, with various modifications concerning wages and benefits.

In June of 1978, Antonino's wrote the Union that it would terminate the collective bargaining agreement when it expired in August of 1978. The Union, apparently operating under the misconception that Antonino's was bound by the four-year extension of the 1973–1978 collective bargaining agreement, rejected Antonino's notice of termination as "untimely and unacceptable."

Prior to this exchange, the Carillis had engaged in some conversations with employees generally concerning the importance of insurance benefits and their relation to Union membership. Antonino's then contacted several insurance brokers concerning the purchase of medical and dental insurance programs for the employees to replace the existing Union-Association program upon expiration of Antonino's contract with the Union. On July 25, 1978, Antonino's authorized an insurance broker to purchase a medical and dental insurance program underwritten by Crown Life Insurance Company which would be effective August 6, 1979. Antonino's also arranged for the insurance broker to meet with the employees and explain the new insurance coverage.

When the collective bargaining agreement expired on August 6, 1978, Antonino's ceased making contributions into the health and pension trust funds. On August 11, 1978, employees Paul Dana Washburn prepared a handwritten decertification showing of interest petition and began circulating it. Over the next two days, Washburn collected 16 signatures on his petition, the last two of which were those of Larry and Tom Carilli. Washburn filed this petition with the Board on August 17, 1978.

On the morning of August 15, 1978, the insurance broker and Larry Carilli met with approximately 15 to 20 employees at the restaurant. Carilli announced to the employees that the restaurant's contract with the Union had terminated and the the restaurant was then "nonunion." He also stated that the employees could leave Antonino's to work in a Union restaurant if they desired but he wanted all employees to stay on. Carilli also answered some questions generally concerning the employees' future status with the Union. The insurance broker distributed a document comparing insurance benefits under the Crown Life program with those under the 1973–1978 collective bargaining agreement, announced that the employees were covered by the Crown Life program, effective August 6, and told the employees that the new plan provided better benefits than the previous plan.

On August 28, 1978, however, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge, alleging that Antonino's was refusing to bargain in good faith and that Antonino's was bound by the 1977–1982 extension to the collective bargaining agreement. The Board's regional director refused to issue a complaint on any aspect of the charge except the allegations concerning the unilateral implementation of the new health insurance plan, and rejected the Union's allegation that Antonino's was bound by the 1977–1982 agreement on the grounds that Antonino's had submitted a timely notification limiting the Association's bargaining authority on its behalf.

[5] 29 U.S.C. § 152(11).

The Regional Director subsequently dismissed the decertification petition, ruling that no question of representation could be raised at that time because a complaint had issued against Antonino's charging that the unilateral replacement of the insurance programs violated Section 8(a)(5).

Over the next three months, the parties exchanged a number of letters and phone calls in which they discussed negotiating for a new contract. On the basis of these communications, the administrative law judge found that Antonino's had refused to engage in collective bargaining with the Union.

In January of 1979, the regional director notified the parties that the dismissal of the decertification petition had been recinded. Shortly thereafter, however, the Union filed a second unfair labor practice charge and again demanded that Antonino's negotiate.

The regional director then notified the parties that the initial decertification petition was tainted by the participation of Antonino's supervisors in the signing of the petition, and that in light of the "numerous and serious" unfair labor practices allegedly committed by Antonino's just prior to the filing of the petition, no question of representation could be raised at that time. The Board affirmed.

The two unfair labor practice charges were consolidated and came to a hearing which resulted in the order which the Board now seeks to enforce.

DISCUSSION

I. Sufficiency of the Complaint and Applicability of the Statute of Limitations

Initially we must examine Antonino's contention that the complaint is insufficient and should be dismissed because it does not contain a clear and concise statement of the facts constituting the alleged unfair labor practices, as required by 29 C.F.R. § 102-12(d).

The record discloses that the Union filed two charges, on August 25, 1978 and January 15, 1979. Both charges alleged that Antonino's violated Section 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the Act, and both specifically allege that during the six months immediately prior to the filing of the charge, Antonino's refused to bargain in good faith with the Union. The charges each stated that "[b]y the above and other acts," Antonino's interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in their exercise of their Section 7 rights.[6]

Actions before the Board are not subject to the technical pleading requirements of a private lawsuit. North American Rockwell Corp. v. NLRB, 389 F.2d 866, 870 (10th Cir. 1968). The charge need not be technically precise so long as it generally informs the party charged of the nature of the alleged violations, and the general allegations in the charge may later be supplemented or amplified by more specific allegations which "relate back" to the date the charge was filed.

The consolidated complaint in his matter, filed on February 28, 1979, contained specific allegations as to each unfair labor practice found by the Board. Thus Antonino's cannot successfully contend that it had no notice of the charges against it before the hearing. Moreover, the Board may find an unfair labor practice when the issue has been fully and fairly litigated even though no specific charge was made in the original complaint. Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 721, 728 (9th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Olympic Medical Corp., 608 F.2d 762, 763 (9th Cir. 1979). Here, Antonino's claims that it was prejudiced because the General Counsel's witnesses had incomplete memories concerning a statement by Larry Carilli at the August 15, 1978 employee meeting to the effect that Antonino's was nonunion. The Board found that this statement violated Section 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5). The record discloses that the substantially similar testimony of three witnesses supported the finding that Larry Carilli made the statement in question. Antonino's had the opportunity to cross-examine each of these witnesses on this issue, and did in fact cross-examine employee Mary Ingles specifically about the disputed statement. Ingles' testimony was clear and was given particular weight by the administrative law judge (ALJ). We find that the issue was fully and fairly litigated at the hearing and that Antonino's suffered no prejudice as a result of the lack of specificity in the original charge.

[6] 29 U.S.C. § 157.

Antonino's speculates that because the original complaint contained no allegations concerning the interrogations of employees, solicition of withdrawls and attempts to discourage Union membership, these matters must have first been brought to the Board's attention when the second charge was filed on January 25, 1979. Thus, Antonino's argues, the charges are barred by the Section 10(b)[7] six-month statute of limitations.

We note that even if this argument were accepted, only the charges based on the interrogation of one of the employees would be barred. The other charges upon which the findings of unfair labor practices were based grew out of the August 15, 1978 meeting, which was only five months before the second charge was filed.

But even as the interrogation of the employee, the "by this and other acts" language of the original charge was sufficiently specific because it was amplified by the consolidated complaint, which related back to the date of that charge. North American Rockwell Corp. v. NLRB, 389 F.2d at 870. Because we find that the complaint is neither time barred nor fatally lacking in specificity, we turn to an examination of the Board's particular findings of unfair labor practices.

II. Questioning an Employee About Union Membership

The Board found that during June or July of 1978, Jean Carilli asked employee Karen Bywater, a member of the Union, how important the employees' medical insurance program was for Bywater and whether she would be a Union member if she worked in a restaurant which offered its employees medical and dental insurance benefits. The Board also found that in June of 1978, Larry Carilli asked Bywater if she would need to be "in the Union" if Antonino's had a better medical and dental insurance program for the employees.

Antonino's attacks Bywater's credibility and contends that the conversations with Larry and Jean Carilli never occurred. The ALJ specifically credited Bywater's testimony. We will not overturn credibility determinations unless a clear preponderance of the evidence shows they are incorrect. NLRB v. Inland Empire Meet Co., 611 F.2d 1235, 1238 (9th Cir. 1980). Here, Antonino's relies upon the fact that under cross-examination Bywater responded negatively when asked if she had had conversations with Larry and Jean Carilli "about the Union." The conversations in question focused primarily on insurance, not the Union, and thus Bywater's answers on cross-examination cannot fairly be understood as contradicting her testimony concerning the conversations with the Carillis. Antonino's has failed to show by a clear preponderance of the evidence that the ALJ's assessment of Bywater's credibility was incorrect.

Antonino's next contends that the questioniong of Bywater was entirely innocuous and was thus protected by Section 8(c)[8] of the Act which "defines and implements the First Amendment right of free speech in the context of labor relations." N.L.R.B. v. Marine World USA, 611 F.2d 1274, 1276 (9th Cir. 1980). Section 8(c) permits employers to express any views, arguments or opinions concerning Union representation which contain "no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit." 29 U.S.C. § 158(c). NLRB v. Marine World, USA, 611 F.2d at 1276.

In Clear Pine Mouldings, 632 F.2d at 725, this court stated:

> Interrogation of employees concerning union activities is not a per se violation of § 8(a)(1). NLRB v. Super Toys, Inc., 458 F.2d 180, 182 (9th Cir. 1972). The test to determine if a § 8(a)(1) violation has occurred is whether, under all the circumstances, the interrogation reasonably tends to restrain or interfere with the employees in the exercise of their protected § 7 rights. Penasquitos Village, Inc. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1074, 1080 (9th Cir. 1977).

In applying this test, we must determine whether the interrogations are " 'associated with express or implied threats or promises, or form part of an overall pattern tending to restrain or coerce employees with regard to their protected activities.' " NLRB v. Silver Spur Casino, 623 F.2d 571, 584-85 (9th Cir.), cert. petition pending, ——— U.S. ——— , 101 S.Ct. 1973, 68 L.Ed.2d ——— (1980), quoting

[8] 29 U.S.C. § 158(c)

Amalgamated Meat Cutters, etc., Local No. 364 v. NLRB, 435 F.2d 668, 669 (9th Cir. 1970).

The Board found that the language used by the Carillis in these conversations was reasonably calculated to give Bywater the impression that Antonino's was considering instituting its own superior medical insurance program if the employees would not support the Union. The pattern of subsequent unfair labor practices, discussed below, lend credence to the Board's interpretation. Those practices included unilateral implementation of a new insurance program, withdrawal of recognition from the Union, and encouraging employees to withdraw from the Union.

Although the surface innocuousness of the conversations here involved renders the question a close one, we agree with the Board's conclusion that viewed in their overall context, these conversations contained both promises of benefits for withdrawal of support for the Union and coercive implications that once the benefits were instituted, the employees were expected to either withdraw from the Union or find work elswhere.

These conversations thus did not enjoy the protection of Section 8(c) and ran afoul of Section 8(a)(1).

III. Suggestions that Employees Withdraw, Resign or Quit Paying Dues to the Union

The Board found that Antonino's, through Larry Carilli, solicited employees to either withdraw or resign from the Union, and additionally suggested to one employee that she quit paying her Union dues. Antonino's does not dispute that such acts, if committed, would violate Section 8(a)(1), see, e.g., NLRB v. Triumph Curing Center, 571 F.2d 462, 470–71 (9th Cir. 1978), but instead contends that the Board has mischaracterized the statements which were in reality innocent and helpful responses to employees' questions, and were, therefore, protected speech.

This court has recently noted that "if there are conflicting interpretations of the facts, and the one adopted by the Board is supported by substantial evidence, the Court may not substitute a different interpretation." NLRB v. Anchorage Times Publishing Co., 637 F.2d 1359, 1363 (9th Cir. 1981).

The Board found that at his August 15, 1978 meeting with the employees, Larry Carilli stated that the restaurant was non-union and that the employees could leave if they wanted to work in a union restaurant. In reaching this conclusion, the Board relied upon the testimony of employees Karen Bywater and Mary Ingles. Bywater testified that Larry Carilli, when asked whether the employees could maintain their Union membership while working in a nonunion restaurant, responded that the employees could withdraw from the Union. According to Ingles, Larry Carilli told the employees that "those of us who wanted to stay here, go ahead and take a withdrawal from the Union." Ingles also testified that a day or two after the August 15th meeting, she informed Larry Carilli that she had requested a "withdrawal card" from the Union, but her request had been denied. Larry Carilli responded that there were "other ways" that Ingles could go about withdrawing from the Union; for example, by resigning or ceasing to pay her dues, but that it was up to her to make her own decision.

The Board concluded that once Antnonino's announced its intent to operate without a union, it was entirely foreseeable that the employees would ask questions concerning their future status vis-v-vis the Union, and that the responses were designed to undermine the Union. This conclusion is buttressed by Antonino's admitted earlier decision to "get rid of the Union." We find that the Board's conclusion is supported by substantial evidence.

IV. Termination of Payments to Employee Trust Funds and Unilateral Implementation of New Insurance Plans

The Board found that Antonino's violated Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the Act by unilaterally terminating its payments to the labor-management health and pension trust funds, and by implementing new medical and dental insurance plans in place of the health trust fund plan.

Antonino's first defends its termination of payments to the labor-management trust funds on the grounds that continued payments would have violated Section 302(c)(5) of the Act.[9] Section

[9] Section 302 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 186, provides in relevant part: § 302(a) It shall be unlawful for any employer * * * to pay, lend, or deliver * * * any money or other thing of value—

302(c)(5) prohibits payments by employers to employee representatives unless those payments are made pursant to a specific written agreement covering the payments, and such payments are for the exclusive benefit of the employees and their families and dependents. Antonino's argues that the expiration of its collective bargaining agreement with the Union left it without the necessary written agreement, and that it, therefore, could not continue making the payments without incurring criminal liability under Section 302(c)(5).

It is clear from the collective bargaining agreement that the trust fund agreements remained in effect for the other members of the Association who became parties to the 1978–1982 extension to the collective bargaining agreement. There is no dispute that those documents were adequate written agreements under Section 302(c)(5) so long as Antonino's was subject to the collective bargaining agreement and the trust agreements are sufficient to satisfy the requirements of Section 302(c)(5). Peerless Roofing Co. v. NLRB, 641 F.2d 734 (9th Cir. 1981).[10] In that case we noted that the collective bargaining agreement survives its expiration date for purposes of marking the status quo as to wages and working conditions. The employer is required to maintain that status quo following the expiration of the collective bargaining agreement until the parties negotiate a new agreement or bargain in good faith to impasse. Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d at 729. In Peerless, we noted that "[i]f the employer's obligation to make trust fund payments were terminated by the expiration of the bargaining agreement, the union would never have an opportunity to bargain over those contributions," at 736, and concluded that such a result would be contrary to the national labor policy as embodied in the Act.

By finding that the expired collective bargaining agreement and the trust agreements here are sufficient to permit continued payments to the trust funds, we do not, as Antonino's contends, hinge criminal liability under Section 302(c)(5) upon the difficult determination of whether impasse has been reached. The collective bargaining and trust agreements here are sufficient to satisfy the requirements of Section 302(c)(5) and to permit continued payments to the trust funds, whether or not the parties have bargained to impasse.

Antonino's next argues that it was free to make unilateral changes in its medical, dental, and pension plans, and to withdraw recognition from the Union because the Union no longer enjoyed the majority support of Antonino's employees.

Voluntary recognition having been accorded the Union in 1972, there is a rebuttable presumption that the Union enjoys majority status. NLRB v. Tahoe Nugget, Inc., 584 F.2d 293, 297 (9th Cir. 1978) cert. denied, 442 U.S. 921, 99 S.Ct. 2847, 61 L.Ed.2d 290 (1979); Sahara-Tahoe Corp. v. NLRB, 581 F.2d 767, 769–70 (9th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 442 U.S. 917, 99 S.Ct 2837, 61 L.Ed.2d 284 (1979). The employer who seeks to withdraw recognition must rebut this presumption with a clear, cogent and convincing showing of either an actual loss of majority status or objective factors sufficient to support a reasonable good faith doubt of the Union's majority. NLRB v. Tahoe Nugget, Inc., 584 F.2d at 297.

Antonino's relies upon a petition signed by 16 of the employees, including Larry and Tom Carilli to establish the Union's loss of majority status. Antonino's, however, offered no independent evidence of the number of employees in the bargaining unit, but instead relies upon a statement in the decertification petition that there were 26. The General Counsel did not offer the decertification petition which was filled out by employee Washburn, into evidence for the purpose of establishing the truth of what it alleged concerning the number of employees in the bargaining unit, and Antonino's made no attempt to show that it was accurate. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that the evidence of loss of majority support was clear, cogent, and convincing.

Antonino's complains, however, that the ALJ prevented it from further litigating the issue of majority status by precluding it from litigating the question of whether the showing of interest petition was adequate to support the decertification petition. The adequacy of a showing of interest petition is an administrative matter which may not be litigated by the parties. See, NLRB v. J. I. Case Co., 201 F.2d 597, 600 (9th Cir. 1953).[11] The mere fact that Antonino's was properly prevented from litigating the adequacy of the showing of interest petition does not mean that it was precluded from litigating the majority status issue, even though certain evidence may have been relevant to both issues. The record reveals that Antonino's simply never offered any evidence as being relevant to the majority status issue, and thus supports the ALJ's statement that he did not prevent Antonino's from litigating that issue.

Further, even if Antonino's had introduced evidence indicating the number of employees in the bargaining unit, its contention that the Union lacked majority status would nonetheless be based upon a showing of interest petition which was not circulated until August 11, 1978. There is no evidence that the Union lacked majority status when Antonino's authorized its insurance broker to purchase a new insurance policy on July 25 which was to become operative on August 6, or when Antonino's ceased making payments to the trust funds on August 6.

Nor does the record support a finding of good faith doubt as to the Union's majority status. Good faith doubt must be evaluated as of the time the refusal to bargain occurs. NLRB v. Tahoe Nugget, Inc., 584 F.2d at 301 n.25. Antonino's has not shown that it had any grounds for doubting the Union's majority status at the time the unilateral changes were made.

Antonino's next contends, however, that it was not required to give the Union notice and an opportunity to negotiate about the changes in insurance plans, because to do so would have been futile. This argument is based upon both a July 6, 1978 letter from the Union to Antonino's which erroneously asserted that Antonino's was bound by the 1977–1982 extension to the collective bargaining agreement, and the Union's alleged failure to request negotiations on the insurance issue once it learned of the changes. The Board rejected this contention, noting that Antonino's had expressed its intention to "drop the Union" and institute new insurance programs before the Union expressed its erroneous belief that Antonino's was bound by the 1977–1982 collective bargaining agreement.

The Board found that Antonino's unilateral action was motivated by a desire to undermine the Union, and that Antonino's had never indicated to the Union that it intended to make the insurance policy changes. In addition, the Board found that Antonino's rejected an invitation to meet with the Union and discuss its position. It is clear from the record that Antonino's failure to accord the Union an opportunity to bargain was not motivated by the Union's position, and it is equally clear that the Union's position was not so intransigent as to relieve Antonino's of its obligation to extend an opportunity to negotiate before instituting unilateral changes in mandatory subjects of bargaining.

Finally, Antonino's contends that it had no duty to bargain concerning its unilateral termination of payments to the pension fund. Antonino's relies upon Seattle First National Bank v. NLRB, 444 F.2d 30, 32–33 (9th Cir. 1971) in which this court held that in order for a matter to be a mandatory subject of collective bargaining, it must materially or significantly affect the terms or conditions of employment.[12] That case involved a bank's termination of a little used free investment counseling service for its employees. This court found no duty to bargain about the termination of such services, noting that they were of value only to a small number of employees actively trading in securities and were not the type of services traditionally associated with terms and conditions of employment. Further, the termination of the free investment counseling services was part of an overall restructuring of rates which the bank charged its customers, and was, therefore, characterized as a management decision which affected the employees only indirectly.

The Union's pension plan here by contrast is not limited to a small number of employees, and is not the type of matter typically entrusted solely to management discretion. Pension plans are traditionally associated with terms and conditions of employment, and we find that Antonino's violated Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) by unilaterally terminating its payments to the Union's pension trust fund.

[12] It is undisputed that the medical and dental plans provided under the labor-management health trust fund are mandatory subjects of bargaining. See, e.g., Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 721, 729 (9th Cir. 1980).

V. Refusal to Meet and Bargain with the Union

The Board found that subsequent to the unfair labor practices previously discussed, Antonino's violated Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) by refusing to meet and bargain with the Union about a new collective bargaining agreement from November 20, 1978 to January 19, 1979. This finding, which is based upon a series of communications between Antonino's and the Union, is supported by substantial evidence.

Antonino's urges, however, that it was not required to meet and bargain because it had learned [13] that a decertification petition was pending during the period in question. The Board's decision in Telautograph Corp., 199 NLRB 892 (1972), relied upon by Antonino's, held that where a decertification petition has been filed and there is no evidence of previous unfair labor practices which may have caused a decline in Union support, the employer must discontinue bargaining with the Union until the question of representation has been settled by the Board. Antonino's contends that the Telautograph doctrine is applicable here because the Board found that the circulation and filing of the decertification petition were not caused by any actions of Antonino's.[14]

The Board, however, ruled that this defense was unavailable here because Antonino's had committed unfair labor practices designed to undermine the Union which precluded a fair decertification election.

We agree. The underlying issue is whether the employer had a reasonable good faith doubt as to the Union's majority status. "Reasonable doubt as to majority status must only be asserted in good faith and may not be raised in the context of an employer's activities aimed at causing disaffection from the Union." Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d at 730. The fact that the unfair labor practices here did not cause the circulation or filing of the petition is of little moment. No showing was made that a majority of the employees supported decertification before learning of Antonino's previous unfair labor practices and being exposed to Antonino's subsequent unfair labor practices. Because Antonino's by its actions precluded a fair determination of the majority status issue, it cannot now rely on the reasonable good faith doubt defense.

VI. The Bargaining Order

Antonino's maintains that the Board abused its discretion by issuing a bargaining order, because the unfair labor practices committed here were not so flagrant as to prevent a fair decertification election, and because a majority of the employees oppose representation by the Union. We disagree.

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 614, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1940, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), the court held that bargaining orders are not limited to cases involving outrageous and pervasive unfair labor practices, but may be imposed "in less extraordinary cases marked by less pervasive practices which nonetheless still have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election processes." If there is a showing that the Union once had a majority support, and the likelihood of erasing the effect of the unfair labor practices and obtaining a fair election by the use of traditional remedies is light, a bargaining order may be warranted. Because the Board possesses specialized knowledge and expertise, we must accord special respect to its estimates of the effects of the unfair labor practices on the election process, and to its choice of remedies. Id. at 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct. at 1939 n.32.

Here, in addition to giving clear indications to the employees that it intended to operate without a

[13] Antonino's learned of the existence of the decertification petition on August 12, 1978, after the unilateral exchange of insurance plans, but before the refusal to bargain from November 20, 1978 to January 19, 1979.

[14] Although Antonino's had committed unfair labor practices by withdrawing recognition from the Union, terminating payments to the Union trust funds, and instituting a new insurance plan on August 6, 1978, the employees were not aware of these actions until August 15, about three days after the decertification petition was circulated. The earlier interrogation of employee Bywater did not taint the petition because she did not sign it.

Union and suggesting that the employees either resign from the Union or seek work elsewhere, Antonino's implied that better medical and dental benefits would be available without the Union and actually implemented those benefits. The Board's determination that these acts precluded a fair decertification election is supported by substantial evidence.

Antonino's maintains, however, that a bargaining order is inappropriate here because it will impose a minority Union upon the employees. This contention is based upon a letter written three days after the hearing which expressed opposition to the Union and was purportedly signed by 13 of the 18 employees allegedly in the bargaining unit at that time. The Board denied a motion to reopen the proceedings to permit introduction of the letter.

We find no error in the Board's denial of the motion to reopen. The motion was not filed until more than three months after the letter was written and more than a month after the ALJ had rendered his decision. No excuse is offered for the delay. In addition, there is no allegation that the identity of the employees remaining in the bargaining unit or the identity of the supervisors had changed, and thus there is no evidence that the effects of the unfair labor practices had diminished by the time the letter was written. See NLRB v. Peninsula Ass'n for Retarded Children and Adults, 627 F.2d 202 (9th Cir. 1980). Therefore, there is nothing to suggest that an untainted majority of the employees ever expressed opposition to the Union.

This case is distinguishable from Daisy's Originals, Inc. v. NLRB, 468 F.2d 493 (5th Cir. 1972), relied upon by Antonino's, which held that a bargaining order was not warranted where the unfair labor practices committed were merely technical violations of the Act which did not dissipate the Union's majority and did not prevent a fair decertification election. Here, the unfair labor practices were more numerous and more serious, and prevented the possibility of a free expression of the employees' choice in a fair decertification election.

VII. The Repayment Order

The Board's order requires Antonino's to repay all the payments to the trust funds which have been withheld since August 6, 1978, and to continue such payments until Antonino's negotiates in good faith to a new contract or impasse, unless the Union fails to make a written request within 60 days of the order that Antonino's replace the Crown Life plan with the previous program.

Antonino's complains that because it provided the employees with better medical and dental insurance than was provided under the Union's plan, the repayment order is punitive and is, therefore, an impermissible attempt to effectuate policies other than those of the Act. See Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct. 398, 405, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964).

We find nothing punitive in this order. The Board's order merely requires that Antonino's repay what it has unlawfully withheld. It was Antonino's which unlawfully chose to incur the additional expense of a private insurance program in its attempt to undermine the Union, and it cannot now complain that it incurred a loss in so doing.

The Board's order is enforced.

ENFORCED.

NLRB v. Chester Valley, Inc.

652 F.2d 263 (2d Cir.), June 22, 1981—251 NLRB 1455

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before FEINBERG, Chief Judge, and LUMBARD and VAN GRAAFEILAND, Circuit Judges

266

LUMBARD, Circuit Judge: Before us are two applications for enforcement of orders of the National Labor Relations Board. The order in 80-4236 is based upon alleged unfair labor practices committed in the course of a representational election campaign at Chester Valley, Inc., and in No. 80-4234, upon an unfair labor practice allegedly committed by Chester Valley while proceedings on the initial matter were pending before the Board. We consider each application in turn.

No. 80-4236:

In a Board-ordered election, Chester Valley's employees rejected representation by Local 445 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America ("the Union"). Following the vote, the Union charged that Chester Valley had committed a number of unfair labor practices during the election campaign. The Administrative Law Judge, after conducting hearings, sustained most of the unfair labor practice charges and ordered Chester Valley to bargain with the Union. The Board adopted the ALJ's findings and recommended order, and it now applies for enforcement. Because we find that there was insufficient proof of one of the unfair labor practice charges and because we believe that reversal on that charge precludes enforcement of a bargaining order, we grant enforcement in part and deny enforcement in part.

I.

Chester Valley is a New York corporation engaged in the sale of fuel oil, gasoline, automotive supplies and automotive and oil burner services. Its main facility is in Chester, New York, with other facilities at Vails Gate and Monroe, New York. In the fall of 1978, Mike Monte began discussing with fellow employees the possibility of union representation at Chester Valley. Monte also spoke with the Union. After obtaining signed authorization cards from a majority of employees, the Union filed, on November 1, 1978, a petition for a Board-supervised representation election in a unit consisting of employees at the Vails Gate and Monroe facilities. On November 2, the Union requested recognition and bargaining in a unit of employees at the Chester and Vails Gate facilities.[1] The Company refused to bargain. The election, which resulted in an 18-14 vote against the Union, was held on January 16, 1979.

We summarize the ALJ's findings of fact relating to the unfair labor practices during the election campaign. Gary Jones, who was the Company's bookkeeper and held the title of "Controller," in November of 1978 asked a group of employees at Chester what it would take for them to forget about the Union.[2] Jones was told that things had gone too far for "a simple raise or something like that." Shortly before the election, Jones made a similar request of employee Monte alone. Monte replied that he wanted everything the Union had gotten in other contracts plus a guaranteed job. Before the election Jones called employee Zaccagnino into his office, disparaged the Union's pension plan and stated that he could work out a more advantageous "deal" where Zaccagnino could put in the same forty cents per hour as would go into the Union pension plan into a Company profit sharing plan. Monte subsequently overheard Jones tell Zaccagnino to think seriously about Jones's proposal and that Zaccagnino would wind up "way ahead."

Also during the campaign, the manager of the Monroe facility, Francis Walters, discussed on many occasions the pros and cons of unionization with the Monroe employees and with employees Monte and Kennybrook, both of whom made frequent deliveries to the Monroe facility. During one such discussion, Walters stated to a group of employees that if the Union won the election, the resulting expenses would force him to cut costs and one method would be to turn the Monroe gasoline facility into a self-service station. In another discussion, Walters stated that if the Union won, company President Krieger would not continue to retain part-time employees. (Many of the Monroe employees worked part-time). Walters also told Monte that unionization would not be good for the Monroe employees, that if he had to, he would turn the facility into a self-service one, that the Company had been very accommodating in granting flexible work hours to the Monroe part-timers, many of whom were high school students, and that, the Union might require physical examinations which would pose a problem for full-time Monroe employee Strobl who had eye trouble. Walters made similar statements about the possibility of going to a self-service operation on other occasions.

On December 22, 1978, Company President Krieger wrote a letter to all employees stating that if the Union "gets in," wages and benefits would be subject to negotiation and could "go up or down." Krieger reminded employees of the Company's flexibility in scheduling work hours, and of other benefits such as discounts on gasoline and repair work, uniforms, and liberal breaktimes. He stated that all the benefits would become negotiable if the Union "gets in."

[1] Although on November 13, 1978 the Union amended its election petition to include employees at all three facilities, the Union never requested bargaining in the unit.

[2] Jones had previously made a similar request of employee Vogt, but this was found by the ALJ to have occurred prior to the filing of the representation petition.

Approximately one week before the election, Krieger made a speech to all of the employees. He stated that he was hurt that the employees had gone to the Union and that he had always had an "open door" policy. He said that whatever the employees could get from the Union, they could get from him. Krieger also stated that the Union might require employees to take physical examinations and he knew that some employees might have difficulty passing.

Finally, the ALJ found that the Company had granted a wage increase in December of 1978, retroactive to November 25. The Company had previously granted wage increases in Noveber of 1976 and 1977. In a letter to employees announcing the raises, Krieger stated that in past years he had given wage increases in the fall, but this year he had been uncertain, because of the election petition, whether he could grant raises. He stated that, despite advice of counsel that there was some legal risk in granting such increases, he would do so anyway. For the majority of employees, the raise was a flat 7% increase, although others were granted the legally mandated increase in the minimum wage, and one employee—on a commission salary—received no raise.

Based upon these findings, the ALJ held that the Company had violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976). First the ALJ held that Controller Jones's statements to employees, constituted promises of benefits to induce abandoment of the Union. The ALJ rejected the Company's argument that it was not answerable for Jones's statements. Jones was the Company "Controller," he supervised office personnel, and was believed by employees to have the authority to advise them as to the Company's wage policies.

Second, the ALJ held that the Company also violated section 8(a)(1) by the veiled threats made by both Walters and Krieger. These threats included 1) references by both Walters and Krieger to physical examination requirements, 2) statements by Walters that if the Union came in, there might be changes in the practice of accommodating part-time employees' work hours, 3) Krieger's statements in his December 22 letter mentioning that benefits such as flexible work hours might be bargained away and that the Union might "force" him to discontinue other benefits such as gasoline discounts and liberal breaktimes, and 4) Walters's statements that if unionization occurred, the Monroe facility might become self-service, and that the Company might not be able to afford part-time employees. The ALJ rejected the Company's argument that in making many of these statements Krieger or Walters attributed the possible changes in working conditions to conduct by the Union. The ALJ noted that the Company had the power unilaterally to effect these changes, and that the speakers did not base their predictions on objective facts demonstrating that the changes in conditions would be beyond the Company's control. Thus the ALJ held that the statements could reasonably be said to have had a tendency to interfere with the free exercise of employee rights.[3]

Third, the ALJ found a violation of section 8(a)(1) based upon Krieger's statements in his speech that the Company had an "open door" policy, that if employees came to them in the future he would deal with their problems, and that they could get from him whatever the Union could obtain. The ALJ held that these statements constituted a solicitation of grievances and a promise to remedy them in order to discourage Union representation. The ALJ rejected, as lacking support, the Company's defense that Krieger was merely clarifying a previously established management policy of welcoming and remedying employee grievances.

As to the wage increase, the ALJ held that there was noting illegal in either the timing or retroactivity of the benefits. The raises were in accord with the Company's practice of granting annual wage increases in November and the lateness of the increase and accompanying retroactivity were explained by the Company's good faith doubts concerning the legality of the increases. Action was taken within a reasonable time after receiving competent advice from counsel.

At the close of the hearing, however, the General Counsel had moved to amend the complaint against the Company to include the charge that the wage increases in 1978 were disproportionately large. In its closing statement, having decided to submit no further evidence on the issue, Company counsel argued that the General Counsel had failed to offer sufficient evidence that the wage increase was disproportionately large.

[3] The ALJ found that on one occasion Walters had directly tied the advent of a self-service operation to increased expenses brought on by unionization, and therefore there was no violation of section 8(a)(1) at that time.

In her opinion, the ALJ granted the General Counsel's motion to amend, and concluded that indeed the wage increase was significantly larger than in prior years. Evidence as to three employees led the ALJ to find that the 1978 7% increase was from 42% to 112% higher than the 1977 increases and from 60% to 100% higher than the 1976 increases. The ALJ stated that, although there was no other evidence of the size of 1976 or 1977 increases, the burden was on the Company to prove that the 1978 increases were "based on the size of the increases were in previous years." Noting that the Company had failed to introduce records as to the other 1976 and 1977 increases, the ALJ drew the inference that November 1978 raises were significantly higher than earlier raises. She rejected the Company's arguments that the General Counsel bore the burden on this point and had obtained Company records by a subpoena, that the Consumer Price Index had increased at a substantially greater rate in 1978 than 1976 or 1977, and that one of the three employees for whom there was evidence had also been granted a raise in May of 1976 of approximately 6.10% and thus had raises of approximately 13.4% over 1976 and 1977.

No violation of section 8(a)(5), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5) (1976) was found because the Union had never requested bargaining in the proper unit of employees in all three facililties.

Based upon the unfair labor practices she had found, the ALJ held that a bargaining order was the appropriate remedy.[4] The ALJ found that the unfair labor practices were "extensive" in that all employees heard Krieger's speech and received his letter and many employees heard the offending statements by Jones and Walters. She noted that the higher wage increases would have a "lingering effect" on those who remained at the Company because the raises would be included in all total paychecks. She thought it likely that these employees would pass along the story of the pre-election increases to any new employees. Therefore, the ALJ reasoned that use of cease-and-desist orders and posting of notices would not be likely to erase the effects of the Company's unfair labor practices and, on balance, a bargaining order would better express the employees' preferences. The Company's obligation to bargain was set retroactively at November 1, 1978, the approximate date on which the unfair labor practices began.

A three-member panel of the Board affirmed the ALJ's rulings, findings and conclusions, and adopted the recommended bargaining order. One member dissented on the issue of wage increases. He took the position that the General Counsel had failed to present sufficient evidence of a disparity between the size of the 1978 increase and those of prior years.

II.

The Company's arguments to set aside the unfair labor practices other than those concerning the wage increase do not require detailed treatment. Regarding the violations based upon statements made by Controller Jones, the Company argues that Jones was not a supervisor nor was he acting as an agent of the Company. As the ALJ found, however, Jones was treated as a member of the management, participated in discussions with Company counsel regarding the organizing campaign, kept the Company records, supervised the office staff and was consulted by employees on payroll matters. Thus there was ample reason to conclude that employees would believe that Jones was speaking as a representative of the employer. The Company's other objections to the unfair labor practice finding based upon Jones's statements challenge the sufficiency of the evidence and the credibility findings of the ALJ, particularly the ALJ's crediting of Zaccagnino's version of his meeting with Jones and her discrediting of Jones's version. We are not persuaded and note in particular our reluctance to interfere with the credibility judgments of an ALJ. See, e.g., NLRB v. Columbia University, 541 F.2d 922, 928 (2d Cir. 1976), quoting NLRB v. Dinion Coil Co., 201 F.2d 484, 490 (2d Cir. 1952).

As for the implicit threats found by the ALJ in statements made by Walters, the Company argues that only once did Walters mention the possibility of conversion to self-service and on that occasion he clearly attributed the possibility to cost increases imposed if the Union won and achieved the benefits it was promising. It also argues that, in any event, Walters was always understood in discussing unionization to be referring to cost increases imposed by the Union's promised benefits. In analyzing Walters' statements regarding conversion to self-service, flexibility of work hours and retention of part-time workers, the ALJ correctly applied the standards set out in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). As stated in Gissel, and employer is free to tell only "what he reasonably believes will be likely economic consequences of unionization that are outside of his control." Id. at 619, 89 S.Ct. at 1942 quoting NLRB v. River Togs, Inc., 382 F.2d 198, 202 (2d Cir. 1967). He must base such predictions on "objective fact." Id. at 619, 89 S.Ct. at 1942. He may not imply that action unfavorable to the employees will be taken "solely on his own initiative for reasons unrelated to economic necessities and known only to him." Id. at 619, 89 S.Ct. at 1942.

[4] The ALJ found that all of the Union authorization cards would be counted as valid despite objections by the Company that Union officials and Company employees misrepresented to signers the significance of the cards. 270

The record supports the ALJ's conclusions that Walters's statements fell outside the permissible bounds established in Gissel. There was testimony as to more than one reference to self-service conversion and there was also testimony as to Walters's failure in most instances to attribute possible unfavorable changes to any costs which would result from union representation. Under the circumstances, the ALJ was justified in finding that the statements constituted veiled threats of reprisal for pro-Union votes. See, e. g., El Rancho Mkt., 235 NLRB 468 (1978), enf'd, 104 LRRM 2612 (9th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Rollins Telecasting, Inc., 494 F.2d 80, 84–85 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 964, 95 S.Ct. 224, 42 L.Ed.2d 178 (1974); Marathon LeTourneau Co., 208 NLRB 213 (1974).

Similarly, there was sufficient evidence to support the ALJ's conclusion that Krieger and Walters violated section 8(a)(1) in stating that physical examinations might result from unionization. There was proof that physical exams were only required in Union contracts at the request of the employer. The ALJ could reasonably conclude then that such references were veiled threats that examinations might be required by the employer if the Union won the election. Krieger's other statements, both in his speech and his December 22 letter, regarding flexible work hours and other company benefits also support a finding that he implicitly threatened employees with imposing harsher conditions should the Union achieve recognition. As the ALJ noted, Krieger's statement that the Union might "force" him to discontinue these "favors" did not fairly rest on any possibility that the Union would bargain away these benefits. In general, there was sufficient evidence for the ALJ to conclude that Walters's and Krieger's statements were not accompanied by any causal links to specific Union demands and therefore constituted coercive threats rather than honest forecasts. See, e. g., NLRB v. Mangurian's, Inc., 566 F.2d 463, 466 (5th Cir. 1978).

We also believe there was sufficient evidence to uphold the ALJ's finding that statements made in Krieger's speech constituted a solicitation of grievances and a promise to remedy those grievances. The Company's only defense on this point was that Krieger was merely stating and reconfirming a long-standing "open door" policy, but there was sufficient evidence for the ALJ to conclude that no such prior practice existed. Such a change in policy toward grievances and corrective action justifies a finding of a section 8(a)(1) violation. See, e. g., Jefferson National Bank, 240 NLRB 1057 (1979); Carbonneau Industries, 228 NLRB 597 (1977); Reliance Electric Co., 191 NLRB 44 (1971).

On the issue of wage increases, the Company first attacks the propriety of the ALJ's granting of the General Counsel's request to amend the complaint to include the charge that the raises were disproportionately large. We think it was proper for the ALJ to allow the amendment, since the Company was given a full and fair opportunity to rebut the charge. Company counsel was asked whether, if amendment was granted, the Company wished to submit any additional evidence, and counsel replied in the negative. Moreover, from a reading of counsel's concluding argument it is clear that the Company took the position that no further proof on this issue was necessary since the General Counsel had failed to establish a prima facie case.

On the merits, however, we agree with the Company's position, and with the dissenting member of the Board, that the General Counsel failed to sustain his charge that the 1978 wage increases were unusually large. When wage increases are granted during the course of an election campaign, the burden is on the employer to overcome the presumption that benefits were intended to influence the employees to vote against the Union. NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 84 S.Ct. 457, 11 L.Ed.2d 435 (1964); Faith Garment Co. v.

NLRB, 630 F.2d 630, 632 (8th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666, 675 (1st Cir. 1979). Here, the Company sustained its burden by demonstrating that the 1978 wage increase was in accord with its established policy of announcing raises in the fall, that the increases were withheld slightly beyond the usual time only because of a good faith concern as to the legality of the increases, and that, once competent advice was given by counsel, the Company acted quickly to give increases retroactive to the time the annual increases would usually have been given.

The issue of the size of the wage increases is distinct. NLRB decisions make clear that where the size of increases is in question, the burden is on the General Counsel to demonstrate that the increases were abnormally large and were timed to influence employees' organizational decisions. Once this is shown, the General Counsel has put forth a prima facie case of interference with employee rights, and the burden shifts to the employer to establish that the increases were consistent in size with those granted in prior years or that the increases were timed so as not to interfere with employee rights. See, e. g., Colonial Haven Nursing Home, Inc., 218 NLRB 1007 (1975); The Savings Bank Co., 207 NLRB 269 (1973); Summitville Tiles, Inc., 190 NLRB 640, 640 n.1 (1971); see also Alco Venetian Blind Co., Inc., 253 NLRB No. 161 at n.2 (1980); San Lorenzo Lumber Co., 238 NLRB 1421 (1978). Here, the only evidence introduced by the General Counsel was the testimony of employee Vogt that in the two prior Novembers he received 2% increases, but in 1978, he received a 7% increase. As the ALJ found, however, Vogt received increases of approximately 3.5%. Moreover in May of 1976 he had received an increase of over 6%. Thus, the ALJ found that in the two years prior to 1978 Vogt had received increases totalling 13.4%.

The only other evidence in the record supporting the charge was that offered by two of the Company's witnesses. Employee Schaffer received 1976 and 1977 increases of approximately 4% and 5% respectively; employee Williams received increases in each of the prior years of slightly over 4%. They both received 1978 increases of 7%. This evidence, as to only three employees, is clearly insufficient. We also take note that the Consumer Price Index rose at a substantially greater rate in 1978 than in the two preceding years.

The ALJ also erred in buttressing the meager evidence supporting the General Counsel's charge by drawing an "adverse inference" from the Company's failure to produce payroll records. As one court has remarked, the rule that an unfavorable inference shall be drawn against a party which fails to introduce evidence known to be in its control will not apply where a party has good reason to believe that its opponent has failed to meet its burden of proof. In such a situation, there is a good faith belief that there is no need to offer further evidence, and therefore no inference can properly be drawn from nonproduction. International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW) v. NLRB, 459 F.2d 1329, 1338 (D.C.Cir.1972), citing NLRB v. A.P.W. Products Co., 316 F.2d 899, 903 (2d Cir. 1963). We also note that the Company's records had been subpoenaed by the General Counsel who, as we have pointed out, bore the burden on this issue.

Finally, the Board's decision on this issue is inconsistent with its recent decision in Alco Venetian Blind Co., supra. In that case, the Board agreed with the ALJ that the General Counsel had failed to establish that wage increases varied unlawfully from those granted in previous years, and the proof supporting the General Counsel was stronger than that in this case. There, although the wages granted to each employee each year varied in size, the company's records revealed that the raises in the year in question increased from the year before on average from approximately 6.5% to 12.5%. With a few exceptions, the increases for the preceding year were in the range of 5% to 5.7%, while for the year in question, they generally ranged from 11% to 12.9%. The ALJ, however, took note of the increasing rate of inflation and found it responsible for the larger raises. The ALJ stated that in terms of real wages employees had received very small increases.

For these reasons, the holding that the Company violated section 8(a)(1) by granting unusually large increases cannot stand. It follows that the appropriateness of the bargaining order remedy is called into question. While we might remand for reconsideration of the remedy in light of our unfair labor practice holding, we believe that the remaining unfair labor practice findings are insufficient as a matter of law to support a bargaining order remedy. See, e.g., Peerless of America, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 484 F.2d 1108 (7th Cir. 1973). In NLRB v. Jamaica Towing, Inc., 632 F.2d 298 (2d Cir. 1980), this Circuit most recently ruled on the appropriateness of ordering recognition and bargaining as a remedy for unfair labor practices committed by an employer during the course of an election campaign. As we noted in that opinion, id. at 212, the traditional and preferred remedy in such cases is to vacate the original election, enjoin future unfair practices, require posting of notices disavowing interference, direct that union representatives be given reasonable access to the employees, and finally order a new Board-supervised election. The issuance of a bargaining order is warranted only where these remedies are found inadequate and where "it may reasonably be concluded that the employees will be unable to exercise a free choice in a Board-supervised rerun election." Id.[5]

The Supreme Court in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., supra, held that bargaining orders would be an appropriate remedy either in the "exceptional" cases where unfair labor practices were "pervasive" or "outrageous" or in those "less extraordinary cases marked by less pervasive practices" where the Board found that the severe impact of the unfair practices on employee free choice and the likelihood of their recurrence precluded the possibility of a fair rerun election. In Jamaica Towing, supra, 632 F.2d at 212–13, we noted that, in applying Gissel, certain labor violations, called "hallmark" violations, have generally been considered by courts and the Board as sufficient to support issuance of bargaining orders unless mitigating factors existed. Such violations include closing of a plant or threats of closure or loss of employment, granting of benefits to employees, or reassignment, demotion or discharge of union adherents. In contrast to these violations are practices such as interrogation of employees, promises of benefits, expressions of anti-union resolve, or threats of decreased benefits, which will not support a bargaining order absent serious and long-lasting untoward effects on employees.

Having overturned the ALJ's finding of a hallmark violation—the granting of unusually large wage increases—we believe the remaining practices are insufficient to justify a bargaining order. While the remaining unfair practices are numerous, they fall into the less coercive category.[6] Moreover, the unfair practices almost all consisted of implied rather than overt threats or promises, and thus were less likely to have a strong and lasting effect. Indeed, the only practice found specifically by the ALJ as certain to have lingering consequences concerned the amount of the wage increases, the practice we have found lacking support in the record. Moreover, the impressive amount of testimony by [5] We note once again the continuing concern both in this Circuit, see, e.g., Coating Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 648 F.2d 108 (2d Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Jamaica Towing, Inc., supra, and elsewhere, see, e.g., Red Oaks Nursing Home, Inc. v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 503 (7th Cir. 1980), over the frequency with which the Board appears to be issuing bargaining orders rather than rerun elections where employers commit unfair labor practices in the course of election campaigns. In this case, we asked counsel for the Board to inform us of the number of cases in which the Board was granting bargaining orders rather than ordering new elections. We were informed that in the past three years, in the overwhelming majority of cases in which bargaining orders were requested by the General Counsel, they were granted by the Board, and only in a small minority of those cases were elections ordered. The figures submitted, however, are not particularly informative because they exclude cases where the General Counsel has not sought a bargaining order and include cases where no election was ever held. In any event, we reiterate our concern that where the unfair labor practices are neither so pervasive as clearly to call for a bargaining order, nor so minimal as to call for a new election, the Board seems to exercise its discretion in favor of a bargaining order, despite repeated statements by this and other courts that rerun elections remain in the "preferred" or "superior" remedy under the NLRA.

[6] It is arguable that Walters's statements regarding the possible conversion of the Monroe facility to self-service and the discharge of part-time employees, which statements threatened a loss or lessening of employment for some Monroe employees might constitute a "hallmark" violation sufficient to support a bargaining order. The statements would have concerned only a small number of employees in the bargaining unit and fall far short of the threats of wholesale plant closures which have been found sufficient to support bargaining orders in other cases.

We also do not believe that the fact that the employer, as found in the second Board proceeding also now before us for enforcement, again solicited grievances demonstrates a significant likelihood of recurrence of unfair labor practices. It is quite understandable that a year after the election, with the status of employee representation still in limbo, the employer would try to discuss labor problems with employees. As soon as the General Counsel intervened, the Company acted quickly to rectify its error. This is not sufficient reason to believe that the Company is likely to recommit serious unfair labor practices during a second election campaign.

employees who did not even recall the statements which were found to constitute unfair labor practices suggests that the effects of those practices would be minimal. Finally, we note that there has been a good deal of turnover in the bargaining unit: the ALJ noted that only 21 of the original 32 employees remained at the Company at the time of the hearings, and according to the Company, only 13 of the 32 remained at the time of the Board's bargaining order. Consequently, we conclude that the record fails to show any lingering inhibitory effects or likely recurrence of the unfair labor practices. See, e.g., Jamaica Towing, supra; Grandee Beer Distributors v. NLRB, 630 F.2d 928 (2d Cir. 1980). We therefore deny enforcement of that part of the Board's order requiring recognition and bargaining upon request.

Enforcement of the Board's order in No. 80–4236 is granted in part and denied in part.

No. 80–4234:

In a separate matter also on appeal, No. 80–4234, the Board found that on January 19, 1980, while the earlier unfair labor practice proceeding was still before the ALJ, the Company sent a letter to all employees stating that a meeting would be held to discuss "problems" at Chester Valley, and to see if labor and management could "work together on rectifying these problems" possibly through formation of a "joint employer/employee committee." On the same day it issued its opinion approving the ALJ's resolution of the earlier unfair labor practice proceeding, the Board held that the Company's letter violated (1) sections 8(a)(5) and 8(a)(1) of the NLRA since it constituted direct dealing with employees during a time when the employer had an obligation to bargain with the Union, and (2) section 8(a)(1) of the NLRA since it constituted an unlawful solicitation of grievances. The first violation was premised upon the ALJ's holding in the earlier matter, approved by the Board, that the Company's bargaining obligation commenced on November 1, 1978, the time its unfair labor practices began. Because we have held that no bargaining obligation could be imposed by the Board, there could have been no violation of section 8(a)(5) by direct dealing.

The second Board holding, that of a violation of section 8(a)(1) alone, however, is affirmed, since the letter quite plainly included both a solicitation of grievances and a promise to remedy those grievances. The Company's only defense is that it has independently corrected its error by cancelling the meeting and sending letters to employees informing them of their rights under the NLRA. This is of little avail since the Board is still entitled to enforcement of its orders despite corrective actions taken by offending parties. See, e.g., William J. Burns Detective Agency, Inc. v. NLRB, 441 F.2d 911, 914 (2d Cir. 1971), aff'd on other grounds, 406 U.S. 272, 92 S.Ct. 1571, 32 L.Ed. 2d 61 (1972).

Because of our holding as to the impermissibility of a bargaining order and the vacating of the Board's holding as to a violation of section 8(a)(5), a revised order is necessary, and we therefore deny enforcement and remand to the Board. We point out that since the Board's order in the first matter will include traditional remedies for an 8(a)(1) violation caused by improper solicitation of grievances, the remedial order in that matter might encompass all the relief needed to remedy the more recent violation of section 8(a)(1). Thus, a separate order may be unnecessary.

resentative of its employees over its decision to close a part of its business? In this case, the National Labor Relations Board (Board) imposed such a duty on petitioner with respect to its decision to terminate a contract with a customer, and the United States Court of Appeals, although differing over the appropriate rationale, enforced its order.

I

Petitioner, First National Maintenance Corporation (FNM), is a New York corporation engaged in the business of providing housekeeping cleaning, maintenance, and related services for commercial customers in the New York City area. It supplies each of its customers, at the customer's premises, contracted-for labor force and supervision in return for reimbursement of its labor costs (gross salaries, FICA and FUTA taxes, and insurance) and payment of a set fee. It contracts for and hires personnel separately for each customer, and it does not transfer employees between locations.[1]

During the spring of 1977, petitioner was performing maintenance work for the Greenpark Care Center, a nursing home in Brooklyn. Its written agreement dated April 28, 1976, with Greenpark specified that Greenpark "shall furnish all tools, equipment [sic], materials, and supplies," and would pay petitioner weekly "the sum of five hundred dollars plus the gross weekly payroll and fringe benefits." App. in No. 79–4167 (CA2). pp. 43, 44. Its weekly fee, however, had been reduced to $250 effective November 1, 1976. Id., at 46. The contract prohibited Greenpark from hiring any of petitioner's employees during the term of the contract and for 90 days therafter. Id., at 44. Petitioner employed approximately 35 workers in its Greenpark operation.

Petitioner's business relationship with Greenpark, seemingly, was not very remunerative or smooth. In March 1977, Greenpark gave petitioner the 30 days' written notice of cancellation specified by the contract, because of "lack of efficiency." Id., at 52. This cancellation did not become effective, for FNM's work continued after the expiration of that 30-day period. Petitioner, however, became aware that it was losing money at Greenpark. On June 30, by telephone, it asked that its weekly fee be restored at the $500 figure and, on July 6, it informed Greenpark in writing that it would discontinue its operations there on August 1 unless the increase were granted.[2] Id., at 47. By telegram on July 25, petitioner gave final notice of termination. Id., at 48.

While FNM was experiencing these difficulties, District 1199, National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, AFL–CIO (union), was conducting an organization campaign among petitioner's Greenpark employees. On March 31, 1977, at a Board-conducted election, a majority of the employees selected the union as their bargaining agent.[3] On July 12, the union's vice president, Edward Wecker, wrote petitioner, notifying it of the certification and of the union's right to bargain, and stating: "We look forward to meeting with you or your representative for that purpose. Please advise when it will be convenient." Id., at 49. Petitioner neither responded nor sought to consult with the union.

On July 28, petitioner notified its Greenpark employees that they would be discharged three days later. Wecker immediately telephoned petitioner's secretary-treasurer, Leonard Marsh, to request a delay for the purpose of bargaining. Marsh refused the offer to bargain and told Wecker that the termination of the Greenpark operation was purely a matter of money, and final, and that the 30 days' notice provision of the Greenpark contract made staying on beyond August 1 prohibitively expensive. Id., at

---

[1] The record does not show the precise dimension of petitioner's business. See 242 N.L.R.B. 462, 464 (1979). One of the owners testified that petitioner at that time had "between two and four" other nursing homes as customers. Ibid. The Administrative Law Judge hypothesized, however: "This is a large Company. For all I know, the 35 men at this particular home were only a small part of its total business in the New York area." Id. at 465.

[2] The record does not disclose how the contract's 30-day written notice provision was satisfied. In any event, the parties make no point of any shortage in the notice.

[3] The union was certified on May 11, 1977. App. in No. 79–4167 (CA2), p. 50.

79–81, 83, 85–86, 94. Wecker discussed the matter with Greenpark's management that same day, but was unable to obtain a waiver of the notice provision. Id., at 91–93, 98–99. Greenpark also was unwilling itself to hire the FNM employees because of the contract's 90-day limitation on hiring. Id., at 100–101, 106–107. With nothing but perfunctory further discussion, petitioner on July 31 discontinued its Greenpark operation and discharged the employees. Id., at 110–116.

The union filed an unfair labor practice charge against petitioner, alleging violations of the Act's §§ 8(a)(1) and (5). After a hearing held upon the Regional Director's complaint, the Administrative Law Judge made findings in the union's favor. Relying on Ozark Trailers, Inc., 161 N.L.R.B. 561 (1966), he ruled that petitioner had failed to satisfy its duty to bargain concerning both the decision to terminate the Greenpark contract and the effect of that change upon the unit employees.[4] The judge reasoned:

> "That the discharge of a man is a change in his conditions of employment hardly needs comment. In these obvious facts, the law is clear. When an employer's work complement is represented by a union and he wishes to alter the hiring arrangements, be his reason lack of money or a mere desire to become richer, the law is no less clear that he must first talk to the union about it * * *. If Wecker had been given an opportunity to talk, something might have been worked out to transfer these people to other parts of [petitioner's] business * * *. Entirely apart from whether open discussion between the parties—with the Union speaking on behalf of the employees as was its right—might have persuaded [petitioner] to find a way of continuing this part of its operations, there was always the possibility that Marsh might have persuaded Greenpark to use these same employees to continue doing its maintenance work, either as direct employees or as later hires by a replacement contractor." 242 N.L.R.B. 462, 465 (1979).[5]

The Administrative Law Judge recommended an order requiring petitioner to bargain in good faith with the union about its decision to terminate its Greenpark service operation and its consequent discharge of the employees, as well as the effects of the termination. He recommended also, that petitioner be ordered to pay the discharged employees backpay from the date of discharge until the parties bargained to agreement, or the bargaining reached an impasse, or the union failed timely to request bargaining, or the union failed to bargain in good faith.

The National Labor Relations Board adopted the Administrative Law Judge's findings without further analysis, and additionally required petitioner, if it agreed to resume its Greenpark operations, to offer the terminated employees reinstatement to their former jobs or substantial equivalents; conversely, if agreement was not reached, petitioner was ordered to offer the employees equivalent positions, to be made available by discharge of subsequently hired employees, if necessary, at its other operations. Id., at 463.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, with one judge dissenting in part, enforced the Board's order, although it adopted an analysis different from that espoused by the Board. 672 F.2d 596 (1980).[6] The Court of Appeals reasoned that no per se rule could be formulated to govern an employer's decision to close part of its business. Rather, the court said, § 8 (d) creates a presumption in favor of mandatory bargaining over such a decision, a presumption that is rebuttable "by showing that the purposes of the statute would not be furthered by imposition of a duty to bargain," for example, by demonstrating that "bargaining over the decision would be futile," or that the decision was due to "emergency financial circumstances," or that the "custom of the industry, shown by the absence of such an obligation from typical collective bargaining agreements, is not to bargain over such decisions." Id. at 601–602.

[4] The Administrative Law Judge rejected petitioner's contention that it had satisfied, by that single phone call to Wecker, its duty to bargain about the termination.

[5] The judge further found that petitioner's "regular and usual" method of operation involved "taking on, finishing, or discontinuing this or that particular job," 242 N.L.R.B., at 466, and that "[t]here was no capital involved when it decided to terminate the Greenpark job. The closing of this one spot in no sense altered the nature of its business, nor did it substantially affect its total size." Ibid. The Administrative Law Judge therefore found inapplicable the Board's ruling in Brockway Motor Trucks, Division of Mack Trucks, Inc., 230 N.L.R.B. 1002, 1003 (1977), enf. denied, 582 F.2d 720 (CA3 1978), that an employer's decision to close part of its business is not a mandatory subject of bargaining if it involves such a " 'significant investment or withdrawal of capital' as to 'affect the scope and ultimate direction of an enterprise,' " quoting from General Motors Corp., GMC Truck & Coach Div., 191 N.L.R.B. 951, 952 (1971).

[6] Because the court adopted different grounds for enforcement of the Board's order, it was error to enforce without a remand to the Board for further examinaiton of the evidence and proper factfinding. NLRB v. Pipefitters, 429 U.S. 507, 522, n. 9 (1977); SEC v. Chenery Corp., 318 U.S. 80, 95 (1943).

The Court of Appeals' decision in this case appears to be at odds with decisions of other Courts of Appeals,[7] some of which decline to require bargaining over any management decision involving "a major commitment of capital investment" or a "basic operational change" in the scope or direction of an enterprise,[8] and some of which indicate that bargaining is not mandated unless a violation of § 8(a)(3) (a partial closing motivated by antiunion animus) is involved.[9] The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has imposed a duty to bargain over partial closing decisions. See NLRB v. Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., 361 F.2d 512, cert. denied, 385 U.S. 935 (1966). The Board itself has not been fully consistent in its rulings applicable to this type of management decision.[10]

674

Because of the importance of the issue and the continuing disagreement between and among the Board and the Courts of Appeals, we granted certiorari. 499 U.S. 1076 (1981).

II

A fundamental aim of the National Labor Relations Act is the establishment and maintenance of industrial peace to preserve the flow of interstate commerce. NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. 301 U.S. 1 (1937). Central to achievement of this purpose is the promotion of collective bargaining as a method of defusing and channeling conflict between labor and management.[11] § 1 of the Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 151. Congress ensured that collective bargaining would go forward by creating the Board and giving it the power to condemn as unfair labor practices certain conduct by unions and employers that it deemed deleterious to the process, including the refusal "to bargain collectively." §§ 3 and 8, 29 U.S.C. §§ 153 and 158.

Although parties are free to bargain about any legal subject, Congress has limited the mandate or duty to bargain to matters of "wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment."[12] A unilateral change as to a subject within [7] The Court of Appeals in this case, for example, agreed, 627 F.2d, at 601, with the Third Circuit in Brockway Motor Trucks v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 720 (1978), that a presumption in favor of bargaining was to be established, but it analyzed differently how that presumption would be rebutted. The Third Circuit had decided that the competing interests of the employer and the employees, under the particular circumstances, must be weighed, and it had remanded the case before it to the Board for fact-finding into the circumstances behind the partial closing. See also Equitable Gas Co. v. NLRB, 637 F.2d 980 (CA3 1981) (subcontracting); ABC Trans-National Transport, Inc. v. NLRB, 642 F.2d 675 (CA3 1981) (partial closing); NLRB v. Royal Plating & Polishing Co., 350 F.2d 191 (CA3 1965) (partial closing). Several courts have agreed with the Second Circuit. See e.g., Davis v. NLRB, 617 F.2d 1264 (CA7 1980) (change of full-service restaurant to self-service cafeteria); NLRB v. Production Molded Plastics, Inc., 604 F.2d 451 (CA6 1979) (plant closing).

Refusal to confer and negotiate has been one of the most prolific causes of strife. This is such an outstanding act in the history of labor disturbances that it is a proper subject to judicial notice and requires no citation of instances." *NLRB v. Section 8(d), added, as was § 8(b)(3), to the Act by the amendatory Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, 61 Stat. 136, defines the duty to bargain as this category violates the statutory duty to bargain and is subject to the Board's remedial order. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962). Conversely, both employer and union may bargain to impasse over these matters and use the economic weapons at their disposal to attempt to secure their respective aims NLRB v. American National Ins. Co., 343 U.S. 395 (1952).[13] Congress deliberately left the words "wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment" without further definition, for it did not intend to deprive the Board of the power further to define those terms in light of specific industrial practices.[14]

Nonetheless, in establishing what issues must be submitted to the process of bargaining, Congress had no expectation that the elected union representative would become an equal partner in the running of the business enterprise in which the union's members are employed. Despite the deliberate openendedness of the statutory language, there is an undeniable limit to the subjects about which bargaining must take place:

> "Section 8(a) of the Act, of course, does not immutably fix a list of subjects for mandatory bargaining. * * * But it does establish a limitation against which proposed topics must be measured. In general terms, the limitation includes only issues that settle an aspect of the relationship between the employer and the employees." Chemical & Alkali Workers v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 178 (1971).

Some management decisions, such as choice of advertising and promotion, product type and design, and financing arrangements, have only an indirect and attenuated impact on the employment relationship. See Fibreboard. 379 U.S., at 223 (STEWART J., concurring). Other management decisions, such as the order of succession of layoffs and recalls, production quotas, and work rules, are almost exclusively "an aspect of the relationship" between employee. Chemical Workers, 404 U.S., at 178. The present case concerns a third type of management decision, one that had a direct impact on employment, since jobs were inexorably eliminated by the termination, but had as its focus only the economic profitability of the contract with Greenpark, a concern under these facts wholly apart from the employment relationship. This decision, involving a change in the scope and direction of the enterprise, is akin to the decision whether to be in business at all, "not in [itself] primarily about conditions of employment, though the effect of the decision may be necessarily to terminate employment." Fibreboard, 379 U.S., at 223 (STEWART. J., concurring). Cf. Textile Workers v. Darlington Co., 380 U.S. 263, 268 (1965) ("an employer has the absolute right to terminate his entire business for any reason he pleases"). At the same time, this decision touches on a matter of central and pressing concern to the union and its > in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 158(d).

Section 9(a) further specifies that

> "[r]epresentatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 159(a).

[13] A matter that is not a mandatory subject of bargaining, unless it is illegal, may be raised at the bargaining table to be discussed in good faith, and the parties may incorporate it into an enforceable collective-bargaining agreement. Labor and management may not, however, insist on it to the point of impasse. NLRB v. Borg-Warner Corp., 356 U.S. 342 (1958).

[14] In enacting the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, Congress rejected a proposal in the House to limit the subjects of bargaining to

> "(i) [w]age rates, hours of employment, and work requirements; (ii) procedures and practices relating to discharge, suspension, lay-off, recall, seniority, and discipline, or to promotion, demotion, transfer and assignment within the bargaining unit; (iii) conditions, procedures, and practices governing safety, sanitation, and protection of health at the place of employment; (iv) vacations and leaves of absence; and (v) administrative and procedural provisions relating to the foregoing subjects." H.R. 3020 § 2(11), 80th Cong., 1st Sess. (1947).

The adoption, instead of the general phrase now part of § 8(d) was clearly meant to preserve future interpretation by the Board. See H.R. Rep. No. 245, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 71 (1947) (minority report) ("The appropriate scope of collective bargaining cannot be determined by a formula; it will inevitably depend upon the traditions of an industry, the social and political climate at any given time, the needs of employers and employees, and many related factors. What are proper subject matters for collective bargaining should be left in the first instance to employers and trade-unions, and in the second place, to any administrative agency skilled in the field and competent to devote the necessary time to a study of industrial practices and traditions in each industry or area of the country, subject to review by the courts. It cannot and should not be strait-jacketed by legislative enactment"); H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 510, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 34–35 (1947). Specific references in the legislative history to place closing, however, are inconclusive. See 79 Cong. Rec. 7673, 9682 (1935) (comments of Sen. Walsh and Rep. Griswold).

member employees: the possibility of continued employment and the retention of the employees' very jobs. See Brockway Motor Trucks v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 720, 735–736 (CA3 1978); Ozark Trailers, Inc., 161 N.L.R.B. 561, 566–568 (1966).

Petitioner contends it had no duty to bargain about its decision to terminate its operations at Greenpark. This contention requires that we determine whether the decision itself should be considered part of petitioner's retained freedom to manage its affairs unrelated to employment.[15] The aim of labeling a matter a mandatory subject of bargaining, rather than simply permitting, but not requiring, bargaining, is to "promote the fundamental purpose of the Act by bringing a problem of vital concern to labor and management within the framework established by Congress as most conducive to industrial peace," Fibreboard, 379 U.S., at 211. The concept of mandatory bargaining is premised on the belief that collective discussions backed by the parties' economic weapons will result in decisions that are better for both management and labor and for society as a whole.[16] Ford Motor Co., 441 U.S., at 500–501; Borg-Warner, 356 U.S., at 350 (condemning employer's proposal of "ballot" clause as weakening the collective-bargaining process). This will be true, however, only if the subject proposed for discussion is amenable to resolution through the bargaining process. Management must be free from the constraints of the bargaining process[17] to the extent essential for the running of a profitable business. It also must have some degree of certainty beforehand as to when it may proceed to reach decisions without fear of later evaluations labeling its conduct an unfair labor practice. Congress did not explicitly state what issues of mutual concern to union and management it intended to exclude from mandatory bargaining.[18] Nonetheless, in view of an employer's need for unencumbered decisionmaking, bargaining over management decisions that have a substantial impact on the continued availability of employment should be required only if the benefit, for labor-management relations and the collective-bargaining process, outweighs the burden placed on the conduct of the business.

The Court in Fibreboard implicitly engaged in this analysis with regard to a decision to subcontract for maintenance work previously done by unit employees. Holding the employer's decision a subject of mandatory bargaining, the Court relied not only on the "literal meaning" of the statutory words, but also reasoned:

> "The Company's decision to contract out the maintenance work did not alter the Company's basic operation. The maintenance work still had to be performed in the plant.
> 680
> No capital investment was contemplated; the Company merely replaced existing employees with those of an independent contractor to do the same work under similar conditions of em-

[15] There is no doubt that petitioner was under a duty to bargain about the results or effects of its decision to stop the work at Greenpark, or that it violated that duty. Petitioner consented to enforcement of the Board's order concerning bargaining over the effects of the closing and has reached agreement with the union on severance pay. App. in No. 79–4167 (CA2), pp. 21–22.

[16] "The Act does not compel agreements between employers and employees. It does not compel any agreement whetever. It does not prevent the employer 'from refusing to make a collective contract and hiring individuals on whatever terms' the employer 'may by unilateral action determine.' * * * The theory of the Act is that free opportunity for negotiation with accredited representatives of employees is likely to promote industrial peace and may bring about the adjustments and agreements which the Act in itself does not attempt to compel." NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S., at 45. Cf. John Wiley & Sons, Inc. v. Livingston, 376 U.S 543, 549 (1964) ("The objectives of national labor policy, reflected in established principles of federal law, require that the rightful prerogative of owners independently to arrange their business and even eliminate themselves as employers be balanced by some protection to the employees from a sudden change in the employment relationship").

[17] The employer has no obligation to abandon its intentions or to agree with union proposals. On proper subjects, it must meet with the union, provide information necessary to the union's understanding of the problem, and in good faith consider any proposals the union advances. In concluding to reject a union's position as to a mandatory subject, however, it must face the union's possible use of strike power. See generally Fleming, The Obligation to Bargain in Good Faith, 47 Va. L. Rev. 988 (1961).

[18] The subjects over which mandatory bargaining has been required have changed over time. Employers and unions have been required to bargain over such diverse topics as profit-sharing plans, Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc. v. NLRB, 567 F. 2d 1343 (CA5), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 985 (1978); layoffs and recalls, see Awrey Bakeries, Inc. v. NLRB, 548 F. 2d 138 (CA6 1976); contractual clauses concerning race discrimination, see Wichita Eagle & Beacon Publishing Co., 222 N.L.R.B., 742 (1976); and "most favored nation" clauses, Dolly Madison Industries, Inc., 182 N.L.R.B., 1037 (1970). See also Borg-Warner, 356 U.S., at 353 (Harlan, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

> ployment. Therefore, to require the employer to bargain about the matter would not significantly abridge his freedom to manage the business." 379 U.S., at 213.

The Court also emphasized that a desire to reduce labor costs, which it considered a matter "peculiarly suitable for resolution within the collective bargaining framework," id., at 214 was at the base of the employer's decision to subcontract:

> "It was induced to contract out the work by assurances from independent contractors that economies could be derived by reducing the work force, decreasing fringe benefits, and eliminating overtime payments. These have long been regarded as matters peculiarly suitable for resolution within the collective bargaining framework, and industrial experience demonstrates that collective negotiation has been highly successful in achieving peaceful accommodation of the conflicting interests." Id., at 213–214.

The prevalence of bargaining over "contracting out" as a matter of industrial practice generally was taken as further proof of the "amenability of such subjects to the collective bargaining process." Id., at 211.

With this approach in mind, we turn to the specific issue at hand: an economically motivated decision to shut down part of a business.

A

Both union and management regard control of the decision of shut down as operation with the utmost seriousness. As has been noted, however, the Act is not intended to serve either party's individual interest, but to foster in a neutral manner a system in which the conflict between these interests may be resolved. It seems particularly important therefore, to consider whether requiring bargaining over this sort of decision will advance the neutral purposes of the Act.

A union's interest in participating in the decision to close a particular facility or part of an employer's operations springs from its legitimate concern over job security. The Court has observed: "The words of [§ 8 (d)] * * * plainly cover termination of employment which * * * necessarily results" from closing an operation. Fibreboard, 379 U.S., at 210. The union's practical purpose in participating however, will be largely uniform: it will seek to delay or halt the closing. No doubt it will be impelled, in seeking these ends to offer concessions information and alternatives that might be helpful to management or forestall or prevent the termination of jobs.[19] It is unlikely however, that requiring bargaining over the decision itself, as well as its effects, will augment this flow of information and suggestions. There is no dispute that the union must be given a significant opportunity to bargain about these matters of job security as part of the "effects" bargaining mandated by § 8 (a)(5). See e.g., NLRB v. Royal Plating & Polishing Co., 350 F.2d 191, 196 (CA3 1965); NLRB v. Adams Dairy, Inc., 350 F.2d 108 (CA8 1965), cert. denied. 382 U.S. 1011 (1966). And under § 8(a)(5), bargaining over the effects of a decision must be conducted in a meaningful manner and at a meaningful time, and the Board may impose sanctions to insure its adequacy. A union, by pursuing such bargaining rights, may achieve valuable concessions from an employer engaged in a partial closing. It also may secure in contract negotiations provisions implementing rights to notice, information, and fair bargaining. See BNA, Basic Patterns in Union Contracts 62–64 (9th ed., 1979).

Moreover, the union's legitimate interest in fair dealing is protected by § 8(a)(3), which prohibits partial closings motivated by antiunion animus, when done to gain an unfair advantage. Textile Workers v. Darlington Co., 380 U.S. 263 (1965). Under § 8(a)(3) the Board may inquire into the motivations behind a partial closing. An employer may not simply shut down part of its business and mask its desire to weaken and circumvent the union by labeling its decision "purely economic."

[19] We are aware of past instances where unions have aided employers in saving failing businesses by lending technical assistance reducing wages and benefits or increasing production, and even loaning part of earned wages to forestall closures. See S. Slichter, J. Healy, & E. Livernash, The Impact of Collective Bargaining on Management 845–851 (1960); C. Golden & H. Rutenberg, The Dynamics of Industrial Democracy 263-291 (1942). See also United Steel Workers of America. Local No. 1330 v. United States Steel Corp., 492 F. Supp. 1 (ND Ohio), aff'd in part and vacated in part, 631 F.2d 1264 (CA6 1980) (union sought to purchase failing plant); 104 LRR 239 (1980) (employee ownership plan instituted to save company); id., at 267–268 (union accepted pay cuts to reduce plant's financial problems). These have come about without the intervention of the Board enforcing a statutory requirement to bargain.

Thus, although the union has a natural concern that a partial closing decision not be hastily or unnecessarily entered into, it has some control over the effects of the decision and indirectly may ensure that the decision itself is deliberately considered. It also has direct protection against a partial closing decision that is motivated by an intent to harm a union.

Management's interest in whether it should discuss a decision of this kind is much more complex and varies with the particular circumstances. If labor costs are an important factor in a failing operation and the decision to close, management will have an incentive to confer voluntarily with the union to seek concessions that may make continuing the business profitable. Cf. U.S. News & World Report, Feb. 9, 1981, p. 74; BNA, Labor Relations Yearbook–1979, p. 5 (UAW agreement with Chrysler Corp. to make concessions on wages and fringe benefits). At other times, management may have great need for speed, flexibility, and secrecy in 683 meeting business opportunities and exigencies.[20] It may face significant tax or securities consequences that hinge on confidentiality, the timing of a plant closing or a reorganization of the corporate structure. The publicity incident to the normal process of bargaining may injure the possibility of a successful transition or increase the economic damage to the business. The employer also may have no feasible alternative to the closing, and even good-faith bargaining over it may both be futile and cause the employer additional loss.[21]

There is an important difference, also, between permitted bargaining and mandated bargaining. Labeling this type of decision mandatory could afford a union a powerful tool for achieving delay, a power that might be used to thwart management's intentions in a manner unrelated to any feasible solution the union might propose. See Comment, "Partial Terminations"—A Choice Between Bargaining Equality and Economic Efficiency, 14 UCLA L. Rev. 1089, 1103–1105 (1967). In addition, many of the cases before the Board have involved, as this one did, not simply a refusal to bargain over the decision, but a refusal to bargain at all, often coupled with other unfair labor practices. See, e.g., Electrical Products Div. of Midland-Ross Corp. v. NLRB, 617 F. 2d 977 (CA3 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 871 (1981); NLRB v. Amoco Chemicals Corp., 529 F.2d 427 (CA5 1976); Royal Typewriter Co. v. NLRB, 533 F.2d 1030 (CA8 1976); NLRB 684 v. American Mfg. Co., 351 F.2d 74 (CA5 1965) (subcontracting); Smyth Mfg. Co., 247 N.L.R.B. 1139 (1980). In these cases the employer's action gave the Board reason to order remedial relief apart from access to the decisionmaking process. It is not clear that a union would be equally dissatisfied if an employer performed all its bargaining obligations apart from the additional remedy sought here.

While evidence of current labor practice is only an indication of what is feasible through collective bargaining, and not a binding guide, see Chemical Workers, 404 U.S., at 176, that evidence supports the apparent imbalance weighing against mandatory bargaining. We note that provisions giving unions a right to participate in the decisionmaking process concerning alteration of the scope of an enterprise appear to be relatively rare. Provisions concerning notice and "effects" bargaining are more prevalent. See II BNA. Collective Bargaining Negotiations and Contracts § 65:201–233 (1981); U.S. Dept. of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, Bull. 2065, Characteristics of Major Collective Bargaining Agreements, Jan. 1, 1978, pp. 96, 100, 101, 102–103 (1980) (charting provisions giving interplant transfer and relocation allowances; advance notice of layoffs, shutdowns, and technological changes; and wage-employment guarantees; no separate tables on decision-bargaining, presumably due to rarity). See also U.S. Dept. of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statisics, Bull. No. 1425–10 Major Collective Bargaining Agreements, Plant Movement, Transfer, and Relocation Allowances (July 1969).

Further, the presumption analysis adopted by the Court of Appeals seems ill-suited to advance harmonious relations between employer and employee. An employer would have difficulty determining beforehand whether it was faced with a situation requiring bargaining or one that involved economic necessity sufficiently compelling to obviate the duty to bargain. If it should decide to risk not bargaining, it might be faced ultimately, with harsh remedies forcing it to pay large amounts of backpay to employees who likely would have been discharged regardless of bargaining, or even to consider reopening a failing operation. See, e.g., Electrical Products Div. of Midland-Ross Corp., 239 N.L.R.B. 323 (1978), enf'd, 617 F. 2d 977 (CA3 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 871 (1981). Cf. Lever Brothers Co. v. International Chemical Workers Union, 554 F. 2d 115 (CA4 1976) (enjoining plant closure and transfer to permit negotiations). Also, labor costs may not be a crucial circumstance in a particular economically based partial termination. See. e.g., NLRB v. International Harvester Co., 618 F. 2d 85 (CA9 1980) (change in marketing structure); NLRB v. Thompson Transport Co., 406 F.2d 698 (CA10 1969) (loss of major customer). And in those cases, the Board's traditional remedies may well be futile. See ABC Trans-National Transport, Inc. v. NLRB, 642 F. 2d 675 (CA3 1981) (although employer violated its "duty" to bargain about freight terminal closing, court refused to enforce order to bargain). If the employer intended to try to fulfill a court's direction to bargain, it would have difficulty determining exactly at what stage of its deliberations the duty to bargain would arise and what amount of bargaining would suffice before it could implement its decision. Compare Burns Ford, Inc., 182 N.L.R.B. 753 (1970) (one week's notice of layoffs sufficient), and Hartmann Luggage Co., 145 N.L.R.B. 1572 (1964) (entering into executory subcontracting agreement before notifying union not a violation since contract not yet final), with Royal Plating & Polishing Co., 148 N.L.R.B. 545, 555 (1964), enf. denied, 350 F. 2d 191 (CA3 1965) (two weeks' notice before final closing of plant inadequate). If an employer engaged in some discussion, but did not yield to the union's demands, the Board might conclude that the employer had engaged in "surface bargaining," a violation of its good faith. See NLRB v. Reed & Prince Mfg. Co., 205 F. 2d 131 (CA1), cert. denied, 346 U.S. 887 (1953). A union, too, would have difficulty determining the limits of its prerogatives, whether and when it could use its economic powers to try to alter an employer's decision, or whether, in doing so, it would trigger sanctions from the Board. See, e. g., International Offset Corp., 210 N.L.R.B. 854 (1974) (union's failure to realize that shutdown was imminent, in view of successive advertisements, sales of equipment, and layoffs, held a waiver of right to bargain); Shell Oil Co., 149 N.L.R.B. 305 (1964) (union waived its right to bargain by failing to request meetings when employer announced intent to transfer a few days before implementation).

We conclude that the harm likely to be done to an employer's need to operate freely in deciding whether to shut down part of its business purely for economic reasons outweighs the incremental benefit that might be gained through the union's participation in making the decision,[22] and we hold that the decision itself is not part of § 8(d)'s "terms and conditions," see n. 12, supra, over which Congress has mandated bargaining.[23]

---

[22] In this opinion we of course intimate no view as to other types of management decisions, such as plant relocations, sales, other kinds of subcontracting, automation, etc., which are to be considered on their particular facts. See, e. g., International Ladies' Garment Workers Union v. NLRB, 150 U.S. App. D.C. 71, 463 F. 2d 907 (1972) (plant relocation predominantly due to labor costs); Weltronic Co. v. NLRB, 419 F. 2d 1120 (CA6 1969) (decision to move plant three miles), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 938 (1970); Dan Dee West Virginia Corp., 180 N.L.R.B. 534 (1970) (decision to change method of distribution, under which employee-drivers became independent contractors); Young Motor Truck Service, Inc., 156 N.L.R.B. 661 (1966) (decision to sell major portion of business). See also Schwarz, Plant Relocation or Partial Termination—The Duty to Decision-Bargain, 39 Ford. L. Rev. 81, 100–102 (1970).

[23] Despite the contentions of amicus AFL–CIO our decision in Railroad Telegraphers v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 362 U.S. 330 (1960), does not require that we find bargaining over this partial closing decision mandatory. In that case, a union certified as bargaining agent for certain railroad employees requested that the railroad bargain over its decision to close down certain stations thereby eliminating a number of jobs. When the union threatened to strike over the railroad's refusal to bargain on this issue, the railroad sought an injunction in federal court. Construing the scope of bargaining required by § 2, First, of the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C. § 152, First, the Court held that the union's effort to negotiate was not "an unlawful bargaining demand," 362 U.S., at 341, and that the District Court was precluded from enjoining the threatened strike by § 4 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, 29 U.S.C. § 104, which deprives federal courts of "jurisdiction to issue any restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction in any case involving or growing out of any labor dispute to prohibit any person or persons participating or interested in such dispute • • • from • • • [c]easing or refusing to perform any

In order to illustrate the limits of our holding, we turn again to the specific facts of this case. First, we note that when petitioner decided to terminate its Greenpark contract, it had no intention to replace the discharged employees or to move that operation elsewhere. Petitioner's sole purpose was to reduce its economic loss and the union made no claim of antiunion animus. In addition, petitioner's dispute with Greenpark was solely over the size of the management fee Greenpark was willing to pay. The union had no control or authority over that fee. The most that the union could have offered would have been advice and concessions that Greenpark, the third party upon whom rested the success or failure of the contract, had no duty even to consider. These facts in particular distinguish this case from the subcontracting issue presented in Fibreboard. Further, the union was not selected as the bargaining representative or certified until well after petitioner's economic difficulties at Greenpark had begun. We thus are not faced with an employer's abrogation of ongoing negotiations or an existing bargaining agreement. Finally, while petitioner's business enterprise did not involve the investment of large amounts of capital in single locations, we do not believe that the absence of "significant investment or withdrawal of capital," General Motors Corp., GMC Truck & Coach Div., 191 N.L.R.B., at 952, is crucial. The decision to halt work at this specific location represented a significant change in petitioner's operations, a change not unlike opening a new line of business or going out of business entirely.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals, accordingly, is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom JUSTICE MARSHALL joins, dissenting

Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, requires employers and employee representatives "to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment." 29 U.S.C. § 158(d). The question in this case is whether First National Maintenance Corporation's decision to terminate its Greenpark Care Center operation and to discharge the workers employed in that operation was a decision with respect to "terms and conditions of employment" within the meaning of the Act, thus rendering its failure to negotiate with the union unlawful.

689

As this Court has noted, the words "terms and conditions of employment" plainly cover termination of employment resulting from a management decision to close an operation. Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 210 (1964). As the Court today admits the decision to close an operation "touches on a matter of central and pressing concern to the union and its member employees." Ante, at 677. Moreover, as the Court today further concedes, Congress deliberately left the words "terms and conditions of employment" indefinite, so that the NLRB would be able to give content to those terms in light of changing industrial conditions. Ante, at 675, and n. 14. In the exercise of its congressionally delegated authority and accumulated expertise, the Board has determined that an employer's decision to close part of its operations affects the "terms and conditions of employment" within the meaning of the Act, and is thus a mandatory subject for collective bargaining. Ozark Trailers, Inc., 161 N.L.R.B. 561 (1966). Nonetheless, the Court today declines to defer to the Board's decision on this sensitive question of industrial relations, and on the basis of pure speculawork. . . ." Although the Court in part relied on an expansive interpretation of § 2, First, which requires railroads to "exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements concerning rates of pay, rules, and working conditions," and § 13(c) of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, 29 U.S.C. § 113(c), defining "labor dispute" as "any controversy concerning terms or conditions of employment," its decision also rested on the particular aims of the Railway Labor Act and national transportation policy. See 362 U.S., at 336–338. The mandatory scope of bargaining under the Railway Labor Act and the extent of the prohibition against injunctive relief contained in Norris-LaGuardia are not coextensive with the National Labor Relations Act and the Board's jurisdiction over unfair labor practices. See Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Transportation Union, 402 U.S. 570, 579, n. 11 (1971) ("parallels between the duty to bargain in good faith and the duty to exert every reasonable effort, like all parallels between the NLRA and the Railway Labor Act, should be drawn with the utmost care and with full awareness of the differences between the statutory schemes"). Cf. Boys Markets, Inc. v. Retail Clerks, 398 U.S. 235 (1970); Buffalo Forge Co. v. Steelworkers, 428 U.S. 397 (1976).

tion reverses the judgment of the Board and of the Court of Appeals. I respectfully dissent.

The Court bases its decision on a balancing test. It states that "bargaining over management decisions that have a substantial impact on the continued availability of employment should be required only if the benefit, for labor-management relations and the collective-bargaining process, outweighs the burden placed on the conduct of the business," Ante, at 679. I cannot agree with this test because it takes into account only the interests of management; it fails to consider the legitimate employment interests of the workers and their union. Cf. Brockway Motor Trucks v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 720, 734–740 (CA3 1978) (balancing of interests of workers in retaining their jobs against interests of employers in maintaining unhindered control over corporate direction). This one-sided approach hardly serves "to foster in a neutral manner" a system for resolution of these serious, two-sided controversies. See ante, at 680–681.

Even if the Court's statement of the test were accurate, I could not join in its application which is based solely on speculation. Apparently, the Court concludes that the benefit to labor-management relations and the collective-bargaining process from negotiation over partial closings is minimal, but it provides no evidence to that effect. The Court acknowledges that the union might be able to offer concessions, information, and alternatives that might obviate or forestall the closing, but it then asserts that "[i]t is unlikely, however, that requiring bargaining over the decision * * * will augment this flow of information and suggestions." Ante, at 681. Recent experience, however, suggests the contrary. Most conspicuous, perhaps, were the negotiations between Chrysler Corporation and the United Auto Workers, which led to significant adjustments in compensation and benefits, contributing to Chrysler's ability to remain afloat. See Wall Street Journal, Oct. 26, 1979, p. 3. col. 1. Even where labor costs are not the direct cause of a company's financial difficulties, employee concessions can often enable the company to continue in operation—if the employees have the opportunity to offer such concessions.[*]

The Court further presumes that management's need for "speed, flexibility, and secrecy" in making partial closing decision would be frustrated by a requirement to bargain. Ante, at 682–683. In some cases the Court might be correct. In others, however, the decision will be made openly and deliberately, and considerations of "speed, flexibility, and secrecy" will be inapposite. Indeed, in view of management's admitted duty to bargain over the effects of a closing, see ante, at 677–678, n. 15, it is difficult to understand why additional bargaining over the closing itself would necessarily unduly delay or publicize the decision.

I am not in a position to judge whether mandatory bargaining over partial closing in all cases is consistent with our national labor policy, and neither is the Court. The primary responsibility to determine the scope of the statutory duty to bargain has been entrusted to the NLRB, which should not be reversed by the courts merely because they might prefer another view of the statute. Ford Motor Co. v. NLRB, 441 U.S. 488, 495–497 (1979); see NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 236 (1963). I therefore agree with the Court of Appeals that employers presumptively have a duty to bargain over a decision to close an operation, and that this presumption can be rebutted by a showing that bargaining would be futile, that the closing was due to emergency financial circumstances, or that, for some other reason, bargaining would not further the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act. 627 F.2d 596, 601 (CA2 1980). I believe that this approach is amply supported by recent decisions of the Board. E. g., Brooks-Scanlon, Inc., 246 N.L.R.B. 476, 102 LRRM 1606 (1979); Raskin Packing Co., 246 N.L.R.B. 78, 102 LRRM 1489 (1979); M. & M. Transportation Co., 239 N.L.R.B. 73 (1978). With respect to the individual facts of this case, however, I would vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals, and remand to the Board for further examination of the evidence. See SEC v. Chenery Corp., 318 U.S. 80, 94–95 (1943).

[*] Indeed, in this case, the Court of Appeals found: "On the record, * * * there is sufficient reason to believe that, given the opportunity, the union might have made concessions, by accepting reduction in wages or benefits (take-backs) or a reduction in the work force, which would in part or in whole have enable Greenpark to give FNM an increased management fee. At least, if FNM had bargained over its decision to close, that possibility would have been tested, and management would still have been free to close the Greenpark operation if bargaining did not produce a solution." 627 F.2d 596, 602 (CA2 1980).

Raymond T. Kolinske v. William A Lubbers, GC

516 F. Supp. 1171 (D.C.D.C.), June 22, 1981

On action challenging failure to pay strike benefits

1172

Joyce Hens Green, District Judge: This matter is before the Court on the motion of the defendants, William A. Lubbers, General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board (hereinafter the "General Counsel" and the "N.L.R.B") and the International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW (hereinafter "UAW"), to dismiss the complaint for lack of jurisdiction and for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Alternatively, the General Counsel has moved for summary judgment.

The facts alleged in the complaint, taken as true for purposes of the motions to dismiss, reflect that the plaintiff is a long time employee of the McLaughlin Company at its Petoskey, Michigan plant. The McLaughlin Company, an "employer" as defined in 29 U.S.C. § 152(2) and therefore subject to the jurisdiction of the N.L.R.B., has for many years recognized Local 1669 of the UAW as the exclusive bargaining agent for many of its employees. The plaintiff, however, has not ever been a member of either Local 1669 or the UAW, but works in the bargaining unit represented by Local 1669.

Local 1669 and the McLaughlin Company, in 1975, entered into a collective bargaining agreement containing a provision creating an "agency shop,"[1] which required the plaintiff, as an employee in the unit represented by Local 1669, to pay fees to Local 1669 equivalent to union dues as a condition of employment.[2] The plaintiff paid the required fees to Local 1669 during the duration of the bargaining agreement.

While this agreement was in effect (and now), Article 16 of the UAW's Constitution required that 30% of members' dues be placed in the UAW strike insurance fund. The UAW treated plaintiff's fees in a similar fashion, apportioning 30% for placement in the fund from which strike benefits were paid to employees.

The 1975 agreement expired in the spring of 1978 and Local 1669 went on strike, establishing a picket line at the Petoskey plant of the McLaughlin Company. Plaintiff, though not a union member, honored the picket line and did not work during the strike at the Petoskey facility.

The UAW paid strike benefits to members of Local 1669 who performed picket line or other strike duties, but when plaintiff applied for such benefits, the UAW refused payment on the ground that he had not performed picket line or other strike duties.

During the 1978 strike (and at the present time), the UAW Constitution provided in Article 8, Section 20 that:

> Non-members covered by an agency shop clause in a UAW contract shall receive all the material benefits to which members are entitled but shall not be allowed other membership participation in the affairs of the union.

A 1962 interpretation of this section issued by the UAW International Executive Board declared:

> Such non-members shall not be allowed attendance at Union meetings, the right to hold or run for any Union office (elected or appointed) or any voting rights within the Union unless and until they have become members of the Union in

[1] In his Basic Text on Labor Law, Professor Robert A. Gorman described the agency shop:

> The agency shop requires that an employee * * * simply pay the union for services rendered by the union to employees within the bargaining unit as the employees' "agent" in negotiating and administering the labor contract. The Labor Act permits—and most agency shop agreements provide for—the exaction of a service fee which is equivalent in amount to the initiation fees and periodic dues which are paid by full union members. The rationale is that even nonmembers reap the benefit of union representation and should not be permitted a "free ride."

Id. at 642.

[2] Agency shop clauses are established pursuant to Section 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3), which defines unfair labor practices and, as interpreted in N.L.R.B. v. General Motors, 373 U.S. 734, 83 S.Ct. 1453, 10 L.Ed.2d 670 (1963), permits a union to seek such a clause in collective bargaining. The employer had argued that permitting an agency shop clause in the bargaining agreement would have placed him in violation of § 8(a)(3)'s proscription against "discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization." The Court found that the employer's acceptance of an agency shop clause would not constitute an unfair labor practice.

accordance with the provisions of this Constitution.

The 1978 strike ended when Local 1669 and the McLaughlin Company reached accord on a new collective bargaining agreement, which included an agency shop provision similar to that clause executed in the 1975 agreement.

After the UAW rejected plaintiff's demands for strike benefits, he filed on July 11, 1978 an unfair labor practice charge with the Regional Director of the N.L.R.B.'s 7th Region, alleging that the UAW's denial of strike benefits violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act (hereinafter the "NLRA"), 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(A).[3] On August 28 the Acting Regional Director refused to issue a complaint, and two months later plaintiff's appeal was denied.

On September 13, 1978, plaintiff brought another charge against the UAW and Local 1669, claiming that the continued collection of fees from the plaintiff by Local 1669 and the UAW, a portion of which is expended on programs unavailable to the plaintiff, violated § 8(b)(1)(A). On October 26, the Regional Director decided not to issue a complaint and on October 31, plaintiff's appeal of this decision was denied.

Plaintiff later instituted this action, contending that the General Counsel infringed plaintiff's right to refrain from associational activity, guaranteed by Section 7 of the NLRA, and the First Amendment to the Constitution; and his right not to be deprived of property without due process of law, guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution. Against the UAW, plaintiff alleges a breach of the duty of fair representation in that the Union engaged in conduct which was arbitrary, discriminatory, unconstitutional, and in bad faith.

Plaintiff seeks a writ of mandamus directing the General Counsel to issue complaints charging unfair labor practices against Local 1669 and the UAW for their failure to pay him strike benefits unless he participates in picketing and for their collection of fees allocated to be spent on programs in which he may not participate. Pending the completion of proceedings on these complaints, plaintiff seeks a stay in the action against the UAW. Were the relief against the General Counsel not granted, plaintiff seeks against the UAW either a refund of 30% of his fees paid from 1975–1978 or an award of the full amount of strike benefits for the 1978 strike and any that might result in the future, provided he honors the picket line.

The first question demanding resolution is whether there is jurisdiction to entertain plaintiff's request for a writ of mandamus ordering the General Counsel to issue an unfair labor practice complaint. Under Section 3 of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 153, the General Counsel is vested with "final authority, on behalf of the Board, in respect of the investigation of charges and issuance of complaints under [Section 10 of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 160 (procedures for unfair labor practice complaints)]." This section has been uniformly interpreted to grant unreviewable discretion to the General Counsel. See Detroit Edison Co. v. N.L.R.B., 440 U.S. 301, 316, 99 S.Ct. 1123, 1131–32, 59 L.Ed.2d 333 (1979) (the General Counsel can "in his unreviewable discretion refuse to issue * * * a complaint."); Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 182, 87 S.Ct. 903, 912, 17 L.Ed.2d 842 ("the Board's General Counsel has unreviewable discretion to refuse to institute an unfair labor practice complaint."); Bandlow v. Rothman, 278 F.2d 866 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 909, 81 S.Ct. 273, 5 L.Ed.2d 224 (1960) (per curiam) (district court lacks power to order General Counsel to issue a complaint).

Plaintiff asserts that this dispute falls into one of the recognized exceptions to the principle of nonreviewability. In Leedom v. Kyne, 358 U.S. 184, 79 S.Ct. 180, 3 L.Ed.2d 210 (1958), the Supreme Court held that the district court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1337[4] "to strike down an order of the Board made in excess of its delegated powers and contrary to a specific prohibition in the Act." Id. at 188, 79 S.Ct. at 183. In Leedom, the Court found that the Board exceeded its statutory power by including in a single bargaining unit a group of professional employees with a group of non-professional employees without following proper procedures. In other certification actions, courts have narrowly and frugally construed the Leedom exception. See Physicians National House Staff Association v. Fanning, 642 F.2d 492 (D.C. Cir.1980) (en banc) ("[T]he district courts are powerless to adjudicate the merits of certification decisions absent a clear violation of the National Labor Relations Act by the Board." Id., at 500.

[3] Section 8(b)(1)(A) provides that a union commits an unfair labor practice when it restrains or coerces employees exercising rights guaranteed in Section 7. 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(A). Section 7 gives employees "the right to refrain from [union activity] except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in [section 8(a)(3)]." 29 U.S.C. § 157.

[4] Section 1337 provides that district courts shall have jurisdiction "of any civil action or proceeding arising under any Act of Congress regulating commerce or protecting trade and commerce against restraints and monopolies."

Additionally, district courts have exercised jurisdiction over actions by the Board which infringe constitutional rights. Fay v. Douds, 172 F.2d 720, 723 (2d Cir. 1949) (Hand, J.) (giving district court jurisdiction if the "assertion of consititutional right is not transparently frivolous.") In McCormick v. Hirsch, 460 F.Supp. 1337 (M.D.Pa. 1978), the Court accepted jurisdiction over a complaint where the plaintiff, the superior for all Catholic elementary and secondary schools within a diocese, alleged that the N.L.R.B. had no jurisdiction over Roman Catholic schools that employ lay teachers who seek unionization. The court held that enjoining the Board from asserting jurisdiction over a Catholic parochial high school was necessary to protect the plaintiff's religious freedom.

Although judicial review of the General Counsel's decision not to issue a complaint might protect that rights of the individual more adequately, on occasion, and ensure responsible decision making,[5] it is apparent that jurisdiction does not lie in the district court to determine whether the General Counsel erred in this matter. Both the statutory exception as embodied in Leedom and the constitutional exception announced in Fay concerned certification actions undertaken by the entire Board, not a discretionary decision made by the General Counsel pursuant to § 3 of the NLRA. Indeed, research discloses no decision overruling the discretion of the General Counsel and ordering him to issue an unfair labor practice complaint.[6] It would then not only defy the heavy burden of precedent to accept jurisdiction over the General Counsel's decision not to issue a complaint, but more impressively, would establish a new precedent inappropriate in this unique instance.

The question remains, however, whether the plaintiff has stated a cause of action against the UAW. The UAW maintains that the court lacks jurisdiction over the cause of action asserted and that the plaintiff has not stated a legal claim upon which relief can be granted under the Constitution or under the union's duty to represent the plaintiff fairly. The plaintiff, rejecting these arguments, claims that the Court has jurisdiction, and that in conditioning his receipt of strike benefits on picketing activity, the union has infringed his First Amendment freedoms of speech and association. Plaintiff also contends that the union's allocation of 30% of his fees into the strike insurance fund is an unlawful apportionment of non-members' payments since, as such non-member, he is being denied strike benefits unless he participates in the affirmative activity of picketing.

Plaintiff asserts that jurisdiction exists under two separate statutory grants, 28 U.S.C. § 1337, the provision giving the district court jurisdiction to hear matters "arising under any Act of Congress regulating commerce * * *," and Section 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 185, which permits suits for violation of contracts between an employer and a labor organization or between any such labor organizations.

In suits alleging the breach of the duty of fair representation, district courts have exercised jurisdiction under section 301 where the suit alleges a union misuse of fees collected from non-members pursuant to agency shop agreements. Bagnall v. Air Line Pilots Association, 626 F.2d 336 (4th Cir. 1980), cert. denied ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 943, 67 L.Ed.2d 112 (1981); Seay v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 427 F.2d 996, 1000 (9th Cir. 1970), on remand, 371 F.Supp. 754 (C.D. Cal. 1973), aff'd in

[5] See Rosenblum, A New Look at the General Counsel's Unreviewable Discretion Not to Issue a Complaint under the NLRA, 86 Yale L.J. 1349 (1977) ("Independent judicial scrutiny would * * * provide a remedy to protect the rights of private parties against arbitrary or erroneous decisions, and ensure that labor policy is made, not by the General Counsel, but by the body to whom Congress has entrusted the task—the NLRB." Id. at 1360–61).

[6] At least one court has held that where the General Counsel's refusal to issue an unfair labor practice complaint is based on an erroneous interpretation of the limitations period governing the action, the General Counsel can be ordered to address the plaintiff's charges on the merits. Southern California District Council of Laborers v. Ordman, 318 F.Supp. 633 (C.D.Cal. 1970). See also Illinois State Employees Council 34 v. N.L.R.B., 395 F.Supp. 1011 (N.D.Ill. 1975), aff'd 530 F.2d 979 (7th Cir. 1976) (General Counsel's interpretation of notice provisions of NLRA upheld; decision not to issue a complaint was based on sound judgment.

part, rev'd and remanded in part, 533 F.2d 1126 (9th Cir. 1976). In this case, the plaintiff alleges that the union breached the duty of fair representation in not paying him strike benefits from a fund comprised of money collected from union members and non-members, including the plaintiff, under an agency shop provision in the collective bargaining agreement.

The UAW claims that the plaintiff's cause of action arises not out of the collective bargaining agreement, but rather out of the Union Constitution's provision noted at 2, supra, that entitles non-members covered by an agency shop clause to benefits equal to those received by members but not to the rights of membership participation in the union's affairs. Section 301, the UAW contends, does not confer jurisdiction on suits arising under constitutions because such disputes are merely internal union conflicts and thus present no situation where a contract exists between an employer and a labor organization or between any such labor organizations. Union constitutions, the UAW maintains, are not contracts under § 301. See Smith v. United Mineworkers of America, 493 F.2d 1241 (10th Cir. 1974); Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 400 v. Svacek, 431 F.2d 705 (9th Cir. 1970). Contra, Local 1219 v. United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, 493 F.2d 93 (1st Cir.1974); Parks v. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 314 F.2d 886 (4th Cir.) cert. denied 372 U.S. 976, 83 S.Ct. 1111, 10 L.Ed.2d 142 (1963) (finding that union constitutions are contracts within § 301). The UAW argues further that plaintiff has not satisfied this Circuit's requirement that the plaintiff plead a sufficient factual basis underlying the possible breach of the union constitution. Local 1199, Hospital and Health Care Employees v. National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, 533 F.2d 1205 (D.C.Cir. 1976).

In Baker v. Newspaper & Graphic Communications Local 6, 628 F.2d 156 (D.C.Cir. 1980), this Circuit held that § 301 did not confer jurisdiction on the federal courts to consider purely intra-union conflicts. Five union members sued their employer, their local union, and their international union alleging a breach of the duty of fair representation and the duty to permit plaintiffs to participate in union affairs. Because the controversy was between a union and some of its members and because it did not have the "requisite general effect on labor-management relations," id. at 164, the Court refused to exercise jurisdiction over the dispute.

This action differs materially from Baker for the simple reason that plaintiff is not a member of the United Auto Workers who, as such union member challenges some particular conduct by his representative in collective bargaining. Rather, the complaint presents a dispute between a union and a non-union member seeking to enforce his rights as against the union under an agency-shop clause. Not only do these facts present more than an "intra-union conflict," but the dispute is likely to have a widespread effect on labor-management relations at the McLaughlin Company. Accordingly, jurisdiction under § 301 is proper. See also Seay v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 427 F.2d 996 (9th Cir. 1970), on remand, 371 F.Supp. 754 (D.C.Cal.1973), aff'd in part, rev'd and remanded in part, 533 F.2d 1126 (9th Cir. 1976) ("While appellants' complaint does not allege a violation of the collective bargaining agreement on its face inasmuch as the agreement does not specifically discuss the permissible purposes for which agency dues may be expended, Section 301 must be given a broad reading." Id. at 1000).[7] [7] Additionally, 28 U.S.C. § 1337 has been held to confer jurisdiction on federal district courts for suits alleging the breach of the duty of fair representation despite the doctrine that federal courts, like state courts, have no jurisdiction to adjudicate independently matters either "arguably protected" or "arguably prohibited" by Sections 7 or 8 of the NLRA. See San Diego Building Trades v. Garmon, 359 U.S. 236, 79 S.Ct. 773, 3 L.Ed.2d 775 (1959).

In Street Employees v. Lockridge, 403 U.S. 274, 91 S.Ct. 1909, 29 L.Ed.2d 473 (1971), the Supreme Court in dicta reiterated its prior holding in Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 87 S.Ct. 903, 17 L.Ed.2d 842 (1967)

> "that an action seeking damages for injury inflicted by a breach of a union's duty of fair representation was judicially cognizable in any event, that is, even if the conduct complained of was arguably protected or prohibited by the National Labor Relations Act and whether or not the lawsuit was bottomed on a collective agreement."

Id. at 299, 91 S.Ct. at 1924. This language has led courts to conclude that the exception to the pre-emption doctrine for § 301 suits based on alleged breaches of collective bargaining agreements applies with equal force to a complaint averring a breach of the duty of fair representation under 28 U.S.C. § 1337. See Beriault v. Local 40, Super Cargoes & Checkers, 501 F.2d 258 (9th Cir. 1974).

In the instant action, not only are the rationales for the preemption doctrine inapplicable because the complaint seeks relief for a breach of the duty of fair representation, but the allegation that plaintiff's constitutional rights are infringed render the need to defer to the NLRB's special expertise or the congressionally designed structure for labor policy inappropriate. Jurisdiction under § 1337 vests over this action in conjunction with the applicability of § 301.

The UAW, in addition to seeking dismissal for lack of jurisdiction, has also alleged that the plaintiff's complaint does not afford a basis for relief. Against the plaintiff's assertion of constitutional violations and fair representation claims, the UAW contends that there is no state action and that the Union's policy of paying strike benefits only to those individuals who participate in strike-related activities is a legitimate expenditure of non-members' fees. The UAW also argues that it has not breached any duty owed the plaintiff because its actions do not rise to the level of arbitrary or discriminatory conduct and because plaintiff's employment relationship was unaffected.

The issue of state action presents a close inquiry, necessitating an excursion into the past. Under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C. § 152 Eleventh, Congress explicitly provided for union or agency shops notwithstanding state laws. In Railway Employees Department v. Hanson, 351 U.S. 225, 76 S.Ct. 714, 100 L.Ed. 1112 (1956), the Court held that union security agreements entered into pursuant to this section of the Railway Labor Act were imbued with sufficient governmental conduct to subject the agreement to constitutional guarantees of free speech and association. The Court viewed the congressional enactment as an explicit effort to permit union security clauses, vigorously trumpeting that "the federal statute is the source of the power and authority by which any private rights are lost or sacrificed." Id. at 232, 76 S.Ct. at 718.

The NLRA, however, overrides no state law with respect to agency shop agreements. While the Act permits employers to enter into agreements with unions to establish union or agency shops, Section 8(a)(3), the Labor Management Relations Act, Section 14(b), does not preclude the states' enaction of "right to work" laws which would prohibit union or agency shops. See Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers International Union v. Mobil Oil Co., 426 U.S. 407, 409, 96 S.Ct. 2140, 2142, 48 L.Ed.2d 736 (1976).

Mixed results have emerged from those courts determining whether agency shop provisions such as the one in the instant case constitute state action. In Reid v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 443 F.2d 408 (10th Cir. 1971), it was held that under the NLRA, agency shop provisions did not rise to the level of state action because the Supreme Court's holding in Hanson was restricted to the Railway Labor Act, which specifically overrode state laws prohibiting agency or union shops. The Tenth Circuit noted,

> In NLRA matters, the federal government does not appear to us to have so far insinuated itself into the decision of a union and employer to agree to a union security clause so as to make that choice governmental action for purposes of the first and fifth amendments.

The First Circuit in Linscott v. Millers Falls Co., 440 F.2d 14 (1st Cir.), cert. denied 404 U.S. 872, 92 S.Ct. 77, 30 L.Ed.2d 116 (1971), held that the agency shop provision under Section 14(b) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 164(b), and by implication Section 8(a)(3) of the NLRA, were entered into by unions and employers pursuant to federal authorization and thus were state action, despite the power of the state legislatures to override this authorization by enacting right to work laws. The Court stated,

> If federal support attaches to the union shop if and when two parties agree to it, it is the same support, once it attaches, > even though the consent of a third party, the state, is a precondition. The means by which the agreement is attained does not affect the significant language in Hanson * * * 'The federal statute is the source of the power and authority by which any private rights are lost or sacrificed,' and note 4 appended thereto, '4. Once courts enforce the agreement the sanction of government is, or course, put behind them.'
> 1178

Pa.1980), slip op. at 9 (difference in the effect of the Railway Labor Act and the NLRA on contrary state law regarding agency shop provisions does not change the "congressional imprimatur" placed on such clauses by both statutes). Cf. Beck v. Communication Workers of American, 468 F.Supp. 93 (D.Md. 1979) (court notes attachment of constitutional guarantees to disbursement of fees collected from non-members under an agency shop provision in private and public employment.[8]

Agency shop clauses, the vital creature of Congressional contemplation and enactment, are subject to, and braced by, constitutional guarantees. That the states may vanquish agency shop clause by legislative prohibition does not reduce the effect of the congressional authorization given in Section 8(a)(3). Consider the detail of congressional approval.

> (3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization: Provided, That nothing in this subchapter, or in any other statute of the United States, shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in this subsection as an unfair labor practice) to require as a condition of employment membership therein on or after the thirtieth day following the beginning of such employment or the effective date of such agreement, whichever is the later, (i) if such labor organization is the representative of the employees as provided in section 159(a) of this title, in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made, and (ii) unless following an election held as provided in section 159(e) of this title within one year preceding the effective date of such agreement, the Board shall have certified that at least a majority of the employees eligible to vote in such election have voted to rescind the authority of such labor organization to make such an agreement. Provided further, That no employer shall justify any discrimination against an employee for nonmembership in a labor organization (A) if he has reasonable grounds for believing that such membership was not available to the employee on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to other members, or (B) if he has reasonable grounds for believing that membership was denied or terminated for reasons other than the failure of the employee to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership.

29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3). The Supreme Court in N.L.R.B. v. General Motors Corp., 373 U.S. 734, 83 S.Ct. 1453, 10 L.Ed.2d. 670 (1963), held that § 8(a)(3) was meant to allow agency shop clauses serving "the desire of Congress to reduce the evils of compulsory unionism with allowing financial support for the bargaining agent." Id. at 744, 83 S.Ct. at 1460. There is no doubt that absent § 8(a)(3), agency ship provisions entered into in the normal course of collective bargaining would be private action. But § 8(a)(3) clearly puts the stamp of congressional approval on agency shop clauses. The General Motors decision describes Congress' intent to ensure that employees who remain non-members of the union but who nonetheless accept its benefits pay fees for the union's work on their behalf. Compared to § 8(a)(3), the provision in the LMRA which permits states to pass right to work laws and prohibit agency shops is general and broad, applying to the entire gamut of the LMRA and the NLRA:

> Nothing in this subchapter shall be construed as authorizing the execution or application of agreements requiring membership in a labor orgainzation as a condition of employment in any State or Territory in which such execution or application is prohibited by State or Territorial law.

29 U.S.C. § 164(b).

Plainly, it would be unusual to hold that the authority of state governments over agency shops determines whether the federal statutory authorization in § 8(a)(3) is state action. The governmental action inquiry, instead of focusing on state power or authority, views the conduct at issue and whether it is sanctioned, authorized, or pursued by a governmental entity. Here, Congress not only tolerated but expressly authorized agency shop agreements. This congressional imprimatur is sufficient to imbue agency shop clauses with constitutional guarantees.

[8] In his dissent from the denial of certiorari in Buckley v. American Federation of Television and Radio Artists, 419 U.S. 1093, 95 S.Ct. 688, 42 L.E.d.2d 687 (1975). Justice Douglas, joined by the Chief Justice, noted "When Congress authorizes an employer and union to enter into union shop agreements and makes such agreements binding and enforceable over the dissents of a minority of employees or union members, it has cast the weight of the Federal Government behind the agreements just as surely as if it imposed them by statute."

The question now arises whether the plaintiff has stated a cause of action for the violation of his constitutional rights. Plaintiff contends that UAW's policy of conditioning receipt of strike benefits on picketing activity impairs his freedom of speech and association. In plaintiff's view, he can not be asked to do more, in order to receive strike benefits, than strike; forcing him to pick up a sign and display it publicly constitutes, he asserts, an unwarranted invasion of his freedom not to associate with the UAW and not to speak.[9] The UAW maintains its policy, applied dispassionately to union members and non-members alike, represents a lawful and constitutional choice in that courts have permitted unions to expend fees collected from non-members in any manner the union desires provided it is related to collective bargaining, contract administration, and grievance, adjustment.

In International Association of Machinists v. Street, 367 U.S. 740, 81 S.Ct. 1784, 6 L.Ed.2d. 1141 (1961), the lightning rod of subsequent decisions, the Court held that fees from non-members collected under an agency shop provison entered into by collective bargaining, under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C. § 152 Eleventh, could not be expended to support political causes which the non-member opposes. The Court noted that the use of such funds for political purposes "is not a use which helps defray the expenses of the negotiation or administration of collective agreements, or the expenses entailed in the adjustment of grievances and disputes." Id. at 768, 81 S.Ct. at 1800.

Two years later in Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks v. Allen, 373 U.S. 113, 83 S.Ct. 1158, 10 L.Ed.2d 235 (1963), addressing some of the practical problems in formulating remedies for improper expenditures of non-members fees the Court found improper an injunction restraining unions from collecting the non-members fees if the union could demonstrate that some of the money was allocated for expenses germane to collective bargaining. A dissenting employee, however, could seek and obtain a refund for portions of his fee spent on policital causes under a formula agreed to by the union and the employee or, in the absence of an agreement, under a proportion ordered by the Court.

More recently, in Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209, 97 S.Ct. 1782, 52 L.Ed.2d 261 (1977), the Court examined an agency shop agreement involving union of public employees whereby non-members were required to pay a fee to defray expenses from which they benefitted. The plaintiffs challenged the agency shop provision as violative of their First Amendment freedoms and contended that the union was engaged in unlawful expenditure of their fees for political and ideological causes with which they disagreed. On a motion for summary judgment, the Michigan courts had upheld the validity of the agency shop clause generally, and denied plaintiffs any relief on the issue of how their fees were spent because they did not object initially to the union about political contributions initially. In vacating that judgment the Supreme Court determined that the union and the employer could not compel dissenting non-union members to contribute to the support of ideological causes that they may oppose, but that the public employee union, as a condition of employment, could direct payment of fees to be expended on matters related to collective bargaining, contract administration, and grievance adjustment. The Court declared.

> To be required to help finance the union as a collective-bargaining agent might well be thought, therefore, to interfere in some way with an employee's freedom to associate for the advancement of ideas, or to refrain from doing so, as he sees fit. But the judgment clearly made in Hanson and Street is that such interference as exists is constitutionally justified by the legislative assessment of the important contribution of the union shop to the system of labor relations established by Congress.

Id. at 222, 97 S.Ct. at 1793 (footnote omitted).

From the pleadings presented, the plaintiff clearly states a cause of action for the union's alleged violation of his constitutional rights. Street, Allen and Abood, although permitting unions to exact funds from protesting non-members to defray expenses related to collective bargaining, do not authorize a union to compel non-members who have honored the picket line to participate in affirmative picketing activity in order to receive strike benefits to which they have contributed under the agency shop clause. Although picketing is a substantial post in the protective fence of a union's collective bargaining activity, it is by no means clear that UAW's policy of conditioning a non-member's receipt of strike benefits can survive the sturdy design of constitutional craftsmanship. At first blush, it appears unfair to permit plaintiff to receive material benefits equal to those offered to union members while those members toil the picket line and plaintiff merely remains absent from work. To require plaintiff, however, to carry a placard, in full public view, bespeaks an activism that raises significant constitutional quandries. To claim that collective bargaining activity may immunize a union against all requirements that it may impose on non-members under an agency shop provision would obscure the venerable principles of American jurisprudence. It is the individual's constitutional guarantees that fix the boundaries of a balanced adjudication of conflict inherent with agency shop presence. Plaintiff is entitled to raise his First Amendment interests in order to attack UAW's method of apportioning strike benefits, and the UAW cannot seek refuge from those interests merely by claiming that its activity is related to collective bargaining.

[9] "[R]ights to associate with X are necessarily rights to dissociate from Y." L. Tribe, American Constitution Law § 15–8 at 974 (1978).

The final issue remaining is whether the plaintiff has stated a non-constitutional claim for breach of the duty of fair representation. The UAW argues that the duty does not extend to matters such as the instant case because it does not affect the plaintiff's employment relationship; even were the duty to apply, no breach has occurred. Plaintiff disputes both points, maintaining that the fair representation is just as forcefully applicable here as in Abood, Street, Allen, Seay, and Beck.

Initially recognized by the Supreme Court in Steele v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad, 323 U.S. 192, 65 S.Ct. 226, 89 L.Ed. 173 (1944), the duty of fair representation obliges the union "to serve the interest of all members without hostility or discrimination toward any, to exercise its discretion with complete good faith and honesty, and to avoid arbitrary conduct." Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 177, 87 S.Ct. 903, 910, 17 L.Ed.2d 892 (1967). The NLRB in Miranda Fuel Co., Inc., 140 N.L.R.B. 181 (1962), held that § 7 of the NLRA gives employees "the right to be free from unfair or irrelevant or invidious treatment by their exclusive bargaining agent in matters affecting their employment," and "that Section 8(a)(1)(A) of the Act accordingly prohibits labor organizations, when acting in a statutory representative capacity, from taking action against any employee upon considerations or classifications which are irrelevant, invidious, or unfair." Id. at 185.

It cannot be said at this time that the plaintiff has presented no valid cause of action for breach of this duty. Plaintiff is compelled to pay the fees to the UAW or else the employer must discharge him or face an unfair labor practice charge under § 8(a)(1). Plaintiff objects to the manner in which the union expends that portion of his fees allocated for strike benefits. Moreover, it does not appear that the Union has prevailed on its claim that, assuming all of the pleadings are true, it has not acted in a manner that is unfair, that discriminated against non-members individiously, or that is in bad faith.

Although the controversy between the plaintiff and the UAW is before the Court only on the motion of the UAW to dismiss, it appears that, as the plaintiff notes in his opposition to the defendants' motions, "the facts are largely undisputed." Pl.Opp. at 13. Entry of summary judgment may well have been appropriate at this stage. The Federal Rules for Civil Procedure, however, require that the parties be given an opportunity to file appropriate affidavits as well as any supplementary points and authorities before summary judgment is awarded. For the remaining parties to supplement the record with the necessary material in accordance with Fed.R.Civ.P. 56 cannot be too burdensome a task since the principal legal authority for this action has already been presented in the context of the instant motion. Accordingly, the parties will be set on a rapid schedule of filings to propel this litigation to fitting conclusion.

NLRB v. Living and Learning Centers, Inc.

652 F.2d 209 (1st Cir.), June 23, 1981—251 NLRB 284

On petition to enforce Board Order

WYZANSKI, Senior District Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) petitions for enforcement of its order directing Living and Learning Centers, Inc., (the Employer) to bargain with and supply information to Local 925 Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC (the Union). § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act); 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5) and (1). The Employer opposes the petition principally because it challenges the NLRB's determination that the Employer's teachers, teacher assistants, cooks and maintenance employees at the Waltham, Massachusetts child's day care center (Waltham Center) constituted an appropriate unit under § 9(b) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 159(b).

On June 6, 1979 the Union filed a petition asking that the NLRB, pursuant to § 9(b) of the Act, certify it as the representative of the Company's Waltham center teachers, teacher assistants, cooks and maintenance employees. After a hearing before an officer appointed by him, the NLRB's Regional Director made the following findings.

The Employer is a Massachusetts corporation engaged in the operation of day care centers in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and New Hampshire * * *.

The Petitioner seeks a unit limited to teachers, teacher assistants, cooks and maintenance employees employed at the Employer's Waltham, Massachusetts day care center. This unit consists of approximately 19 employees. There is no history of collective bargaining in this unit.

The Employer concedes the appropriateness of the job classifications sought by the Petitioner, but contends that the only appropriate unit is one including all 29 of its day care centers in Massachusetts, or, alternatively, all of its day care centers in Massachusetts, Rhode Island (one center), Connecticut (seven centers), and New Hampshire (one center).

The Employers' executive headquarters are located in Waltham, Massachusetts and occupy a separate floor in the building which houses the day care center, which is the subject of the instant petition.

Each day care center has a director, an assistant director, a cook and a maintenance man. The number of teachers and teacher assistants varies with the size of the enrollment at the individual day care center. There are approximately 2,500 children enrolled in the Employer's day care centers in Massachusetts and approximately 400 teachers and teacher assistants.

The children enrolled at the Employer's day care centers range from 6 months to 6 years in age. As well as being custodial, all of the Employer's day care centers have an educational curriculum. "I am! I can!," a 340 page folio-sized handbook sets forth the Employer's philosophy of child care and details methods and techniques of instruction. Once every four to six weeks all the directors of the Massachusetts centers meet with the executive officers at the Waltham, Massachusetts headquarters. At this meeting the executive officers indicate the methods of presentation of the monthly "themes," which are general concepts such as "round and red" and "person" and which are the same for all centers, in terms of the "I am! I can!" viewpoint and techniques. The directors are then responsible, without effective supervision from the Waltham, Massachusetts headquarters, to see that these "themes" are developed by the teachers and teacher assistants in consonance with the "framework" provided by the executive officers at the above meetings. While the record does not reveal with specificity the nature of the instructions which the directors receive at these meetings, they would appear to be general in nature from the fact that it is the teaching staff which initially prepares the weekly plan of instruction and activity for the current theme, subject to subsequent director approval, and it is expected that different centers may present a theme in an entirely different way. While two copies of the "I am! I can!" handbook are available at each center, the teachers and teacher assistants are not required to read it.

*Of the District of Massachusetts, sitting by designation.

Each center director has authority to hire and discharge the teachers, teacher assistants, cooks and maintenance employees; to schedule their hours and to approve their sick days, personal days and leaves of absences. However, in practice the directors first consult with the Waltham, Massachusetts headquarters in the great majority of discharge cases. The director is also empowered to resolve disputes among center employees, although he may, but is not required to, ask the area supervisor to intervene if the dispute involves the teaching staff and the director or assistant director. While each director reports to one of four area supervisors at the Waltham, Massachusetts headquarters, the presence of these are [sic] supervisors at the center locations and their contact with the employees in the unit job classifications is minimal.

The Employer holds "workshops" which teachers and teacher assistants from all the centers may attend at their own discretion. The record does not disclose the frequency of such workshops, nor the degree of participation in them by teachers and teacher assistants.

Of teachers presently employed at the Waltham, Massachusetts center, none has been transferred from other day care centers. Three teachers presently employed at other centers have been transferred from the Waltham, Massachusetts center. The total of presently employed transferred teachers from all centers in Massachusetts is 25.

The Employer has a centrally estblished single wage and benefit policy for all its Massachusetts centers. Wages range from the legal minimum to $3.25 per hour. The only benefit is three days of sick leave per year. No wage increase for any employee may be granted to any employee without approval from the Employer's headquarters. However, the directors are authorized to recommend wage increases for individual employees working under their direction.

Under a single contract, the Massachusetts Department of Public Welfare pays, on a uniform basis, some percentage (undisclosed on the record) of approximately one third of the children enrolled in the Massachusetts center. Pursuant to the licensing of day care centers, the Massachusetts Office for Children sets minimum standards as to teacher qualifications, the teacher/student ratio, and health requirements.

Payroll information is assembled at the individual centers and forwarded to the Waltham, Massachusetts headquarters, from which the employees' paychecks are then sent out.

All major purchases and financial transactions are decided at the Waltham, Massachusetts headquarters.

The Board has held that a single-plant, or single-store, unit is presumptively appropriate absent * * * "a functional integration so severe as to negate the identity of a single-plant, or a single-store unit." Gray Drug Stores, Inc., 197 NLRB 924, 925 (1972). Based upon the above, it is found that the degree of the Employer's control of personnel policies and the extent of integration of the operations of the Massachusetts centers is insufficient to overcome the presumption in the present case. This conclusion is based on the infrequent interchange and communication among the employees of the various centers and the separate immediate supervision by the director, who hires and may fire the center employees and is alone responsible on a day-to-day basis for the direction of their work and the resolution of their disputes. Accordingly, a unit limited to the Waltham, Massachusetts location is found to be appropriate. Haag Drug Company, Incorporated, 169 NLRB 877, 879 (1968); Purity Food Stores, Inc. (Sav-More Food Stores), 150 NLRB 1523, 1527 (1965).

Upon the basis of his findings, the Regional Director ordered an election. The Board denied the Employer's request for review. The union won the election and the NLRB certified it as the representative of the teachers, teacher assistants, cooks and maintenance employees at the Waltham Center.

On February 26, 1980 the Union asked the Employer for specified information for the purpose of preparing contract proposals. The Employer refused on the ground that the unit certified by the NLRB was not an appropriate one. On April 7, 1980 the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging that the Employer had violated § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union and by refusing to furnish relevant information. The Employer's answer, in addition to challenging the unit determination, denied that its activities so affected interstate commerce as to subject it to the Act, and alleged that it was without knowledge that the Union was a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

In response to a motion of the NLRB's General Counsel, the NLRB entered a summary judgment and found that the Employer had violated § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Thereafter, the NLRB filed this petition. We rule against the Employer on all the issues raised in the Employer's answers referred to in the previous paragraph.

1. The NLRB's jurisdiction to determine an appropriate unit for collective bargaining—see 29 U.S.C. § 159(c)—and its jurisdiction to prevent any person from engaging in an unfair labor practice—see 29 U.S.C. § 160(a)—alike depend on whether the matter is one "affecting commerce." That term "did vest in the Board the fullest jurisdictional breadth constitutionally permissible under the Commerce Clause." NLRB v. Reliance Fuel Oil Corp., 371 U.S. 224, 226, 83 S.Ct. 312, 313, 9 L.Ed.2d 279 (1963). The NLRB had jurisdiction to issue the order here involved both because the employer had a gross annual income in excess of $250,000—see NLRB v. Kent County Ass'n for Retarded Citizens, 590 F.2d 19, 23–24 (1st Cir. 1978)—and because it annually shipped and received goods valued in excess of $2,000 to or from Massachusetts. Fairview Nursing Home, 202 NLRB 318, 319 enforced mem., 486 F.2d 1400 (5th Cir. 1973), cert. den., 419 U.S. 827, 95 S.Ct. 46, 42 L.Ed.2d 51 (1974); Von Solbrig Hospital, Inc. v. NLRB 465 F.2d 465 F.2d 173, 174 (7th Cir. 1972); NLRB v. Inglewood Park Cemetery Association, 355 F.2d 448, 451 (9th Cir.), cert. den., 384 U.S. 951, 86 S.Ct. 1572, 16 L.Ed.2d 548 (1966); NLRB v. Aurora City Lines, Inc., 299 F.2d 229, 231 (7th Cir. 1962).

2. The testimony of the Union's business agent supported the finding of the Regional Director that the Union is a "Labor organization" within the meaning of § 2(5) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(5).

3. We reject the Employer's challenge to the NLRB's unit determination.

The "selection of an appropriate bargaining unit lies largely within the discretion of the Board, whose decision, 'if not final, is rarely to be disturbed.' Packard Motor Car Co. v. NLRB, 330 U.S. 485, 491, 67 S.Ct. 789, 793, 91 L.Ed. 1040 (1947)." Big Y Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 651 F.2d 40 (1st Cir. 1981); South Prairie Construction Co. v. Local No. 627, (1967) (per curiam) 425 U.S. 800, 805, 96 S.Ct. 1842, 1844, 48 L.Ed.2d 382.

Here the NLRB determined that unit including all the employees (except "managerial employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act") working at a particular center was appropriate. The Employer can succeed in overturning that determination only by demonstrating that that determination was "clearly not appropriate," not merely by showing that some other determination would have been better. Banco Credito y Ahorro v. NLRB, 390 F.2d 110, 112 (1st Cir.), cert. den., 393 U.S. 832, 89 S.Ct. 101, 21 L.Ed.2d 102 (1968).

Even without the aid of any presumption, the NLRB's decision is at the least plausible. It does not smack of a gerrymander. See S.D. Warren Co. v. NLRB, 353 F.2d 494, 498 (1st Cir. 1965). Like a "plant" unit—which is a unit specifically contemplated by § 9(b)—a "center" unit is a natural or geographically based subdivision of an employer's employees. It immediately seems to be an appropriate unit because there is apt to be a bond of interest among all the persons employed by the same employer in connection with the same enterprise at the same locus. This, of course, does not mean that there may not be other appropriate, and more inclusive units which would also be appropriate, and which, for reasons of administrative or managerial efficiency, may be preferred by an employer. However, as we held in the Banco Credito case, it is not sufficient for the employer to persuade us that a systems-wide unit would be more appropriate than a single center unit; the employer must show that the single center unit is "clearly not appropriate." Moreover, the NLRB is entitled to give greater weight to the interests of the employees in the Waltham Center than to the Employer's managerial interests in a multi-center unit. In the Big Y case supra we quoted with approval the following holding of NLRB v. The Western and Southern Life Ins. Co., 391 F.2d 119, 123 (3d Cir. 1978):

> "* * * the overriding policy of the Act is in favor of the interest in employees to be represented by a representative of their own choosing for the purpose of collective bargaining, and the Board was entitled to give this interest greater weight than that accorded to the employer in bargaining with the largest, and presumably most convenient possible unit * * *."

In deciding this case, the Regional Director's opinion was guided by a rebuttable presumption which the NLRB had adopted in 1968. Rejecting its own earlier views, the NLRB, upon the basis of its increasing experience, formally adopted a presumption that a single facility unit in a chain of units is an appropriate unit even though the employer administered from one headquarters labor relations, personnel, and other aspects of all the units in the chain.

Haag Drug Co., 169 NLRB 877 (1968). See Gray Drugstores, Inc., 197 NLRB 924, 925 (1972). Inasmuch as the presumption is consistent with the Act, has, like a "plant" unit, a rational foundation, and is founded on experience, the NLRB was entitled to invoke the presumption in this case. NLRB v. Baptist Hospital, 442 U.S. 773, 787, 99 S.Ct. 2598, 2606, 61 L.Ed.2d 251 (1979); Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483, 501, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 2473, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978); Big Y Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, supra. It had the effect of shifting to the challenger the burden of proof. NLRB v. Baptist Hospital, Inc., supra, 442 U.S. 781, 99 S.Ct. 2603.

In the instant case the presumption was strengthened by the showing that the director of the Waltham Center had the power to hire and fire employees (even though he customarily checked with headquarters before he dismissed an employee); that the director determined the precise times at which an employee should work; that the director was empowered to resolve disputes at the center; that the employees (not including the director) at the Waltham Center had not been transferred from elsewhere in the chain; that they had no regular, frequent contacts with employees elsewhere in the chain;[1] and that the Waltham Center was not in close geographical proximity to most of the other centers.

The significant evidence relied upon by the Employer to rebut the presumption was considered by the Regional Director in his decision. He referred to items such as these: that headquarters established a single wage and benefit policy for all its Massachusetts centers and decided just what each employee should be paid; that all major purchases and financial transactions were conducted at headquarters; that the directors of the Waltham Center and other centers were subject to area supervisors; that Massachusetts standards for teachers were the same in each unit of the chain; that contributions by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to welfare children throughout the whole chain were covered by a single contract; and that there were opportunities for the teachers to go to workships open to teachers from different centers. Other matters to which the Employer refers but to which the Regional Director did not refer were not of critical significance (e. g., tuition, transfer of directors, uniform use throughout the chain of a booklet setting forth the Employer's personnel policies, and the teacher's right of appeal to headquarters from the action of a director settling a conflict).

The analysis which we have made of the Regional Director's decision shows that, unlike the situation in NLRB v. Purity Food Stores, Inc., 354 F.2d 926, 930 (1st Cir 1965) and NLRB v. Purity Food Stores, Inc., 376 F.2d 497, 501 (1st Cir.) cert. den. 389 U.S. 959, 88 S.Ct. 337, 19 L.Ed.2d 368 (1967), the NLRB gave fair and reasonable consideration to the relevant factors in determining that the Waltham Center was an appropriate unit. As we recently said in Big Y Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, supra,

> " * * * all that we as a reviewing court are authorized to consider is whether the administrative agency failed to give fair and reasonable consideration to the relevant factors; the weight assigned by the agency to each factor it has fairly considered is a matter for it to determine. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 488 [71 S.Ct. 456, 464, 95 L.Ed. 456] (1951); Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power v. NRDC, 435 U.S. 519, 558 [98 S.Ct. 1197, 1219, 55 L.Ed.2d 460] (1978); Strycker's Bay Neighborhood Council v. Karlen, 444 U.S. 223, 227–228 [100 S.Ct. 497, 499–500, 62 L.Ed.2d 433] (1980)."

We are not unmindful that there are cases in which courts have set aside NLRB determinations that single units in a large chain were not appropriate units on the ground that in those cases the local managers lacked authority to decide the kind of issues which are the usual subject of collective bargains. E. g. NLRB v. Solis Theatre Corp., 403 F.2d 381, 383 (2d Cir. 1968); NLRB v. Davis Cafeteria, Inc., 396 F.2d 18, 21 (5th Cir. 1968); NLRB v. Frisch's Big Boy Ill-Mar, Inc., 356 F.2d 895, 897 (7th Cir. 1966). Those decisions do not apply to this case because here the local managers did have authority to resolve some collective bargaining issues—for example, discharges, disputes, hiring of new employees, and assignments of working hours. Moreover, as is acknowledged in NLRB v. Solis Theatre Corp., supra, those cases do not stand for an absolute proposition that the NLRB may never determine that a local unit in a chain enterprise is an appropriate unit unless the NLRB finds that the manager of the local unit has authority to decide collective bargaining issues. To lay down such an absolute rule would enable an employer, by centralizing all matters of labor policy, to prevent the NLRB from selecting as appropriate a unit of smaller dimensions than the employer's whole enterprise even though that smaller unit was the one which in light of all the relevant factors the NLRB determined would be appropriate under § 9(b) "in order to assure to employees the fullest freedom in exercising the rights guaranteed by" the Act.

In a case where a local manager had no authority finally to decide collective bargaining issues, but the NLRB had given the absence of such authority and all other relevant factors full and fair consideration, we sustained the NLRB's determination that a local branch unit was appropriate. Banco Credito y Ahorro v. NLRB, supra. That case is more than adequate authority to sustain the order of the NLRB in the instant case, particularly in light of the 1968 presumption which shifts the burden of proof.

PETITION GRANTED.

Marriott In-Flite Services, a Division of Marriott Corporation v. NLRB

652 F.2d 202 (1st Cir.), June 23, 1981—252 NLRB 707

On petition to review and set aside Board Order

Before CAMPBELL BOWNES and BREYER, Circuit Judges

203

BOWNES, Circuit Judge: Petitioner Marriott In-Flite Services, a division of the Marriott Corporation, has petitioned us to review and set aside an order of respondent National Labor Relations Board requiring Marriott In-Flight to bargain collectively with intervenor Teamsters Local Union No. 25 as the exclusive bargaining representative of a unit composed of transportation department employees at the company's East Boston facility. The Board has requested that we enforce its order. For the reasons stated below, we deny the petition of Marriott In-Flite and enforce the order of the National Labor Relations Board.

204

I.

Marriott In-Flite operates a food and beverage catering service for airlines[1] out of a facility at Logan International Airport in East Boston, Massachusetts. On February 12, 1980, Teamsters Local Union No. 25, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, filed a representation petition with the Board seeking certification as the collective bargaining representative of the food and equipment handlers, food and equipment helpers, coordinators, and autombile mechanics employed in Marriott In-Flite's transportation department in East Boston, some 84 employees. Marriott In-Flite urged that the Board endorse a plant-wide production and maintenance unit comprising approximately 254 employees, including not only the employees of the transportation department, but also such groups as cooks, chefs, lead porters, storekeepers, and utility/sanitation employees. Following a hearing conducted by a hearing officer of the Board, the Acting Regional Director found an appropriate unit[2] to be

---

[1] Marriott In-Flite also services an area hospital.

[2] In his Decision and Direction of Election, the Acting Regional Director noted that the East Boston facility has two locations: the production facility at One Wood Island Park and a storage and garage facility about 2.4 miles away from One Wood Island Park at Jeffries Street, where major vehicle repairs are made. All employees are permanently assigned to One Wood Island Park.

> [a]ll transportation department employees of the Employer located at its One Wood Island Park, East Boston, Massachusetts facility including food and equipment handlers, helpers, coordinators and auto mechanics but excluding all other commisary [sic] employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act. (footnotes omitted).

Marriott In-Flite then filed a Request for Review of this unit determination, arguing again that a plant-wide unit was appropriate. This request was denied and an election was held; the union won by a vote of 48 to 35[3] and was certified on May 16, 1980, as the exclusive bargaining representative for the handlers, helpers, coordinators, and automobile mechanics. In order to test this certification, Marriott In-Flite refused to bargain with the union. As a result, the Regional Director filed a complaint charging that the actions of Marriott In-Flite constituted unfair labor practices within the meaning of §§ 8(a)(1)[4] and (5)[5] of the National Labor Relations Act. The Board transferred the case to itself, found that Marriott In-Flite had violated §§ 8(a)(1) and (5), and issued the order contested here.

II.

The Board's authority to determine an appropriate unit for collective bargaining stems from § 9(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, which provides that:

> The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to assure to employees the fullest freedom in exercising the rights guaranteed by this subchapter, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or subdivision thereof[.]

29 U.S.C. § 159(b). The Supreme Court has noted that § 9(b) > confers upon the Board a broad discretion to determine appropriate units * * *. Our power of review also is circumscribed by the provision that findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive * * *. So we have power only to determine whether there is substantial evidence to support the Board, or its order oversteps the law.

> * * * The issue as to what unit is appropriate for bargaining is one for which no absolute rule of law is laid down by statute, and none should be by decision. It involves of necessity a large measure of informed discretion, and the decision of the Board, if not final, is rarely to be disturbed.

Packard Motor Car Co. v. NLRB, 330 U.S. 485, 491, 67 S.Ct. 789, 793, 91 L.Ed. 1040 (1947) (citations omitted).[6] Under § 9(b), the unit need not be the only appropriate unit or the most appropriate unit; it must only be an appropriate unit. E.g., NLRB v. J.C. Penney Co., 620 F.2d 718, 719 (9th Cir. 1980); MPC Restaurant Corp. v. NLRB, 481 F.2d 75, 78 (2d Cir. 1973); see Banco Credito y Ahorro Ponceno v. NLRB, 390 F.2d 110, 112 (1st cir.) (per curiam) (employer must show unit designated by Board is clearly not appropriate), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 832, 89 S.Ct. 101, 21 L.Ed.2d 102 (1968). We may overturn the Board's § 9(b) unit determination only if the determination is not supported by substantial evidence, if its basis has not been disclosed, if it is in violation of the Act or some other statute or the Constitution, or if it is arbitrary or unreasonable. Big Y Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 651 F.2d 40, 44 (1st Cir. 1981).

III.

In order to apply the law properly in this case, we must describe the organization and operation of the East Boston facility in some detail. Testimony at the hearing established that production at Marriott In-Flite begins when the storekeepers receive merchandise and funnel it to holding or storage areas. Production consists of both hot and cold food processing areas; the former is staffed by chefs, lead cooks, and cooks, and both are staffed by station attendants who prepare and package all but the simplest [7] meals or snacks, place the meals or snacks on trays, arrange the trays on carriers, and move the carriers to designated holding areas. The remainder of the production department encompasses utility employees, who wash equipment and utensils from flights; porters, who perform janitorial jobs; house mechanics, who repair production equipment and perform such chores as simple painting, plumbing, and building maintenance; and dispatchers, who are responsible for obtaining passenger counts from the airlines and, when feasible, for notifying the food department and the handlers of these counts.

[3] Seven ballots were challenged; this number was insufficient to affect the outcome of the election.

[4] Section 8(a)(1) provides:

> (a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—
> (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title[.]

29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

[5] Under § 8(a)(5) it is an unfair labor practice for an employer "to refuse to bargain collectively with the representative of his employees." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5).

[6] Although Congress effectively overruled the Supreme Court's holding in Packard Motor Car Co. v. NLRB, 330 U.S. 685, 67 S.Ct. 789, 91 L.Ed. 1040 (1947), that foremen could organize into a unit for purposes of collective bargaining, Packard is still cited for the proposition that the Board's selection of an appropriate bargaining unit is rarely to be disturbed. See, for example, South Prairie Constr. Co. v. Local No. 627, International Union of Operating Engr's, 425 U.S. 800, 805, 96 S.Ct. 1842, 1844, 48 L.Ed.2d 382 (1976) (per curiam).

The transportation department, which the Board found to be an appropriate bargaining unit, is, as noted, composed of handlers, helpers, coordinators, and auto mechanics. Handlers [8] and helpers, who work in two-person teams, are responsible for servicing the flights. After learning the passenger counts for the flights that they will stock, a handler and helper pick up the previously-packed carriers at the handling areas, assemble utensils, liquor, and ice as needed, place the material on dollies, and wheel the dollies onto the loading dock where they load their vehicle. From the dock, the team drives to the airport terminals and loads the planes with food and clean equipment.[9] While on the airfield the team will often strip aircraft of used utensils and equipment. The distance to the terminals from Marriott In-Flite's facility varies from one-half mile to almost two miles; maximum driving time is eight to ten minutes. After completing their work on the field, the handler and helper return to Marriott In-Flite to unload the soiled equipment, transport it to the dirty equipment area, and report to dispatch for new passenger counts.

The second component of the transportation department, the coordinators, check the loads while they are on the dock to ensure that they are complete and often check with the airlines to ensure that they are satisfied. As their title suggests, these employees coordinate loading with the gate agents and, on some occasions, stand by to see if it will be necessary to add meals. They are also responsible for setting up their own "bank meals," usually previously packed by a production shift, to cover a possible shortfall of meals on a flight. Certain helpers and handlers known as "bankmen" also stand by to add or remove meals from planes, supplying what is necessary from the small trucks that they drive.

The auto mechanics, who are responsible for maintaining the department's vehicles, work either at the Jeffries Street location or in a maintenance area adjacent to the loading dock at One Wood Island Park.

IV.

To support their respective positions, each party stresses different characteristics of the One Wood Island Park operation. Marriott In-Flite points out that all employees are paid by the hour, receive the same overtime premiums, are entitled to the same fringe benefits and vacation leave as determined by the company's corporate headquarters, punch in on the same time clock, receive their uniforms from their employer, and are provided meals in the same cafeteria. The facility is under one general manager, although it appears undisputed that a single operations manager has exclusive responsibility for the handlers, helpers, coordinators, and mechanics. The employer emphasizes that the handlers, helpers, and coordinators spend 50% or more of their time working inside the facility alongside the excluded employees, moving through all parts of the kitchen, assembling and in some cases preparing certain foods and drinks, and handling airline utensils and equipment. They share with the sanitation workers responsibility for cleaning the dock area and removing equipment and food from the trucks when they return from the airfield and also come into contact with these workers when collecting clean equipment from the sanitation area. Marriott

[7] William Thompson, the operations manager at the East Boston facility, testified that handlers or supervisors pack some very simple snacks into the carriers themselves.

[8] Thompson testified that the employees responsible for the paperwork and inventory in the liquor service are carried as handlers because of the degree of their responsibility, although they do not drive or even travel to the airfield.

[9] Thompson estimated that a team would service as few as one or as many as four flights per trip and that on average each team would make two to four trips a day to the field.

In-Flite argues that the work of the handlers, helpers, and coordinators is an integral part of the production process.

The Board stresses that the handler, helpers, and coordinators spend approximately 50% of their work day away from Marriott In-Flite's kitchen facilities, and the rest of their work day loading and unloading their trucks or monitoring the loading process. Their presence in the facility's kitchen and their contact with the other employees is characterized as sporadic and incidental to their driving function. Similarly, the automobile mechanics have little contact and no job function overlap with employees not in the unit. Food and equipment handlers, coordinators, mechanics, and some helpers are licensed by the agency that operates the airport to drive onto the airfield. Most of the handlers and coordinators are also issued a license by one of the airlines that Marriott In-Flite services. Unlike other employees, the members of the transportation department must wear photo identification.

Employees in the designated unit also have substantially higher wages than all nonunit employees but chefs, cooks, and in-house mechanics,[10] and generally are promoted separately, undergo special training not required of other employees, bid for work schedules with priority based on transportation department seniority, and often deal directly with representatives from the employer's airline accounts. Only 10% to 20% of the helpers were hired from the food production department; most were new employees.[11] Interchange between these and other facility employees is minimal; only two porters have been trained to substitute as helpers in an emergency.

V.

In determining an appropriate unit, the Board evaluates considerations that tend to show the presence or absence of a community of interest among the employees in the requested unit, including the common experience, duties, wages, hours, and other working conditions of the employees, the organization of the business, and any history of collective bargaining. E. H. Koester Bakery Co., 136 N.L.R.B. 1006, 1009 (1962). Because most of the members of the transportation department spend a substantial amount of their time driving or riding on trucks, both parties agree that the analysis set forth in Koester to deal with the dual community of interest that often distinguishes truckdrivers from other classifications of employees is appropriate.[12] In Koester the Board stated that:

> In our evaluation we shall consider, among others, the following factors: (1) Whether they [the employees] have related or diverse duties, mode of compensation, hours, supervision, and other conditions of employment; and (2) whether they are engaged in the same or related production process or operation, or spend a substantial portion of their time in such production or adjunct activities. If the interests shared with other employees are sufficient to warrant their inclusion, we shall include the truckdrivers in the more comprehensive unit. If, on the other hand, truckdrivers are shown to have such a diversity of interest from those of other employees as to negate any mutuality of interest between the two groups, we shall exclude them.

Id. at 1011.

Here the Board took official notice of the record below, including the stenographic recording of the

---

[10] Thompson testified to the following starting pay rates for Marriott In-Flite employees:

Station attendant, hot or cold food	$3.70/hr.
Porter	3.70/hr.
Utility/sanitation employee	3.70/hr.
Dispatcher	4.00/hr.
Lead porter or utility/sanitation employee	4.00/hr.
Helper	4.25/hr.
Handler	4.85/hr.
Coordinator	5.20/hr.
Auto mechanic	6.05/hr.
In-house mechanic	6.05/hr.
Cook	4.70/hr.
Chef	6.50/hr.

[11] Thompson noted that, because it acquired a new account and because another account expanded its operation, Marriott In-Flite had hired a substantially greater number of helpers recently than it would have hired under normal circumstances.

[12] Marriott In-Flite cites both Koester and Kalamazoo Paper Box Co., 136 N.L.R.B. 134 (1962), as "guiding principles" for determining the unit placement of truckdrivers. Although the considerations listed by the Board in Kalamazoo do not vary to any great extent from those outlined in Koester, we believe that, because Kalamazoo concerned the attempted severance of truckdrivers from an existing production and maintenance unit with a history of bargaining with the employer, Koester is more apposite to this case.

hearing and the decision of the Acting Regional Director. In his Decision and Direction of Election, the Acting Regional Director considered just such factors, discussing the duties of all the employees, particularly those of the members of the transportation department, the method of compensating the employees, the supervision of the designated unit, the separate method of promotion and job assignment in the new unit, and the special training required of its members. On the basis of these and other considerations, the Acting Regional Director found that the employees of the transportation department comprised a homogeneous group sharing a community of interest distinct from that of other employees at Marriott In-Flite's East Boston facility.

Although the facts in this case are close and although we might not decide upon the same unit based upon these facts, the Board's unit determination involved "a large measure of informed discretion" and is supported by substantial evidence; it should not be disturbed. Packard Motor Car Co. v. NLRB, 330 U.S. at 491, 67 S.Ct. at 793 (1947).[13]

VI.

In a further effort to undermine the decision of the Board, Marriott In-Flite claims that the Board abused its discretion when making this unit determination by giving controlling weight to the extent of unionization by the intervenor union, an emphasis specifically forbidden by 29 U.S.C. § 159(c)(5), which states that the extent to which the employees have organized shall not be controlling in determining whether a unit is appropriate under 29 U.S.C. § 159(b).

However, we find little to indicate that the Board took into account the extent of the unionization, let alone gave this factor controlling significance. See. Beck Corp. v. NLRB, 590 F.2d 290, 293 (9th Cir. 1978) (per curiam) (Board can consider extent to which employees have organized). The Acting Regional Director's opinion makes no mention of the extent of the unionization, and in our review of his opinion and of the record, we have found nothing to substantiate Marriott In-Flite's charge. In fact, the only basis for this claim is the employer's contention that a consideration of all the factory involved does not support the Board's unit determination; we have already rejected this argument.

---

[13] We do not view the Acting Regional Director's reliance on National Caterers of New York, Inc., 129 N.L.R.B. 699 (1960), with quite the alarm exhibited by Marriott In-Flite. National Caterers presents a factual situation very similar to the one at hand. In National Caterers the Teamsters sought to represent flight equipment handlers and their helpers employed by Caterers, a subsidiary of Hot Shoppes, Inc., in a single unit. Another union sought to represent all production employees of the same employer. The employer contended that only a unit composed of all its own and another local subsidiary's employees was appropriate. Id. at 700.

Because National Caterers was decided before Koester, the Board was obviously not able to utilize specifically Koester's analysis in its decision. In deciding that a separate unit for handlers and helpers was appropriate, however, the Board discussed the duties of the handlers and helpers, noting that they spent approximately one hour per work day driving, four hours loading and unloading trucks, and three hours in the employer's facilities performing such tasks as preparing ice, packing ice cream into bulk containers, and placing packaged food items on carrying trays. The Board also considered that handlers were paid a substantially higher hourly rate than all employees but the cooks, worked a longer day than food production employees, id. at 702, that all employees except handlers and helpers were interchanged, id. at 700–01, but that all employees were under common supervision. Id. at 700. The Board specifically mentioned that, although handlers and helpers did on occasion perform certain kitchen tasks, these were ordinarily performed by food production employees. Id. at 702.

Thus it is apparent that the Board in National Caterers did in effect use the analysis outlined by Koester for determining the appropriate unit for truckdrivers. We note that the facts in the case sub judice point even more compellingly to a finding that a unit composed only of transportation department employees is appropriate.

Marriott In-Flite requests that we take judicial notice of the Board's determinations in other Marriott Corporation cases. We see no reason to do so, because we do not believe that the Board's unit determinations for other Marriott In-Flite facilities have any particular bearing on this case. In Marriott In-Flite Services, 188 N.L.R.B. 452 (1971), the union wished to represent all eligible employees at the employer's Friendship Airport facility near Baltimore, Maryland. The Board determined that this was an appropriate unit, rejecting Marriott In-Flite's contention that its employees at its National Airport and Dulles International Airport operations, located 37 miles and 59 miles away respectively from Friendship, in Virginia, should also be included in the unit.

Similarly in Marriott In-Flite Services, 192 N.L.R.B. 379 (1979), the unions sought to represent kitchen employees at Marriott In-Flite's facilities at John F. Kennedy Airport (two kitchens) and La Guardia Airport (one airport) in the New York metropolitan area. The employer wanted to include employees at its two kitchens at Newark Airport. In an opinion concerned with considerations of geographic and administrative coherence, the Board directed separate elections at both Kennedy and La Guardia. Id. at 380. It also included shift supervisors and kitchen clericals in the unit.

The other Marriott In-Flite cases are equally distinguishable. See Marriott In-Flite Services, 209 N.L.R.B. 478 (1974) (enlarging unit to include not only employees at four flight-catering kitchens, but also employees at four cafeteria-type facilities in airline terminals in two New York City area airports); Marriott In-Flite Services, 168 N.L.R.B. 365 (1967) (enlarging one in-flite kitchen unit to include two similar kitchens located at same airport, when employer planned to consolidate three kitchens in near future).

Nor do we believe that our decision in NLRB v. Purity Food Stores, Inc., 354 F.2d 926 (1st Cir. 1965), is to the contrary. As we recently noted in Big Y Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 651 F.2d 40 (1981), Purity Food Stores merely indicated that "some minimum consideration [should] be given to the employer's side of the picture, the feasibility, and disruptive effects of piecemeal unionization." Id. at 14 (quoting NLRB v. Purity Food Stores, Inc., 354 F.2d 926, 931 (1st Cir. 1965)) (emphasis added by Big Y Foods court)."[14] Particularly in view of the declaration in § 9(b) that the Board shall determine the unit appropriate to assure employees the fullest freedom in exercising the right guaranteed by the Act, the Board is entitled to give greater weight to the employees' than to the Board's view of the appropriate boundaries of the unit." Id.; see NLRB v. Living and Learning Centers, Inc., 652 F.2d 209, 213 (1st Cir. 1981). Assuming that the Board did in fact consider the extent of unionization in this case, that consideration was not unwarranted.

The petition of Marriott In-Flite Services is denied.

The petition of the NLRB for enforcement of its order is granted.

---

[14] We do not agree with Marriott In-Flite that a labor dispute involving only transportation department employees would necessarily shut down the entire East Boston facility. Moreover, if this concern were controlling, it is difficult to see how any unit other than a plantwide unit could ever be found appropriate.

NLRB v. Amax Coal Company, a Division of Amax, Inc.

United Mine Workers of America, Local 1854 et al. v. NLRB

107 LRRM 2769, June 29, 1981—614 F.2d 872

On certiorari to 3d Cir.

Before BURGER, Chief Justice and BRENNAN, STEWART, WHITE, MARSHALL, BLACKMUN, POWELL, REHNQUIST, and STEVENS, Justices

JUSTICE STEWART delivered the opinion of the Court: This case concerns the relationship between two important provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947 (LMRA).[1] Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by § 101 of the LMRA, makes it an unfair labor practice for a union "to restrain or coerce * * * an employer in the selection of his representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances * * * ."[2] Section 302(c)(5) of the LMRA permits employers and unions to create employer-financed trust funds for the benefit of employees, so long as employees and employers are equally represented by the trustees of the funds.[3] The question at issue is whether the employer-selected trustees or a trust fund created under § 302(c)(5) are "representatives" of the employer "for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances" within the meaning of § 8(b)(1)(B).

I

The Amax Coal Company owns several deep shaft bituminous coal mines, most of them in the midwestern United States. The United Mine Workers of America (the union) represents Amax's employees, and, with respect to the midwestern mines, Amax is a member of the Bituminous Coal Operators Association (BCOA), a national multiemployer group that bargains with the union. Through its collective-bargaining contract with the union, Amax, along with the other members of the BCOA, agreed to contribute to the union's national pension and welfare trust funds. These funds, established under § 302(c)(5) of the Act, provide comprehensive health and retirement benefits to coal miners and their families. In accord with § 302(c)(5)(B), the trust funds are administered by three trustees, one selected by the union, one by the members of BCOA, and one by the other two.[4]

In 1972, Amax opened the Belle Ayre Mine in Wyoming, the company's first sub-bituminous surface mine. Although Amax did not join the BCOA with respect to that mine, Amax and the union negotiated a collective-bargaining contract for Belle Ayre which resembled the BCOA national contract, and under which Amax contributed specified amounts of money to the national trust funds to benefit the employees at Belle Ayre. In January 1975, when the collectively bargained contract covering the Belle Ayre Mine ended, the union struck Belle Ayre and other western mines, attempting to compel the mine owners to establish a multiemployer bargaining unit and to agree to a new collective contract proposed by the union, under which the members of the new employer unit would contribute to the national trust funds. Amax resisted, and the union, threatened with a complaint from the National Labor Relations Board Regional Counsel for illegally attempting to coerce the employer into a multiemployer bargaining unit, soon began separate negotiations with Amax. Those negotiations came to an impasse, and the union continued its strike at the Belle Ayre Mine. Amax then filed with the Board unfair labor practice charges against the union.

[2] 29 U.S.C. § 15b (b)(1)(B).

[3] 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5).

[4] The trust agrement set out the health and retirement benefits provided to employees and their dependents, defines the terms and the responsibilities of the trustees, describes the method of administration of the trust and provides for periodic audits reports and notices. The agreement also taxes the employers contributions to the trust requiring a specified number of cents per total of coal produced. With the one exception that the trustees themselves retain the power to fix the rate for coal salvaged from slurry, sludge, or other refuse.

The matter of pension and welfare benefits had been a major barrier to agreement between Amax and the union, and formed an important part of Amax's charges before the Board. Amax had proposed its own benefit and pension trust plan, outside the purview of § 302(c)(5), but the union, claiming that such a plan would not be sufficiently portable to or reciprocal with the national trust funds, had rejected this proposal. Rather, the union had insisted that Amax, even as a separately bargaining employer, continue to contribute to the national trust funds for the Belle Ayre employees. Amax, of course, as a member of BCOA, had participated in selecting the management appointed trustee of the national trust funds, but it now wanted to appoint its own trustee for any trust fund covering the employees of the Belle Ayre Mine. Amax took the view that any management-appointed trustee of a § 302(c)(5) trust fund was a collective-bargaining "representative" of the employer within the meaning of § 8(b)(1)(B); therefore, since the management trustee of the national trust fund had already been selected by BCOA, Amax contended that the union's insistence that it participate in the national trust funds with regard to Belle Ayre employees constituted illegal coercion under § 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. Amax also charged the union with refusing to bargain in good faith in violation of § 8(b)(3) of the Act.[5]

The National Labor Relations Board unanimously concluded that the union had acted legally in bargaining to impasse and striking to obtain Amax's participation in the national trust funds for the Belle Ayre employees.[6]

The Board noted that the purpose of § 8(b)(1)(B) was to ensure that an employer can bargain through a freely chosen representative completely faithful to his interest under the principles of agency law, while the trustee of a joint trust fund, though he may appropriately consider the recommendations of the party who appoints him, is a fiduciary owing undivided loyalty to the interest of the beneficiaries in administering the trust.[7] Accordingly, the Board concluded that the union had not violated § 8(b)(1)(B).

On cross petitions by the parties, the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, relying on its earlier decision in Associated Contractors of Essex County, Inc. v. Laborers International Union, 559 F.2d 222, 227–228, 95 LRRM 2908, held that management-appointed trustees of a § 302(c)(5) trust fund act as both fiduciaries of the employee-beneficiaries and as agents of the appointing employers, and, insofar as is consistent with their fiduciary obligations, are expected to administer the trusts in such a way as to advance the employer's interests. 614 F.2d 872. 881–882, 103 LRRM 2482. The Court therefore concluded that the union had acted in violation of § 8(b)(1)(B) in exerting its economic power to induce Amax to participate in the national trust funds with respect to employees of the Belle Ayre Mine, and reversed the Board's ruling to the contrary. We granted certiorari to consider the important question of Federal labor law this case presents. ——— U.S. ———.

[5] 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(3)

[6] On other claims by Amax, the Board found that the union had not bargained in bad faith in violation of § 8(b)(3), but that the union had acted illegally in attempting to coerce Amax to join the multiemployer bargaining unit for the western mines, in failing to notify the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service of its dispute with Amax before striking, and by insisting to impasse on certain contract proposals that would have violated § 8(e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(e). The Court of Appeals affirmed all these rulings, and they are not before this Court.

[7] The Board relied on its earlier resolution of this same issue in Sheet Metal Workers' International Association and Edward J. Carlough (Central Florida Sheetmetal Contractors Association, Inc.), 234 NLRB No. 162, 97 LRRM 1476.

Although § 302(a) of the Act [8] generally prohibits an employer from making payments to any representative of his employees, § 302(c)(5) allows an employer to contribute to an employee benefit trust fund that satisfies certain statutory requirements. To ensure that the funds in such a trust are not used as a union "war chest," Arroyo v. United States, 359 U.S. 419, 426, 44 LRRM 2028, the Act provides that the funds may be used only for specified benefits for employees and their dependents, and that the basis for these payments be laid out in a detailed written agreement between the union and the employer.[9] The fund must be subject to an annual audit, and the results of the audit must be made available to all interested persons.[10] Furthermore, pension or annuity funds must be kept in a trust separate from other union welfare funds.[11] Finally, § 302(c)(5)(B) requires that "employees and employers [be] equally represented in the administration of such fund, together with such neutral persons as the representatives of the employers and the representatives of the employees may agree upon * * *."[12]

Congress directed that union welfare funds be established as written formal trusts, and that the assets of the funds be "held in trust," and be administered "for the sole and exclusive benefit of the employees * * * and their families and dependents * * *." * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5). Where Congress uses terms that have accumulated settled meaning under either equity or the common law, a court must infer, unless the statute otherwise dictates, that Congress means to incorporate the established meaning of these terms. See Perrin v. United States, 444 U.S. 37, 42–43. Under principles of equity, a trustee bears an unwavering duty of complete loyalty to the beneficiary of the trust, to the exclusion of the interests of all other parties. Restatement (Second) of Trusts, § 170(1); 2 Scott on Trusts, § 170. To deter the trustee from all temptation and to prevent any possible injury to the beneficiary, the rule against a trustee dividing his loyalties must be enforced with "uncompromising rigidity." Meinhard v. Salmon, 249 N.Y. 458, 464, 164 N.E. 545, 546 (Cardozo, J.). A fiduciary cannot contend "that, although he had conflicting interests, he served his masters equally well or that his primary loyalty was not weakened by the pull of the secondary one." Woods v. City National Bank & Trust Co., 312 U.S. 262, 269.

Given this established rule against dual loyalties and Congress' use of terms long established in the courts of chancery, we must infer that Congress intended to impose on trustees traditional fiduciary duties unless Congress has unequivocally expressed an intent to the contrary. See Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622, 637. However, although § 302(c)(5)(B) requires an equal balance between trustees appointed by the union and those appointed by the employer, nothing in the language of § 302(c)(5) reveals any congressional intent that a trustee should or may administer a trust fund in the interest of the party that appointed him, or that an employer may direct or supervise the decisions of a trustee he has appointed.[13] And the legislative history of the LMRA confirms that § 302(c)(5) was designed to reinforce, not to alter, the long established duties of a trustee.

As explained by Senator Ball, one of the two sponsors of the provision, the "sole purpose" of [9] Trust funds may pay only "for medical or hospital care, pensions on retirement or death of employees, compensation for injuries or illness resulting from occupational activity or insurance to provide any of the foregoing, or unemployment benefits or life insurance, disability and sickness insurance, or accident insurance." 29 U.S.C. §186(c)(5)(A).

[10] 29 U.S.C. §186(c)(5)(B).

[11] 29 U.S.C. §186(c)(5)(C).

[12] If the trustees deadlock over a matter of trust administration, the statute further provides that the trustees may select a neutral arbiter, or "in event of their failure to agree within a reasonable length of time, an impartial umpire to decide such dispute shall, on petition of either group, be appointed by the district court of the United States for the district where the trust fund has its principal office * * *." 29 U.S.C. §186(c)(5)(B).

[13] The use of the word "representatives" in § 302(c)(5)(B) in no way suggests that Congress did not intend to incorporate the equitable principles of fiduciary duty. The requirement that employer and employee be equally represented among the trustees of an employee benefit fund prevents any misuse of those funds by union officers who would otherwise have sole control of vast amounts of money contributed by the employer. See Arroyo v. United States. 359 U.S. 419, 425 426, 44 LRRM 2028. The management-appointed trustee "represents" the employer only in the sense that he ensures that the union-appointed trustee does not abuse his trust with respect to the funds contributed by the employer. Nowhere in the debates over § 302(c)(5) did any Member of either House of Congress suggest that the employer "representative" as a trustee of a benefit fund created under this statute could or should advance the interest of the employer in administering the fund. In fact, some opponents of the provision objected that the requirement of equal management-union representation imposed onerous administrative duties on the employers. E.g. 93 Cong. Rec. 4880, reprinted in 2 NLRB Legislative History of the Labor Management-Relations Act, 1947, at 1316 (1948) (Leg. Hist. LMRA) (Sen. Murray).

§ 302(c)(5) is to ensure that employee benefit trust funds "are legitimate trust funds, used actually for the specified benefits to the employees of the employers who contribute to them * * *." 93 Cong. Rec. 4678 (1947), reprinted in 2 NLRB, Legislative History of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, at 1305 (1948) (Leg. Hist. LMRA). Senator Ball stated that "all we seek to do by [§ 302(c)(5)] is to make sure that the employees whose labor builds this fund and are really entitled to benefits under it shall receive the benefits; that it is a trust fund, and that, if necessary, they can go into court and obtain the benefits to which they are entitled." 93 Cong. Rec. 4753, 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 1322; see H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 510, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., at 66–67, 1 Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 570. The debates on § 302(c)(5) further reveal Congress' intent to cast employee benefit plans in traditional trust form precisely because fiduciary standards long established in equity would best protect employee beneficiaries. For example, one opponent of the bill suggested that § 305(c)(5) was unnecessary because even without that provision, the "officials who administer [the fund] thereby become trustees, subject to all of the common law and state safeguards against misuse of funds by trustees." 93 Cong. Rec. 4881, 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 1318 (Sen. Morse), Senator Taft, the primary author of the entire Act answered that many existing funds were not created expressly as trusts, and that § 302(c)(5)'s requirement that each fund be an express and enforceable trust would ensure that the future operations of all such funds would be subject to supervision by a court of chancery, 93 Cong. Rec. 4886, 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 1322. See also 93 Cong. Rec. 4802, 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 1304 (Sen. Ball); 93 Cong. Rec. 3623, 1 Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 753 (Rep. Case, author of House bill on which § 302(c)(5) was patterned). In sum, the duty of the management-appointed trustee of an employee benefit fund under § 302(c)(5) is directly antithetical to that of an agent of the appointing party.[14]

Whatever may have remained implicit in Congress' view of the employee benefit fund trustee under the Act became explicit when Congress passed the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA) ERISA essentially codified the strict fiduciary standards that a § 302(c)(5) trustee must meet. See 29 U.S.C. §§ 1002(1) and (2); H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 93–1280, 93d Cong., 2d Sess., 296, 307. Section 404(a)(1) of ERISA requires a trustee to "discharge his duties * * * solely in the interest of the participants and beneficiaries * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(1).[15] Section 406(b)(2) declares that a trustee may not "act in any transaction involving the plan on behalf of a party (or represent a party) whose interests are adverse to the interests of the plan or the interests of its participants or beneficiaries." 29 U.S.C. § 1106(b)(2). Section 405(a) imposes on each trustee an affirmative duty to prevent every other trustee of the same fund from breaching fiduciary duties, including the duty to act solely on behalf of the beneficiaries. 29 U.S.C. § 1105(a).

Moreover, the fiduciary requirements of ERISA specifically insulate the trust from the employer's interest. Except in circumstances involving excess contributions or termination of the trust, "the assets of a plan shall never inure to the benefit of any employer and shall be held for the exclusive purposes of providing benefits to participants in the plan and their beneficiaries and defraying reasonable expenses of administering the plan." § 403(c)(1), 29 U.S.C. § 1103(c)(1). Finally, § 406(a)(1)(E) prohibits any transaction between the trust and a "party in interest," including an employer, and § 407 carefully limits the amount and types of employer-owned property and securities that the trustees may obtain for the trust. 28 U.S.C. §§ 1106(a)(1)(E), 1107.[16] In sum, ERISA vests the "exclusive authority and discretion to manage and control the assets of the plan" in the trustees alone, and not the employer or the union. 29 U.S.C. § 1103(a).

[14] The legislative history of § 302(c)(5) also bears directly on the actual question underlying the statutory issue in this case: whether Congress intended to prohibit union demands for employer participation in established multiemployer trust funds. One of the events that greatly influenced the legislative efforts culminating in the Act was the demand of John L. Lewis, then head of the United Mine Workers, that all mine owners contribute 10 cents per ton of coal produced into a central welfare fund established by the union itself. United States v. Ryan. 350 U.S. 299, 304–305, 37 LRRM 2581; S. Rep. No. 105 (Part I), 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 1 Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 458. The debates and reports reveal that despite considerable congressional opposition to Lewis' demands, ibid.; S. Rep. No. 105, Part 1, 612, 672–673, 753 (remarks of Reps. Hartley, Fisher, and Case); 93 Cong. Rec. 4805, 4876–4878, 1 Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 1305, 1311–1313, 1315 (Sens. Byrd and Taft). Congress specifically rejected proposals that would have rendered those demands illegal either by providing that union proposals concerning pension welfare benefits were not mandatory subjects of bargaining or by prohibiting all such funds even indirectly established or managed by a union. See H.R. 3020, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., §§ 2(11), 8(a)(2)(C)(ii), 1 Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 39–40, 51; H.R. Rep. No. 245, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 14–17, 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 1012.

[15] A "participant" is "any employee or former employee * * * who is or may become eligible to receive a benefit of any type from an employee benefit plan * * *, or whose beneficiaries may be eligible to receive any such benefit." 29 U.S.C. § 1002(7). A "beneficiary" is "a person designated by a participant, or by the terms of an employee benefit plan, who is or may become entitled to a benefit thereunder." 29 U.S.C. § 1002(8).

The legislative history of ERISA confirms that Congress intended in particular to prevent trustees "from engaging in actions where there would be a conflict of interest with the fund, such as representing any party dealing with the fund." S.Rep. No. 93-383, 93d Cong., 1st Sess., 31, 32. In short, the fiduciary provisions of ERISA were designed to prevent a trustee "from being put into a position where he has dual loyalties and therefore he cannot act exclusively for the benefit of a plan's participants and beneficiaries." H.R.Conf. Rep. No. 93-1280, supra, at 309.[17]

III

The language and legislative history of § 302(c)(5) and ERISA therefore demonstrate that an employee benefit fund trustee is a fiduciary whose duty to the trust beneficiaries must over come any loyalty to the interest of the party that appointed him. Thus, the statutes defining the duties of a management-appointed trustee make it virtually self-evident that welfare fund trustees are not "representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances" within the meaning of § 8(b)(1)(B). But close examination of the latter provision makes it even clearer that § 8(b)(1)(B) does not limit the freedom of a union to try to induce an employer to select a particular § 302(c)(5) trustee.[18]

Congress enacted § 8(b)(1)(B) largely to prevent unions from forcing employers to join multiemployer bargaining units, or to dictate the identity of those who would represent employers in collective-bargaining negotiations or the settlement of emloyee grievances. See American Broadcasting Companies v. Writers Guild of America, West, Inc, 437 U.S. 411, 422–423, 429–431, 435–436, 98 LRRM 2705; Florida Power & Light Co. v. IBEW, Local 641, 417 U.S. 790, 803, 86 LRRM 2689; S.Rep. No. 105 (Pt. I), 1st Sess., 21, 1 Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 427; 93 Cong. Rec. 4266, 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA 1077 (Sen. Ellender).[19] The legislative history reveals the concern of some Senators that if unions could strike or bargain to impasse to compel employers to join industry-wide bargaining units, the large unions might exercise monopoly power over wages or call strikes threatening large portions of the national economy. S. Rep. No. 105 (Pt. I), 1st Sess., 51, Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 457; 93 Cong. Rec. 4710–4711, 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA, at 1246–1258 (Sen. Taft). However, the power of a union to strike or bargain to impasse to induce an employer to contribute to a multiemployer trust fund does not pose the danger Congress sought to prevent. Congress treated the issues of multiemployer bargaining units and multiemployer trust funds quite distinctly. It is permissible under the law, and may be in the interest of the public, for an employer to bargain separately with a union, independently of any industry-wide employer association, while the union exerts economic pressure to obtain protection for the employees through the medium of a multiemployer benefit fund.

Moreover, union pressure to force an employer to contribute to an established employee trust fund does not amount to dictating to an employer who shall represent him in collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances, because the trustees of a § 302(c)(5) trust fund simply do not, as such, engage in these activities. The terms "collective bargaining" in § 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act is defined by § 8(d):

[16] Although § 408(c)(3) of ERISA permits a trustee of an employee benefit fund to serve as an agent or representative of the union or employer, that provision in no way limits the duty of such a person to follow the law's fiduciary standards while he is performing his responsibilities as trustee.

[17] In 1980, Congress amended ERISA to impose new responsibilities upon the trustees of multiemployer trust funds, passing the Multiemployer Pension Plan Amendments Act of 1980, Pub. L. 96-364, 94 Stat. 1209, which reaffirmed that the trustees must act solely in the interest of the trust beneficiaries, see H.R. Rep. No. 96-869 (Part 1), 96th Cong., 2d Sess., 67.

[18] Neither statutory provision refers to the other and though the same congressional committees considered the issues of employee benefit trust funds and multiemployer bargaining, the legislative history nowhere suggests that Congress intended that the restrictions on union activity created by § 8(b)(1)(B) were relevant to the selection of § 302(c)(5) trustees. Indeed, though faced with a United Mine Workers demand that owners contribute a fixed percentage of their coal receipts to a multiemployer trust fund created by the union. Congress rejected several proposals that would have denied the union the power to make such demands. See n. 14, supra.

[19] Another concern of § 8(b)(1)(B), of no relevance here, was to prevent a union from striking to force an employer to fire a supervisor who, in the union's view, was too stern in his treatment of employees. 93 Cong. Rec. 3953–3954, 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA 1012 (Sen. Taft).

> "[T]he performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement, or any question arising thereunder, and the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party, but such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession * * *." 29 U.S.C. §158(d).

Under this definition, the collective-bargaining representatives of an employer and a union attempt to reach an agreement by negotiation, and, failing agreement, are free to settle their differences by resort to such economic weapons as strikes and lockouts, without any compulsion to reach agreement. See Carbon Fuel Co. v. Mine Workers, 444 U.S. 212, 219, 102 LRRM 3017; NLRB v. Insurance Agents' International Union, 361 U.S. 477, 495, 45 LRRM 2704.

The atmosphere in which employee benefit trust fund fiduciaries must operate, as mandated by § 302(c)(5) and ERISA, is wholly inconsistent with this process of compromise and economic pressure. The management-appointed and union-appointed trustees do not bargain with each other to set the terms of the employer-employee contract; they can neither require employer contributions not required by the original collectively-bargained contract, nor compromise the claims of the union or the employer with regard to the latter's contributions. Rather, the trustees operate under a detailed written agreement, 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5)(B), which is itself the product of bargaining between the representatives of the employees and those of the employer.[20] Indeed, the trustees have an obligation to enforce the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement regarding employee fund contributions against the employer "for the sole benefit of the beneficiaries of the fund." United States v. Carter, 353 U.S. 210, 220, 13 LRRM 238. Finally, disputes between benefit fund, trustees over the administration of the trust cannot, as can disputes between parties in collective bargaining, lead to strikes, lockouts, or other exercises of economic power. Rather, whereas Congress has expressly rejected compulsory arbitration as a means of resolving collective-bargaining disputes, § 302(c)(5) explicitly provides for the compulsory resolution of any deadlocks among welfare fund trustees by a neutral umpire. Compare 29 U.S.C. § 158(d) with 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5); see, n. 12, supra.[21]

Like collective bargaining, the adjustment of grievances concerns the relationship between employer and employee. See 29 U.S.C. § 159(a). The trustees' concern, however, is the relationship between the beneficiaries and the fund. The only "grievances" it may adjust are those concerning the eligibility of employees or their dependents for participation in the benefits of the fund. See Allied Chemical & Alkali Workers v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 164–171, 78 LRRM 2974. And whereas Congress has adopted the principle of voluntary settlement, free of governmental compulsion, in the adjustment of employee grievances against the employer, § 203(d) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 173(d), a trustee deadlock over eligibility matters, like any other deadlock, must be submitted to the compulsory resolution procedure established by § 302(c)(5).

"Both the language and the legislative history of § 8(b)(1)(B) reflect a clearly focused congressional concern with the protection of employers in the selection of representatives to engage in two particular and explicitly stated activities namely collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances." Florida Power & Light Co., v. I.B.E.W., Local 641, 417 U.S. 790, 803, 86 LRRM 2689. The duties of an employer-appointed trustee of an employee benefit trust fund, under § 302(c)(5) of the Act, under principles long ago developed in the courts of chancery, and under the specific provisions of ERISA, are totally alien to both of these activities. The Court of Appeals, therefore, was mistaken in believing that the conduct of the union in this case violated the provisions of § 8(b)(1)(B).[22] [20] The sole and minor exception under the agreement governing the national trust funds in this case is the authority of the trustees to fix the number of cents per ton of salvage coal produced which a mine operator must contribute to the funds. See n. 4, supra.

[21] If the administration of § 302(c)(5) trust funds were "collective bargaining" within the meaning of federal labor law, as it would be under the Court of Appeals' view, the NLRB would have to review the discretionary actions of the trustees according to the statutory duty of good-faith bargaining. 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(5), (b)(3), (d). The Board would thereby be thrust "into a new area of regulation which Congress [has] not committed to it, NLRB v. Insurance Agents' International Union, 361 U.S. 477, 499, 45 LRRM 2704. Moreover, under the Court of Appeals' view, a trustee would be subject to simultaneous regulation by the Board, the Secretary of Labor, and the courts, and might be torn between conflicting duties imposed by the National Labor Relations Act and ERISA. For example, ERISA requires a trustee to prevent any other trustee from breaching his fiduciary responsibilities to the trust beneficiaries, 29 U.S.C. §§ 405 (a)(3), (b)(1)(A). On the other hand, § 8(b)(1)(B) bars a union representative from interfering with the employer's collective-bargaining agent's performance of his duties in accordance with the employer's instructions. American Broadcasting Companies v. Writers Guild of America, West, Inc., 437 U.S. 411, 436, 98 LRRM 2705. Therefore, if trust fund administration is collective bargaining, a trustee could be charged with an unfair labor practice by carrying out his duties under ERISA.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

JUSTICE STEVENS, dissenting: The Key to this case, in my judgment, is the distinction between the process by which a person is appointed to office and the manner in which he performs that office after he has been appointed. Congress has provided that labor and management shall each appoint the same number of representatives to serve as trustees of jointly-administered employee pension and welfare funds.[1] Giving each side of the bargaining table exclusive control of the appointment of half of the trustees does not compromise in any way the fiduciary obligations of the trustees after they assume office. Conversely, the imposition of fiduciary responsibilities on the trustees after they have been appointed surely does not lend any support to the Court's quixotic notion that a union may interfere—by a strike if necessary—with management's selection of its representatives.

Three quite different theories might provide a basis for deciding this case in favor of the United Mine Workers (the union). First, the Court might conclude that the union was merely trying to induce Amax to agree to contribute to the national multiemployer trust funds and that is had no interest in the identity of the management trustees of those funds. Second, the Court might conclude that because Amax, as a member of the Bituminous Coal Operators Association, actually participated in the selection of the management trustees of the union's national trust funds, there is no basis for its claim that the union was interfering with that prerogative of management. Third, the Court might conclude that it is permissible for a union to restrain or to coerce an employer in the selection of its repre-

[22] The view of the Court of Appeals that the union could not seek to compel the employer to join an established employee trust fund conflicts with recent legislation concerning multiemployer pension plans. In this case, Amax claimed complete power under § 8(b)(1)(B), unaffected by union economic pressure, to select the sole trustee, or all the trustees, of the trust fund benefiting the Belle Ayre Maine employees. Since, by definition, it is impossible for every employer participating in a multiemployer trust fund to exercise such power, the Court of Appeals' decision upholding Amax's claim would effectively preclude a union from resorting to economic pressure to cause an employer to participate in a multiemployer trust fund. Congress amended ERISA in 1980 to strengthen the funding requirements and enhance the financial stability of multiemployer pension plans. In these amendments, Congress sought to "foster the maintenance and growth of multiemployer pension plan . . . [and] to provide reasonable protection for the interests of the participants and beneficiaries of financially distressed multiemployer pension plans." Section 3(c)(2) and (c)(3) of the Multiemployer Pension Plan Amendments Act of 1980, Pub. L. 96-364, 94 Stat. 1209–1210. Section 3(a)(4)(A) of the 1980 Act states that "withdrawals of contributing employees from a multiemployer pension . . . adversely [affect] the plan, its participants and beneficiaries, and labor-management relations . . ." 94 Stat. 1209. The Court of Appeals' decision therefore runs afoul of express congressional policy favoring multiemployer trusts.

[1] Section 302(a) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 generally prohibits payments by employers to representatives of their employees. 29 U.S.C. § 186(a). Section 302(c)(5) creates an exception to this general prohibition for payments to certain trust funds established for the sole benefit of employees. 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5). The statute contains detailed requirements that trust funds must satisfy to qualify for the exception:

"The provisions of this section shall not be applicable * * * with respect to money or other thing of value paid to a trust fund established by such representative, for the sole and exclusive benefit of the employees of such employer, and their families and dependents (or of such employees, families, and dependents jointly with the employees of other employers making similiar payments, and their families and dependents); provided, That (A) such payments are held in trust for the purpose of paying, either from principal or income or both, for the benefit of employees, their families and dependents, for medical or hospital care, pensions on retirements or death of employees, compensation for injuries or illness resulting from occupational activity or insurance to provide any of the foregoing, or unemployment benefits or life insurance, disability and sickness insurance, or accident insurance; (B) the detailed basis on which such payments are to be made is specified in a written agreement with the employer, and employees and employers are equally represented in the administration of such fund, together with such neutral persons as the representatives of the employers and the representatives of the employees may agree upon and in the event the employer and employee groups deadlock on the administration of such fund and there are no neutral persons empowered to break such deadlock, such agreement provides that the two groups shall agree on an impartial umpire to decide such dispute, or in event of their failure to agree within a reasonable length of time, an impartial umpire to decide such dispute shall, on petition of either group, be appointed by the District Court of the United States for the district where the trust fund has its principal office, and shall also contain provisions for an annual audit of the trust fund, a statement of the results of which shall be available for inspection by interested persons at the principal office of the trust fund and at such other places as may be designated in such written agreement; and (C) such payments as are intended to be used for the purpose of providing pensions or annuities for employees are made to a separate trust which provides that the funds held therein cannot by used for any purpose other than paying such pensions or annuities * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5).

sentatives for the purpose of administering joint employee pension and welfare funds.

If the Court relied on either of the first two rationales, or if its opinion could be read as resting on a blend of all three, this case would not be particularly significant. I believe, however, that the Court's opinion will be read as holding that it is not an unfair labor practice for a union to attempt to exercise an economic veto over an employer's selection of the management trustees of a jointly administered employee benefit fund.[2] In my opinion, that holding is foreclosed by rather plain statutory language and is flagrantly at odds with the intent of Congress.

I

The equal representation requirement of § 302(c)(5) is one of a number of restrictions employed by Congress to prevent the mismanagement or misuse of employee benefit funds by union officials. See, e.g., Arroyo v. United States, 359 U.S. 419, 426, 44 LRRM 2028; Associated Contractors, Inc. v. Laborers International Union. 559 F.2d 222, 226, 95 LRRM 2908 (CA3 1977).[3] Equal representation was required, not to satisfy employer demands for a voice in benefit fund administration,[4] but to insure that money paid for the welfare of employees actually was used for that purpose. As Senator Taft explained:

> "Certainly unless we impose some restriction we shall find that the welfare fund will become merely a war chest for the particular union, and that the employees for whose benefit it is supposed to be established, for certain definite welfare purposes, will have no legal rights and will not receive the kind of benefits to which they are entitled after such deductions from their wages.
> "This amendment is, in effect, a provision to prevent the abuse of the right to establish such funds by collective bargaining, pending further study of the whole problem. Otherwise I think we shall find that the welfare fund will become a racket. In many unions it is very easy for it to become a racket." 93 Cong. Rec. 4877 (1947), reprinted in 2 Legislative History of the Labor Management Relations Act. 1947, 1312–1313 (Leg. Hist. LMRA).

The requirement of equal labor-management representation is a central factor in the congressional formula to prevent such abuse. See, e.g., Associated Contractors. Inc., supra, at 227; Toensing v. Brown, 374 F.Supp. 191, 195, 88 LRRM 2643 (ND Cal. 1974), aff'd, 528 F.2d 69, 91 LRRM 2174 (CA9 1975).

Although the Court repeatedly uses the word "trustee" to identify the persons who administer pension and welfare funds established in compliance with § 302(c)(5), Congress used the word "representative." See 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5). Congress' use of this term does not, of course, qualify the fiduciary responsibilities of those persons.[5] It is nevertheless important for two reasons. First, it is a reminder that one of the means selected by Congress for insuring neutrality in the administration of a trust fund was to give each side of the bargaining table an equal voice in the selection of trustees. Second, it is a recognition of the fact that the administration of a trust fund often gives rise to questions over which representatives of management and representatives of labor may have legitimate differences of opinion that are entirely consistent with their fiduciary duties.

[2] The Court states that:

"[C]lose examination of the latter provision makes it even clearer that § 8(b)(1)(B) does not limit the freedom of a union to try to induce an employer to select a particular § 302(c)(5) trustee" Ante, at 11.

[3] In addition to containing numerous specific references to John L. Lewis and the United Mine Workers central fund, see, e.g., S. Rep. No. 105, 80th Cong. 1st Sess., 52 (1947), reprinted in 1 Legislative History of the Labor Management Relations Act. 1947, 458 (Leg. Hist. LMRA); 93 Cong. Rec. 3623–3624, A2012 (1947), 1 Leg. Hist. LMRA 753–756, 869 93 Cong. Rec. 4805, 4876–4878, 5147 (1947); 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA 1305, 1306, 1310–1315, 1498, the legislative history is replete with general expressions of concern about union mismanagement and misuse of employee benefit funds. See, e.g., S. Rep. No. 105 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 52 (1947), 1 Leg. Hist. LMRA 458; 93 Cong. Rec. 3628 (1947); 1 Leg. Hist. LMRA 757 93 Cong. Rec. 4805, 4806, 4876–4877, 4882–4883 (1947); 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA 1305, 1306, 1310–1313, 1321, 1322. The equal representation requirement was a direct response to these concerns. As Senator Ball explained:

> "In other words, when the union has complete control of this fund, when there is no detailed provision in the agreement creating the fund respecting the benefits which are to go to employees, the union and its leadership will always come first in the administration of the fund, and the benefits to which the employees supposedly are entitled will come second." 93 Cong. Rec. 4883 (1947), 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA 1322.

See also S. Rep. No. 105, 80th Cong., 1st. Sess., 52 (1947), 1 Leg. Hist. LMRA 458; 93 Cong. Rec. 3623 (1947); 1 Leg. Hist. LMRA 753; 93 Cong. Rec. 4805, 4877 (1947), 2 Leg. Hist LMRA 1305, 1312.

[4] Indeed, opponents of the bill that became § 302 argued that many employers wanted absolutely nothing to do with the administration of employee benefit funds. See, e.g., 93 Cong. Rec. 4879, 4882 (1947), 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA 1316, 1319, 1320.

[5] However, the fact that Congress used the term "representative" rather than "trustee" is significant in light of the Court's reliance on the principle that "[w]here Congress uses terms that have accumulated settled meaning under either equity or the common law, a court must infer, unless the statute otherwise dictates, that Congress means to incorporate the established meaning of these terms." Ante, at 6.

The Court's extended discussion of the fiduciary responsibilities of employee benefit fund trustees has, in my judgment, little bearing on the question presented in this case. It is undisputed that such trustees are fiduciaries whose primary loyalty must be to the beneficiaris of the funds. The question with which we are confronted here is whether this fiduciary duty is necessarily wholly inconsistent with "representative" status. The Court answers this question in the affirmative by citing traditional principles of trust law and their federal statutory counterparts. This approach leads the Court into error because it ignores the purpose underlying § 302(c)(5) and the carefully designed means chosen by Congress to achieve that purpose.

The trustees of employee benefit funds often exercise broad discretion on policy matters with respect to which management and labor representative may reasonably have different views. Besides describing the trustees as "representatives," Congress expressly recognized in § 302(c)(5) that such differences would arise, for it provided a procedure to resolve such differences in the event of a deadlock between "the employer and employee groups." Nothing in the statute or the legislative history suggests that differences along labor-management lines are in any way inconsistent with the trustees' fiduciary duty to the trust beneficiaries. Indeed, it is precisely because management and the union can have legitimate differences with respect to matters of trust administration that the equal representation requirement serves as an effective safeguard. Although the Court seems to ignore this principle in its decision today, it has been recognized in the past by other federal courts [6] and by the commentators.[7]

The trust agreement at issue in this case allows ample room for such labor-management differences. For example, it authorizes the trustees to determine how much money each operator shall contribute to the fund on account of the production of salvaged coal. See Joint App. 98k–98l. That kind of detail could be covered in the basic collective-bargaining argeement or left to the trustees for resolution in the light of changing circumstances. When the trustees resolve such an issue, one surely could not charge a management representative with a breach of trust merely for favoring a lower rate than the union representatives suggest.

[6] In Associated Contractors, Inc. v. Laborers International Union, 559 F.2d 222, 95 LRRM 2908 (CA3 1977), the decision on which the Court of Appeals relied in this case, the court recognized that the inevitable conflict between the views of labor and the views of management with respect to the administration of employee benefit funds was an essential feature of the statutory protection designed by Congress:

> "The starting point for analysis must be the candid recognition that the relationship between employer and employee trustees of an employee benefit trust fund is quasi-adversarial in nature. Naturally, the trustees of such a trust fund function as fiduciaries for the funds' beneficiaries but they also serve as representatives of the parties who appoint them. Insofar as it is consistent with their fiduciary obligations, employer trustees are expected to advance the interests of the employer while employee trustees are expected to further the concerns of the union in the ongoing collective-bargaining process between them * * *. The trustees' efforts to improve the position of the parties they represent are completely legitimate—indeed, they are essential to the operation of section 302(c)(5). Congress envisioned the conflict of views of employer and employee as a distilling process which would provide safeguards against trust fund corruption." Id., at 227–228 (citations omitted).

[7] One commentator described the statutory scheme, as follows:

> "The governing trust agreement separately entered into by the parties to the collective-bargaining agreement may specify general categories of benefits, but it normally delegates to the trustees broad discretion to determine specific benefit levels and eligibility requirements, to modify the benefit plan, and to administer the plan.
> "Exercise of this discretionary power may involve important questions of policy or judgment on which union and employer trustees may well differ. This potential divergence of interests was the underlying reason for the statutory requirement of equal representation. Employer representatives were intended to act as a check on the untrammeled discretion of the union. The possibility of adverse interests leading to dispute is recognized by the statutory provision for breaking deadlocks through appointment of an impartial umpire." Goetz, Developing Federal Labor Law of Welfare and Pension Plans, 55 Cornell L. Rev. 911, 922–923 (1970) (footnote omitted).

See also Goetz, Employee Benefit Trusts Under Section 302 of Labor Management Relations Act, 59 Nw. U. L. Rev. 719, 748 (1965).

The Court states that the trustees may never "compromise the claims of the union or the employer with regard to the latter's contributions" to the fund. Ante, at 13. But what if one contributor to a multiemployer fund is unable to pay its bills currently? Do trustees have no power to enter into temporary arrangements or compromises?[8] In making decisions regarding the investment of the assets of the fund, legitimate differences among faithful trustees certainly may arise. Conceivably, management representatives may favor conservative investment policies that are best designed to guarantee the long-range solvency of the fund while labor representatives may favor investments with higher yields that will support a demand for more liberal benefits at the next bargaining session. No written trust agreement can entirely eliminate the need for discretionary decisions by trustees nor make it impermissible for the trustees to give consideration to the interests that they represent when confronting day-to-day administrative problems.

Some of the issues the trustees must resolve in processing applications for benefits are almost identical to those that arise in grievance proceedings. Rights to pension benefits and to seniority are measured in part, by the employee's length of service. Either in the adjustment of a grievance over seniority or in the trustees' approval or disapproval of a claim for retirement benefits, it may be necessary to resolve a dispute over how to measure the period of employment. Bargaining units tend to develop an unwritten "law of the shop" to resolve such recurring minor disputes; it seems to me equally permissible for trustees to develop a similar common law of their own and for representatives of the two sides of the bargaining table to reflect different points of view as that law develops. The guarantee of impartiality in making decisions of this kind is not a total divorce of every trustee from the interests that he represents; rather, neutrality is guaranteed by having an equal number of "representatives" of the two conflicting interests make the decisions, subject always to their basic obligation as fiduciaries. That this is the scheme of the statute is perfectly clear from its terms.[9]

It is equally clear that this scheme will be compromised if the employer's selection of his representatives is now to be a subject of collective bargaining. The danger to the legislative scheme is not mitigated by the fact that the employer need not agree with the union's demand that a particular person be named a management trustee. The employer may consider it less costly to give the union a veto over the selection of the management trustees than to grant a wage increase.[10] Any bargaining over the identity of a trustee inevitably will destroy the precise balance that Congress intended by directing that each side shall select its own representatives. As JUSTICE BLACKMUN aptly stated while a Member of the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit:

> "[T]o permit the union in any degree to participate in the choice of employer representatives does violence to the statutory standard of equal representation." Blassie v. Kroger Co., 345 F.2d 58, 72, 59 LRRM 2034 (CA8 1965).[11]

In my opinion, the Court today "does violence to the statutory standard" because it misapprehends the safeguard established by Congress in § 302(c)(5), and instead applies to this case principles of trust law and statutory provisions that have little, if any, relevance to the precise question presented.

[8] The trust agreement in this record suggests the contrary:

"The Trustees shall take such action as they deem appropriate to collect any such delinquencies, and shall advise the International Union and the appropriate Districts and Locals of the Union, on at least a monthly basis, of such delinquencies, as long as such delinquencies continue." Joint App. 98p.

[9] As noted above, the word "trustee" does not appear in § 302(c) of the LMRA. That section does require that "employees and employers are equally represented in the administration of such fund, together with such neutral persons as the representatives of the employers and the representatives of the employees may agree upon and in the event the employer and employee groups deadlock on the administration of such fund and there are no neutral persons empowered to break such deadlock, such agreement provides that the two groups shall agree on an impartial umpire to decide such dispute * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5). It seems to me that this statutory language is quite inconsistent with the Court's view that the trustees are essentially fungible once they have been appointed.

[10] Because the equal representation requirement primarily benefits the fund's beneficiaries rather than the employer, it is unlikely that an employer would be willing to risk a strike or other economic pressure on the part of the union in order to preserve its right to choose its own representatives to the employee benefit fund. As the legislative history suggests, see n. 4, supra, many employers probably view the equal representation requirement as an unwelcome burden at best, rather than as an essential right worth defending at the risk of extended labor strife. Cf Cox, Some Aspects of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, 61 Harv. L. Rev. 274, 290, 314 (1948). ("The provisions dealing with employer contributions to union trust funds set the employer up as watchdog, although it has no interest in the fund").

II

In addition to arguing that there is an inherent inconsistency between the duties of a "trustee" and the duties of a "representative"—and therefore that the trustees of an employee benefit fund cannot be representatives even though they are so named by Congress—the Court suggests that in any event these representatives are not selected "for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances" within the meaning of § 8(b)(1)(B), 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(B).[12] The Court seems to read this provision as a narrow, precisely defined prohibition against interference with the selection of a relatively small number of representatives whose primary function is to represent the employer in collective-bargaining negotiations or in the adjustment of grievances. Once again, the Court overlooks the distinction between interfering with the selection process and interfering with the performance of a supervisor's duties after he has been selected. I believe the Courts narrow construction was not intended by Congress, and that the statute prohibits union interference with management's selection of all personnel who have any, however minor, collective bargaining or grievance adjustment responsibilities. When § 8(b)(1)(B) is read in light of its purpose and legislative history, it is plain that the prohibition applies to the selection of the employer's representatives in the administration of joint benefit funds.

The Court's narrow view of § 8(b)(1)(B) has its source in Florida Power & Light Co. v. I.B.E.W., Local 641, 417 U.S. 790, 86 LRRM 2689—a case that did not involve any direct interference with the employer's selection of supervisors. In that case, we held that "a union's discipline of one of its members who is a supervisory employee can constitute a violation of § 8(b)(1)(B) only when that discipline may adversely affect the supervisor's conduct in performing the duties of, and acting in his capacity as, grievance adjuster or collective bargainer of behalf of the employer." 417 U.S., at 804–805. Thus, to make out a violation of the statute in such a case, it is not enough to show that the union disiplined a supervisor who had some collective bargaining or grievance adjustment responsibilities; the discipline itself must relate directly to the supervisor's performance of these duties. See also American Broadcasting Co. v. Writers Guiid, 437 U.S. 411,429–430, 98 LRRM 2705. This direct relationship is an appropriate element of a § 8(b)(1)(B) violation in a case involving union discipline of a supervisor because such discipline only indirectly affects the "selection" of management representatives, the primary focus of the statute. However, whenever the union conduct has a direct impact on the employer's selection of a representative, it is not necessary that that conduct bear a direct relationship to the representative's collective bargaining or grievance adjustment duties; it is sufficient that the union attempt to coerce or to restrain management in the selection of a representative who will have such duties, even if they will constitute only a small portion of his overall responsibilities.

The legislative history of § 8(b)(1)(B) supports a broad reading of the prohibition against union conduct aimed directly at the actual selection of employer representatives. Section 8(b)(1)(B) was intended to protect the basic management prerogative of selecting foremen and more senior executives who exercise supervisory authority over employees and represent the company in its relationship with employees and their collective bargaining agent. The sparse comments on the provision in the legislative history persuade me that Congress intended the description of "representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances" to refer to a category of employer representatives whose selection was exclusively a matter of management prerogative.

Thus, Senator Taft explained the provision by using the example of an unpopular foreman who may well have had no specific responsibility for either collective bargaining or adjusting grievances. He said:

> "This unfair labor practice referred to is not perhaps of tremendous importance, but employees cannot say to their employer, 'We do not like Mr. X, we will not meet Mr. X. You have to send us Mr. Y.' That has been done. It would prevent their saying to the employer, 'You have to fire Foreman Jones. We do not like Foreman Jones, and therefore you have to fire him, or we will not go to work.' " 93 Cong. Rec. 3953 (1947), 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA 1012.

---

[12] Section 8(b) of the Act provides, in pertinent part:

"It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—

"(1) to restrain or coerce . . . (B) an employer in the selection of his representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances. . . ." 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(B).

A few days later, in a brief discussion of provisions in the bill intended to deal with "strikes invading the prerogatives of management," Senator Ellender identified § 8(b)(1) as covering the coercion of an employer" either in the selection of his bargaining representative or in the selection of a personnel director or foreman, or other supervisory official." 93 Cong. Rec. 4266 (1947), 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA 1077. His description of the provision surely supports a broad reading of the prohibition against strikes invading the prerogatives of management, rather than a narrowly restricted reference to a precisely defined category of representatives principally involved in collective bargaining and grievance adjustment.[13]

Therefore, to sustain its position in this case, it seems to me that the Court must establish that no part of the duties of an employee benefit fund trustee involve collective bargaining or grievance adjustment activities. But even if one gives the narrowest literal reading to the term "collective bargaining," it is clear that employee benefit trust agreements generally, and the trust agreement involved in this case in particular, authorize the two groups of representatives to engage in collective bargaining activity. The statute broadly defines collective bargaining to encompass any conference with respect to "the negotiation of an agreement, or any question arising thereunder." 29 U.S.C. § 158(d).[14] Such negotiation is manifestly a part of a trustee's duties.[15]

In addition to the provision delegating to the trustee the power to fix the contribution rate for salvaged coal production, see supra, at 7–8, the agreement in this case provides that the trustee representing the union and the trustee representing the employers shall select the neutral trustee.[16] When the trustee representing the union and the trustee representing the employers select the neutral trustee, they surely are resolving a question arising under the agreement. It is therefore perfectly clear that they are literally engaged in collective bargaining as that term is defined in the Act. Indeed, whenever they confer about various questions that arise in connection with the administration of the trust agreement, they inevitably are engaged in that activity as defined in the statute. The fact that differences between labor and management trustees in the administration of the fund are to be resolved through the neutral umpire procedure established in § 302(c)(5), rather than through strikes or lockouts, does not in any way change the character of the trustees' function.

In this case, there is no need to decide when, or indeed if ever, the refusal of one trustee to confer with another might constitute a refusal to bargain in good faith and therefore an unfair labor practice. It may well be true that the fiduciary obligations imposed by the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, 29 U.S.C. § 1101 et seq., or by other provisions of the LMRA, may make a different remedy appropriate for a violation of the trustee's statutory duties. In this case, however, we are merely confronted with the question whether the employer's right to designate its representative to the board of a jointly-administered trust fund is a matter for negotiation with the union or is strictly a matter of management prerogative. The language of the statute, its structure, its purpose, and the history of administration of trust funds pursuant to the Act since it was passed, all support the conclusion that this is a matter of management prerogative over which the union has no right to strike.[17] In my opinion, the Court of Ap-

[13] Senator Ellender's full statement on this point reads as follows:

"I shall now deal briefly with strikes invading the prerogatives of management.

"The bill prevents a union from dictating to an employer on the question of bargaining with union representatives through an employer association. The bill in subsection 8(b)(1) on page 14, makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to attempt to coerce an employer either in the selection of his bargaining representative or in the selection of a personnel director or foreman, or other supervisory official. Senators who heard me discuss the issue early in the afternoon will recall that quite a few unions forced employers to change foremen. They have been taking it upon themselves to say that management should not appoint any representative who is too strict with the membership of the union. This amendment seeks to prescribe a remedy in order to prevent such interferences. 93 Cong. Rec. 4266 (1947), 2 Leg. Hist. LMRA 1077.

[14] In pertinent part, § 8(d) of the LMRA reads:

"For the purposes of this section to bargain collectively is the performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement, or any question arising thereunder, and the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party, but such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession . . . ." 29 U.S.C. § 158(d).

[15] The wall between collective bargaining activities and the duties of welfare fund trustees on which the Court's opinion is based simply does not exist. As one commentator has observed:

> [T]he subjects about which the trustees confer are within the scope; mandatory collective bargaining under the act.

* * * * *

"Despite the unusual setting the deliberations of trustees of these funds may be looked upon as an extension of the collective bargaining process within contractual and statutory limits." Goetz, supra, at 922.923. See also Toensing v. Brown, supra, at 195–196.

[16] The agreement provides:

"Section (e) Responsibilities and Duties of Trustees

"(1) Each Trust shall be administered by a Board of three Trustees, one of whom shall be appointed by the Employers, one of whom shall be appointed by the Union; and one of whom shall be a neutral party, selected by the other two." Joint App. 98n emphasis added).

2781

peals' judgment should be affirmed. I therefore respectfully dissent.

---

[17] This conclusion is in no way inconsistent with the Multiemployer Pension Plan Amendments Act of 1980 (MPPAA), 94 Stat. 1204, the Court's statement to the contrary notwithstanding. See ante, at 15–16 n. 22. While Congress sought in that Act to enhance the stability of multiemployer plans, it did not address the question presented in this case, nor did it prohibit the withdrawal of employers from such plans. Rather Congress provided that withdrawing employers must fund a proportional share of a plans unfunded benefits. MPPAA § 104.94 Stat. 1217. Thus, the general expressions of concern in the legislative history of this Act must be read in light of the action Congress actually took to allay those concerns.

Charles E. Helton v. NLRB

656 F.2d 883 (D.C. Cir.), June 29, 1981—248 NLRB 83

On petition to review Board Order

Before ROBINSON Chief Judge, WRIGHT, Circuit Judge, and VAN PELT,* SENIOR DISTRICT JUDGE

Opinion for the court filed by Circuit Judge J. SKELLY WRIGHT

884

J. SKELLY WRIGHT, Circuit Judge: Petitioner Charles Helton seeks review of a National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) decision finding that his union, Teamsters Local 515, did not commit an unfair labor practice under Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) [1] when it refused to allow him to post materials critical of the union on the union's bulletin board, even though it would have permitted him to post any other materials.[2] We conclude that the union may not restrict employees' rights of expression in this manner.

I. BACKGROUND

Teamsters Local 515 represents employees at the Chattanooga, Tennessee terminal of Roadway Express, Inc. (the company). The union bulletin board was located in the employees' "breakroom" at the terminal.[3] It was maintained pursuant to the collective bargaining agreement in effect between the union and the company, which provided:

> The Employer agrees to provide suitable space for the union bulletin board in each garage, terminal or place of work. Postings by the union on such boards are to be confined to official business of the union.[4]

Although the collective bargaining agreeement stated that the board was to be used only for official union business, this provision was not enforced. From at least 1967 until 1978 [5] the union had permitted employees and nonemployees to post a wide variety of notices. Items posted on the board included for-sale notices, announcements of church revivals, nonunion political campaign materials, and even Playboy centerfolds.[6]

> (1) to restrain or coerce (A) employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section [7] * * * : Provided, That this paragraph shall not impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership therein[.]

Section 7 of the NLRB, 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976), provides:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be effected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment * * *.

Two other bulletin boards were also located in the employees' breakroom. The company kept its own bulletin board, which was glass-covered and locked, and which was used for posting work rules and safety notices. Occasionally, the company would also allow the union to place notices there. The third board, which was relatively small, was an all-purpose board used primarily to post notices regarding the employees' sick fund. This board was commonly referred to as the "sick fund board." [7]

In late 1978 petitioner Helton, who was a company employee and a union member, joined the Professional Drivers' Council (PROD). PROD is an organization of rank-and-file Teamsters that promotes truck safety and seeks to expose union corruption and pension fund abuse.[8] Shortly after he became a member Helton received some literature from PROD, including a copy of a newspaper article describing Internal Revenue Service charges against a Las Vegas gambler to whom the Teamsters' pension fund had loaned large sums of money and a PROD editorial critical of the Teamsters' pension fund management.[9]

On December 14, 1978 Helton posted the newspaper article and the PROD editorial on the union bulletin board. Later that day the union's job steward, acting pursuant to instructions of the union's business agent, removed this literature.[10] When Helton asked the business agent why the materials had been removed, the agent stated that "being a union official he had the legal right to add to or delete from that board, whatever he saw fit." [11] Several weeks later, on January 8, 1979, Helton posted new PROD material on the union board. This literature was also critical of the Teamsters and accused several union officials of improper and illegal conduct. Again the job steward removed the literature.[12] The union did not take any other action against Helton, however.[13]

Shortly after these incidents occurred the union board, the company board, and the sick fund board were removed from the breakroom so that the walls could be painted. When the painting was completed only the company board and the union board were returned. Both were placed under locked glass.[14] Thereafter Helton asked union officials for permission to post PROD literature on the union bulletin board. They refused to grant permission. However, they continued to allow employees to use the union bulletin board for nonunion business and for personal notices.[15]

Petitioner filed unfair labor practice charges against Teamsters Local 515 with the NLRB on February 6, 1979. The General Counsel issued a complaint, and a hearing was held before an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) in June 1979.[16] At the hearing the union's business agent testified that he had removed the PROD material from the bulletin board because:

> It was derogatory, it was adverse toward our local union and the Teamsters in general. And, I felt it shouldn't be there because it created controversy among the members * * * I felt it should not go on the board. * * *.[17]

In his decision the ALJ ruled that the union had committed an unfair labor practice under Section 8(b)(1)(A), which makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to "restrain or coerce * * * employees" in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act.[18] He began by stating that Helton's activities were clearly encompassed by Section 7.[19] He then observed that according to well settled precedent an employer would commit an unfair labor practice under Section 8(a)(1) if it prevented its employees from posting union literature on company bulletin boards but allowed them to post other noncompany materials.[20] The ALJ reasoned that unions should be held to the same standard of conduct with respect to their own bulletin boards.[21] In reaching this conclusion the ALJ found that the availabilty of alternative means of communication, for example, leaving the material on tables in the breakroom, was immaterial. He further found that there was no danger that employees would mistake PROD literature for official union literature and that, although the PROD literature was extremely critical of the union, it was not so offensive that it did not deserve protection. Finally, the ALJ rejected as "mere conjecture" the business agent's contention that the literature might lead to altercations among employees.[22]

The union filed exceptions to the ALJ's decision in September 1979. A three-member panel of the NLRB reversed by a vote of 2-1. The majority did not overturn any of the ALJ's findings of fact. It also conceded that Helton's activites were encompassed by Section 7. It ruled, however, that unions should not be held to the same standard of conduct as employers.[23] Section 8(a)(1) makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section [7]" (emphasis added).[24] Section 8(b)(1)(A), on the other hand, only makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents "to restrain or coerce" employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by Section 7.[25] According to the majority, there was no restraint or coercison here; the union did not discipline or threaten Helton, and its actions were "completely devoid of any implication of retribution * * *."[26] The majority also noted that "Helton had ready access to other, equally effective, means of distribution."[27]

The dissenting member of the panel would have found a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A). He argued that "it is difficult to conceive of a greater restraint or coercive impact on Section 7 rights than that which suppresses freedom of expression concerning matters inherent in that section."[28] The absence of a threat of reprisal did not "legitimize the action."[29] He agreed with the ALJ that the avail-

[29] Id. In his dissent Member Jenkins relied heavily on the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Magnavox Co., 415 U.S. 332, 94 S.Ct. 1099, 39 L.Ed.2d 358 (1974). In that case a union challenged an employer's rule against distribution of literature on company property. This rule was presumptively invalid. However, the collective bargaining agreement in effect between the union and the employer provided that the employer could issue rules governing use of plant property, it also provided that there would be bulletin boards for union notices. Thus the Court was confronted with the question whether the union had waived the employees' § 7 rights by agreeing to an otherwise invalid no-distribution rule in return for the use of a union bulletin board. The Court held that the union could not waive the individual employees' § 7 rights. The bulletin boards were not an adequate substitute since they were to be used only for union notices and thus would not give a union's adversaries an opportunity to communicate with their fellow employees.

Member Jenkins suggests that Magnavox effectively holds that a union may not restrict the employees' right to disseminate views critical of the ability of alternate channels of communication was immaterial.[30]

II. THE NLRB's INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 8(b)(1)(A)

As we have seen, the NLRB concedes that Helton's activities on behalf of PROD are encompassed by Section 7 of the Act.[31] It further concedes that under Section 8(a)(1) an employer may not prohibit employees from posting union materials on its bulletin board when it allows them access to the board for other purposes.[32] The NLRB reasons, however, that Section 8(b)(1)(A) is far more narrow than Section 8(a)(1); it only proscribes union conduct that involves threats of violence, economic reprisal, or discipline. To support this position it points out that 8(b)(1)(A) does not contain the words "interfere with."

We find that Section 8(b)(1)(A)'s prohibition against restraint or coercion does apply to the union conduct at issue here; its range of application is not limited to union conduct involving threats of violence or economic coercion.[33] The NLRB's narrow interpretation is inconsistent with the plan meaning of the statute and with the legislative history, is not supported by Supreme Court decision or the NLRB's own precedent, and is fraught with practical difficulties.

A. The Statutory Language and the Legislative History

As a preliminary matter, the meaning of a statute should be sought in the language in which it is framed. See Local 1976, United Brhd of Carpenters & Joiners v. NLRB, 357 U.S. 93, 100, 78 S.Ct. 1011, 1016, 2 L.Ed.2d 1186 (1958); see also Southeastern Community College v. Davis, 442 U.S. 397, 411, 99 S.Ct. 2361, 2369, 60 L.Ed.2d 980 (1976); Internat'l Brhd of Teamsters v. Daniel, 439 U.S. 551, 566 n.20, 99 S.Ct. 790, 800 n.20, 58 L.Ed.2d 808 (1979); Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470, 37 S.Ct. 192, 61 L.Ed. 442 (1917). The action taken by the union here certainly falls within the plain meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A). When the union removed Helton's literature from the bulletin board, it "restrained" him in the exercise of his Section 7 rights, at least as the word "restraint" is commonly understood.[34]

As the NLRB emphasizes, however, interpertation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) cannot be governed solely by reliance on the statutory language. The Taft-Hartley Act, which added Section 8(b)(1)(A) to the National Labor Relations Act, was "the result of conflict and compromise between strong contending forces and deeply held views on the role of organized labor in the free economic life of the Nation and the appropriate balance to be struck between the uncontrolled power of management and labor to further their respective interests." Local 1976, United Brhd of Carpenters & Joiners v. NLRB, supra, 357 U.S. at 99–100, 78 S.Ct. at 1016.[35] Thus the Supreme Court has stated that in-union. The majority distinguished Magnavox on several grounds. First, this case, unlike Magnavox, involved § 8(b)(1)(A) rather than § 8(a)(1). Second, there was no contractual waiver of individual employees' § 7 rights. Third, union policing of a union bulletin board is not equivalent to "the blanket denial to adversaries of 'equal access to and communications with their fellow employees.' " NLRB Decision, 248 NLRB at 83 n.2, App. 12 n.2 (quoting NLRB Magnovox Co., supra, 415 U.S. at 326, 94 S.Ct at 1102).

NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 65 S.Ct. 982, 89 L.Ed. 462 (1945) (no-solicitation rule that discriminates against union is not valid).

[33] We do not hold, however, that 8(b)(1)(A) is precisely analogous to § 8(a)(1). As we explain in Part III infra, the former differs from the latter in one essential respect: it contains a proviso which states that a union may prescribe rules "with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership[.]" 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(A) (1976). By including this proviso Congress recognized that the relationship between the union and the employee is not identical with that between the employer and the employee, and that the union has an interest in controlling its membership. We conclude that this proviso does not exempt the conduct at issue here.

[34] N. Webster, Third New International Dictionary 1936 (unabridged ed. 1961), states that to "restrain" means, inter alia, "to hold (as a person) back from some action, procedure, or course * * *." As Helton points out in his brief, petitioner's brief at 14, actions that limit First Amendment rights are commonly referred to as "restraints." See, e. g., Madison School District v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Comm'n, 429 U.S. 167, 177, 97 S.Ct. 421, 427, 50 L.Ed.2d 376 (1976); *Southeastern Promotions, Ltd. v. terpretations of Section 8(b)(1)(A) must be guided not just by the section's literal language, but also by an understanding of the congressional purpose. NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., 388 U.S. 175, 179, 87 S.Ct. 2001, 2005–06, 18 L.Ed.2d 1123 (1967); NLRB v. Drivers, Chauffeurs, Helpers, Local Union No. 639, 362 U.S. 274, 292, 80 S.Ct. 706, 716, 4 L.Ed.2d 710 (1960).[36] Our review of the legislative history fails to convince us that Congress intended Section 8(b)(1)(A) to apply solely to union conduct involving threats of violence, economic reprisal, or discipline.

The sponsors of the Taft-Hartley Act, in explaning their proposed legislation, focused primarily on the need to control union violence and economic coercion. For example, Senator Taft, in responding to a request for examples of the sort of conduct that Section 8(b)(1)(A) would prohibit, described threats of bodily harm, mass picketing in organization campaigns, and coercion that prevented employees not involved in a labor dispute from going to work. 93 Cong. Rec. 4435–4436 (1947), 2 Legislative History of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947 (Leg.Hist.) 1205–1206 (1948). See also 93 Cong.Rec. 4016–4017, 4271, 4432, 4434, 2 Leg.Hist. 1018–1021, 1139, 1199, 1203 (remarks of Senator Ball). However, nothing in the legislative history supports the conclusion that violence and economic reprisal were the sole evils at which Section 8(b)(1)(A) was aimed. rather, it appears that Congress intended Section 8(a)(1)(A) to cover a range of conduct as broad as that covered by Section 8(b)(1). Senator Ball, a cosponsor of the legislation, stated that "the purpose of the amendment is very simple. It is to insert an unfair-labor practice for unions identical with the first unfair labor practice prohibited to employers in the present act * * *." 93 Cong.Rec. 4016 (1947), 2 Leg.Hist. 1018 (emphasis added). See also 93 Cong.Rec. 4021, 4023, 4025, 4436 (1947), 2 Leg.Hist. 1028, 1031, 1032, 1207; S.Rep.No.105, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 50, 1 Leg.Hist. 456.

Omission of the words "interfere with" from Section 8(b)(1)(A) was not intended to indicate that union conduct should be measured against a less demanding standard than employer conduct. The legislation as originally proposed contained these words. They were deleted because it was feared that they would unduly restrict union organization campaigns; they might be "construed to mean that any conversation, any persuasion, any urging on the part of any person, in an effort to persuade another to join a labor organization, would constitute an unfair labor practice." 93 Cong.Rec. 4399 (1947), 2 Leg.Hist. 1138 (remarks of Senator Ives). Senator Taft agreed to the deletion because he was convinced it would have no effect on the application of Section 8(b)(1)(A):

> I have consulted with the attorneys and they tell me that elimination of the words "interfere with" would not, so far as they know, have any effect on the court decisions. Eliminating those words would not make any substantial change in the meaning. * * *

Id. (remarks of Senator Taft). Similarly, Senator Ball stated that "the words 'interfere with' are very vague," that even with respect to employers "no complaint is ever issued on the interference angle," and that, because union organizational activities might be affected, it is "important that such vague language be eliminated * * *." 93 Cong.Rec. 4399 (1947), 2 Leg.Hist. 1139 (remarks of Senator Ball).

B. Supreme Court Decisions Interpreting Section 8(b)(1)(A)

The NLRB argues that the Supreme Court decisions interpreting Section 8(b)(1)(A), which rely in part on the legislative history, support the position it has adopted here. We disagree. These decisions do not hold that Section 8(b)(1)(A) only proscribes union conduct involving threats of violence, intimidation, or economic reprisal.

The NLRB relies heavily on the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Drivers, Chauffeurs, Helpers, Local Union No. 639, supra. In that case the Court held that peaceful recognitional picketing by a labor union did not restrain or coerce employees within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A). The NLRB points out that in reaching this conclu-vision for unions. Of course, it is "a familiar rule, that a thing may be within the letter of the statute and yet not within the statute, because not within its spirits, nor within the intention of its makers." Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U.S. 457, 459, 12 S.Ct. 511, 512, 36 L.Ed. 226 (1892). These cases merely emphasize that this principle is particularly important in interpreting labor legislation. See also Nat'l Woodwork Manufacturers Ass'n v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612, 619–620, 87 S.Ct. 1250, 1254–1255, 18 L.Ed.2d 357 (1967) (making same point with respect to § 8(e), 29 U.S.C. § 158(e) (1976)).

sion the Court reviewed the legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act and concluded that the chief evil at which Section 8(b)(1)(A) was aimed was "the elimination of the use of repressive tactics bordering on violence or involving particularized threats of economic reprisal." 362 U.S. at 287, 80 S.Ct. at 714. The Court then emphasized the peaceful nature of the picketing in question. The NLRB suggests that by adopting this line of reasoning the Supreme Court endorsed a narrow interpretation of Section 8(b)(1)(A). However, the Court never expressly held that the sole purpose of Section 8(b)(1)(A) was to prevent union violence;[37] in particular, it never suggested that Section 8(b)(1)(A) might not apply to union conduct lying somewhere between threats of violence and simple peaceful persuasion. In fact, the Supreme Court decided to uphold peaceful recognitional picketing primarily because provisions in the House version of the bill that would have explicitly prohibited such picketing were deleted in conference. The Court also relied on statements in the Senate debates clearly indicating that the bill's sponsors did not intend it to apply to peaceful methods of persuasion. 362 U.S. at 287–289, 80 S.Ct. at 713–715.[38]

Although Drivers Local 639 might be read as containing some support for the NLRB's narrow interpretation of Section 8(b)(1)(A), a subsequent decision significantly undercut that support. In Internat'l Ladies' Garment Wkrs Union v. NLRB, 366 U.S. 731, 738, 81 S.Ct. 1603, 1607–08, 6 L.Ed.2d 762 (1961), the Supreme Court stated:

> In the Taft-Hartley law, Congress added § 8(b)(1)(A) to the [National Labor Relations] Act, prohibiting, as the Court of Appeals held, "unions from invading the rights of employees under § 7 in a fashion comparable to the activities of employers prohibited under § 8(a)(1)." * * * It was the intent of Congress to impose upon unions the same restrictions which the [National Labor Relations] Act imposed on employers with respect to violations of employee rights.

(Emphasis added; citation and footnote omitted.) The Court then held that, just as an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) by granting exclusive bargaining representative status to a union that does not have majority support, so also a union violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) by accepting such status.[39]

The NLRB also relies on the Supreme Court's decision in N.L.R.B. v. Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., supra, 388 U.S. 175, 87 S.Ct. 2001, 18 L.Ed.2d 1123. In that case the Court held that a union did not violate Section 8(b)(1)(A) when it fined its members for violating union membership rules. As the N.L.R.B. correctly points out, this union conduct would seem to fall within the literal meaning of the terms "restrain" or "coerce." However, the Court did not approve the union fines because it believed that the words "restrain or coerce" should be given a narrow interpretation.[40] Rather, [37] As the NLRB emphasizes, the Court does state that § 8(b)(1)(A) "is a grant of power to the Board limited to authority to proceed against union tactics involving violence, intimidation, and reprisal or threats thereof * * *." NLRB v. Drivers, Chauffeurs, Helpers, Local Union No. 639, 362 U.S. 274, 290, 80 S.Ct. 706, 715, 4 L.Ed.2d 710 (1960). It goes on to state, however, that § 8(b)(1)(A) requires "conduct involving more than the general pressures upon persons employed by the affected employers implicit in general economic strikes." Id. In other words, it leaves open the possibility that conduct lying somewhere between violence and peaceful recognitional picketing may be covered by the Act.

[38] The Court further observed that in the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 Congress legislated a comprehensive code governing organizational strikes and picketing. Although this statute prescribes peaceful strikes in some circumstances, it also prevents the NLRB from interfering with legitimate picketing activity. See 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(7)(C) (1976). The Court observed that if it were to interpret § 8(b)(1)(A) as applying to peaceful picketing it would interfere with this legislative scheme. Id. at 291, 80 S.Ct. at 716.

[39] The N.L.R.B.seeks to distinguish Internat'l Ladies' Garment Wkrs Union v. N.L.R.B, 366 U.S. 731, 81 S.Ct. 1603, 6 L.Ed.2d 762 (1961), on the ground that when an employer and a union enter into an agreement under which the employer recognizes the union as exclusive bargaining representative even though a majority of the employees do not support the union, they have engaged in "the very sort of direct economic coercion which Congress intended to prohibit." Respondent's brief at 16 n.8. We fail to understand how such agreements constitute economic coercion. The employees' jobs are not threatened in the same way that they are threatened by strikes or picketing. Nor do the employees face any other economic penalty. Certainly the Court's opinion does not characterize the agreement as economic coercion.

[40] The N.L.R.B. emphasizes that in Allis-Chalmers the Court again reviewed the legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act and noted that the chief evil at which it was aimed was union conduct involving threats of violence and economic reprisal. See N.L.R.B. v. Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., 388 U.S. 175, 184–190, 87 S.Ct. 2001, 2008–2012, 18 L.Ed.2d 1123 (1967). It did not hold, however, that § 8(b)(1)(A) would apply solely to such conduct. In fact, it also noted those portions of the legislative history suggesting that Congress intended the scope of § 8(b)(1)(A) to be as broad as the scope of § 8(a)(1). The Court referred to the legislative history primarily because it wished to demonstate the abesence of any intention to regulate the internal affairs of unions.

Other Supreme Court decisions have also suggested that § 8(b)(1)(A) is aimed primarily at violence or economic reprisal. Again, however, they do not hold that these are the only evils at which the provision is aimed. See N.L.R.B. v. Boeing Co., 412 U.S. 67, 78 n.15, 93 S.Ct. 1952, 1958–59 the Court decided to protect the union's conduct because it concluded that Congress had not intended to regulate internal union affairs. It noted that Section 8(b)(1)(A) contains an internal union affairs proviso, which states that the section "shall not impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership[.]" [41] The NLRB did not rely on this proviso in reaching its decision here. In any event, as we explain in Part III infra, we do not believe that the proviso protects the union's conduct.

C. NLRB Precedent

The NLRB further argues that it has consistently held that Section 8(b)(1)(A) applies only to union conduct involving threats of violence, economic coercion, or discipline. If this were true, deference to the agency interpretation might be appropriate. An administrative agency's consistent, longstanding interpretation of the statute under which it operates is entitled to considerable weight.[42] Internat'l Brhd of Teamsters v. Daniel, supra, 439 U.S. at 566 n.20, 99 S.Ct. at 800 n.20; United States v. Nat'l Ass'n of Securities Dealers, 422 U.S. 694, 719, 95 S.Ct. 2427, 2442–43, 45 L.Ed.2d 486 (1975); Saxbe v. Bustos, 419 U.S. 65, 74, 95 S.Ct. 272, 279, 42 L.Ed.2d 231 (1974); Investment Company Institute v. Camp, 401 U.S. 617, 626–627, 91 S.Ct. 1091, 1097, 28 L.Ed.2d 367 (1971); Udall v. Tallman, 380 U.S. 1, 16, 85 S.Ct. 792, 801, 13 L.Ed.2d 616 (1965). Even in its own decisions, however, the NLRB has not relied on a narrow inter pretation of Section 8(b)(1)(A); the N.L.R.B. has never before held that the section applies only to threats of violence, economic reprisal, or discipline.[43]

The NLRB has pointed out that the central focus of the congressional debate over the Taft-Hartley Act was on union tactics involving physical violence and economic coercion. See Nat'l Maritime Union [v. N.L.R.B.], 78 NLRB 971, 982–987, enforced, 175 F.2d 686 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 338 U.S. 954, 70 S.Ct. 492, 94 L.Ed. 589 (1949).[44]

Moreover, it has consistently held that union violence and intimidation violates Section 8(b)(1)(A). See, e.g., NLRB v. Union Nacional de Trabajadores, 540 F.2d 1 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1039, 97 S.Ct. 736, 50 L.Ed.2d 750 (1976) (enforcing NLRB order); Nat'l Cash Register Co. v. NLRB, 405 F.2d 497 (6th Cir. 1972) (same). And the Board has held that economic coercion is unacceptable under Section 8(b)(1)(A). See, e.g., Teamsters Local 1040, 174 NLRB 1153 (1969).[45] However, the NLRB has n.15, 36 L.Ed.2d 752 (1973); Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423, 428 n.4, 89 S.Ct. 1154, 1157 n.4, 22 L.Ed.2d 385 (1969). Both Scofield and Boeing, like Allis-Chalmers, involve the scope of the NLRB's authority to regulate internal union affairs.

[41] 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(A) (1976).

[42] On the other hand, this deference is constrained by the "obligation to honor the clear meaning of a statute, as revealed by its language, purpose, and history." Internat'l Brhd of Teasmsters v. Daniel, 439 U.S. 551, 566 n.20, 99 S.Ct. 790, 800 n.20, 58 L.Ed.2d 808 (1979). The language and history of § 8(b)(1)(A) do not support the NLRB's interpretation. Thus, even if the NLRB had consistently employed a narrow reading of the statute, we might have been unable to endorse that reading. See SEC v. Sloan, 436 U.S. 103, 117–119, 98 S.Ct. 1702, 1711–1712, 56 L.Ed.2d 148 (1978) (rejecting Securities & Exchange Commission's interpretation of Securities Act).

[43] We think it worthwhile to note that agencies have an obligation to be consistent in their adjudicative decisions. See, e. g., Sunbeam Television Corp. v. FCC, 243 F.2d 26 (D.C.Cir. 1957). This is not to say that they may never adjust previous rules of decision. See, e. g., Leedom v. Internat'l Brhd of Elec. Wkrs, 278 F.2d 237 (D.C.Cir 1960). At the very least, however, they must explain departures from past practice. See, e. g., Contractors Transport Corp. v. United States, 537 F.2d 1160 (4th Cir. 1976); Brennan v. Gilles & Cotting, Inc., 504 F.2d 1255 (4th Cir. 1974). By employing a narrow interpretation of § 8(b)(1)(A) in this case, the NLRB may not have fulfilled the requirement of consistency.

[44] In Nat'l Maritime Union, 78 NLRB 971, 982–987 (1948), enforced, 175 F.2d 686 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 338 U.S. 954, 70 S.Ct. 492, 94 L.Ed.2d 589 (1949), the Board held that a union did not violate § 8(b)(1)(A) when it called a strike against employers who would not agree to a contract provision that would have required them to use a union hiring hall. The NLRB reviewed the legislative history and concluded that "Congress was interested in eliminating physical violence and intimidation by unions or their representatives, as well as the use by unions of threats of economic action against specific individuals in an effort to compel them to join." 78 NLRB at 985. The NLRB then reasoned that Congress did not intend § 8(b)(1)(A) to be considered violated any time union conduct interfered with protected rights under § 7. Id. at 985–986. But Nat'l Martime Union does not hold that § 8(b)(1)(A) applies only to union conduct involving threats of violence or economic reprisal. Indeed, the decision also notes that portion of the legislative history which states that "[t]he purpose of the amendment is simply to provide that where unions * * * indulge in practices which, if an employer indulged in them, would be unfair labor practices, such as making threats or false promises or false statements, the union also shall be guilty of unfair labor practices." Id. at 983 (quoting 93 Cong.Rec. 4016 (1947), 2 Leg. Hist. 1058 (statement of Sen. Ball)).

[45] In Teamsters Local 1040, 174 NLRB 1153 (1969), the Board held that a union violates § 8(b)(1)(A) when it forbids its members to engage in strike-breaking by threatening job-related sanctions, such as blacklisting with future employers.

also found Section 8(b)(1)(A) violations in situations where the union had not threatened discipline or other retribution.

For example, in Internat'l Union of Elec., Radio & Machine Wkrs, Local 601, 180 NLRB 1062 (1970), an employee sought to exercise his Section 7 right to refuse to authorize a payroll dues deduction and to tender his dues by personal check instead. The union refused to accept his checks. The ALJ found that the union had violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) in part because he believed the union's conduct constituted an implied threat to the employee's job. In adopting the ALJ's proposed order the NLRB rejected this finding of an implied threat, stating "we do not find it necessary to rely on any surrounding threatening circumstances." Id. at 1062. The simple fact that the union had prevented the employee from exercising his Section 7 right to refuse to allow a payroll deduction was sufficient to support a finding of an unfair labor practice. Id.[46] Similarly, in General Motors Corp., 168 NLRB 1723 (1966), and General Motors Corp., 147 NLRB 509 (1964), the NLRB held that a union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) when it agreed to contractual provisions banning distribution of rival unions' literature during nonworktimes and in nonworking areas. The union's conduct in these cases, which presented an issue closely related to the issue we confront here, clearly did not involve threats of economic coercion.[47]

D. Practical Difficulties With NLRB interpretation

We also believe that the NLRB's interpretation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) poses substantial practical problems. The NLRB, the unions, and the courts would be required to distinguish between conduct that restrains or coerces employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights, but does not involve threats of violence or economic reprisal, and conduct that restrains or coerces employees and also involves threats of violence or economic reprisal. This line-drawing exercise, which would be unnecessary if the plain meaning of the statute controlled, would require resolution of difficult issues of fact.[48]

893

The facts of this case help illustrate the potential difficulties. The NLRB, which emphasized that no disciplinary action was ever taken against Helton, apparently believes that the union's conduct cannot be viewed as intimidation.[49] It might be argued, however, that the union's conduct carried an implicit threat, namely, that Helton would be punished if he continued his activities on behalf of PROD. Although this question was apparently not explored at the hearing before the ALJ, it is quite possible that Helton was intimidated by the union's action. Thus, under the NLRB's interpretation of Section 8(b)(1)(A), proper resolution of this case might require determining whether Helton felt threatened, whether his fears were reasonable, and whether the union intended to threaten Helton.[50] All of these questions would be avoided if the statute is interpreted to prohibit any action that restrains an employee in the exercise of his Section 7 rights.

III. RELEVANCE OF INTERNAL UNION

[46] The NLRB stated:

> The significant factor in this situation is that the only way in which an employee was permitted to comply with his obligation to remain a union member in good standing under a lawful union-security clause was to execute a dues checkoff authorization card. Such an obligation deprives the employee of his right to select or reject the checkoff system as the method by which to pay his periodic dues to the Union. The Board has repeatedly held that dues checkoff authorization must be made [ ]voluntarily,[ ] and that an employee has [ ]a right under Section 7 of the Act to refuse to sign checkoff authorization cards.[ ] Any conduct, express or implied, which coerces an employee in his attempt to exercise this right clearly violates Section 8(b)(1)(A).

Internat'l Union of Elec., Radio & Machine Wkrs, Local 601, 130 NLRB 1062 (1970) (footnotes omitted).

[47] The NLRB argues that these cases do involve economic coercion. "In waiving employee distribution rights in the contracts in those cases, the unions used the inherently coercive powers of the employer to prevent employee distribution of literature adverse to the unions * * *." Respondent's brief at 11. We find this contention unpersuasive. The union does not engage in economic coercion simply because it joins forces with the employer. Economic coercion, as we understand it, involves conduct that threatens employees with loss of their jobs or with some other pecuniary sanction. No such conduct occurred in the General Motors cases.

[48] We do not mean to imply that all § 8(b)(1)(A) cases would be easy if the ordinary meaning of the words "restrain or coerce" controlled. See NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., supra note 40, 388 U.S. at 179, 87 S.Ct. at 2005–2006 (referring to "inherent imprecision" of words "restrain or coerce"). We merely wish to point out that the NLRB's interpretation compounds the difficulties of application.

[49] The NLRB does not seem to have considered the possibility that the union's action might be viewed as an implicit threat, and thus fit within its interpretation of § 8(b)(1)(A).

[50] If the NLRB were willing to concede that implicit threats were prohibited under § 8(b)(1)(A), then it might also be forced to confront the question whether it is enough that an employee is actually frightened, or whether the employee's fears must be reasonable, that is, whether an objective or a subjective test controls.

AFFAIRS PROVISO

Section 8(b)(1)(A) is different from Section 8(a)(1) in one essential respect. As we noted in our discussion of Allis-Chalmers, supra, Section 8(b)(1)(A) contains an internal union affairs proviso which states that a union does not commit an unfair labor practice when it prescribes "its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership[.]" [51] This proviso extends some protection to union conduct that would otherwise fall within the prohibition against restraint or coercion of employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. We conclude, however, that it does not insulate the conduct at issue here.[52]

In adopting the internal union affairs proviso Congress recognized that unions have an interest in preserving and strengthening their positions as collective bargaining agents. It further recognized that they cannot serve this interest unless they have some freedom to discipline members who violate rules and regulations govering membership.[53] However, union power cannot be absolute. The desire to minimize intrusion upon internal union affairs must be balanced against the need to protect employees who wish to assert their independence from the union, as well as against any other public policies embodied in the federal labor laws.[54]

In Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423, 89 S.Ct. 1154, 22 L.Ed.2d 385 (1969), the Supreme Court set forth a test for determining whether union action is protected by the proviso that acccommodates these competing concerns. The Court stated that Section 8(b)(1)(A) leaves a union free to enforce "a properly adopted rule," provided that the rule (1) "reflects a legitimate union interest," (2) impairs no policy Congress has imbedded in the labor laws," and (3) "is reasonably enforced against union members who are free to leave the union and escape the rule." Id. at 430, 89 S.Ct. at 1158.[55]

The union's conduct here does not pass this test. At the outset, there is a serious question whether the union's decision to prohibit the posting of PROD materials was made pursuant to a "properly adopted rule." [56] Certainly there was no such rule in the union bylaws or constitution or in the collective bargaining agreement. Nor was Helton given any other form of prior notice.[57] But even assuming the union's action was pursuant to a valid rule, it fails to satisfy the three critera set forth in Scofield. First, removal of Helton's PROD materials does not reflect a legitimate union interest. The union claimed that removal was necessary to prevent altercations and to limit undesirable criticism. But the NLRB has expressly held that the desire to prevent controversy or to suppress criticism of union leadership does not constitute a legitimate union interest.[58] See Internat'l Union of Operating Engineers Local 400, 225 NLRB 596 (1976); Carpenters Local Union No. 22, 195 NLRB 1 (1972).[59] In any [51] 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(A) (1976).

[52] Although the internal union affairs proviso is discussed in the briefs on appeal, the NLRB did not rely on the proviso in its decision. Thus, even if it did protect the conduct at issue here, we could not affirm on this basis. See SEC. v. Chenery Corp., 318 U.S. 80, 63 S.Ct. 454, 87 L.Ed. 626 (1943). We discuss the proviso here to demonstrate that the union conduct cannot be justified on any grounds.

[53] See NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., supra, note 40, 388 U.S. at 180–182, 87 S.Ct. at 2006–2007. See also 93 Cong. Rec. 4272, 4433 (1947), 2 Leg. Hist. 1141, 1200 (statements of Sen. Ball); 93 Cong. Rec. 4024 (1947), 2 Leg. Hist. 1030 (statement of Sen. Taft).

[54] See Scofield v. NLRB, supra note 40; NLRB v. Industrial Union of Marine Workers, 391 U.S. 418, 88 S.Ct. 1717, 20 L.Ed.2d 706 (1968).

[55] In Scofield the Court applied this test to hold that a union fine and suspend union members for violating a union rule relating to production ceilings. Scofields v. NLRB supra note 40, 394 U.S. at 430–436, 89 S.Ct. at 1158–1161.

[56] The requirement that the disciplinary action be taken pursuant to a "properly adopted rule" is intended to protect union members from arbitrary of discriminatory union action. It might be argued that where the union did not act pursuant to properly adopted rule, but where it can show that its action was justified and that it did not behave in an arbitrary or discriminatory fashion, it deserves some protection under § 8(b)(1)(A); the proviso, as well as the legislative history, indicate a strong congressional desire to minimize instrusion upon internal union affairs. Even if this argument is correct, however, the principles set forth in Scofield would continue to apply; the union action would have to serve a legitimate union interest, it could not impair any policy imbedded in the labor laws, and there would have to be evidence suggesting that the employee could have escaped the union's action by resigning his union membership. We explain infra that the union conduct at issue here does not satisfy these requirements.

[57] On the other hand, even if the union did not have a formal rule against such postings when it decided to remove Helton's literature, its policy regarding such materials is now clear. Although it does not appear that a rule has been formally adopted, employees are on notice that if they post anti-union literature on the union bulletin board, it will be removed. Thus challenges to any future union action pursuant to this policy would probably be able to cross the initial hurdle erected by Scofield. See note 56 supra.

[58] The union clearly has some interest in maintaining a unified front; that interest does not extend to suppression of all criticism, however.

[59] In Internat'l Union of Operating Engineers Local 400, 225 NLRB 596 (1972), the NLRB held that a union rule prohibiting its members from holding unoffical meetings was invalid. After describing the Scofield test, it stated:

event, the ALJ found that the union's fear that "such literature could lead to altercations between parties" was "mere conjecture and without evident[i]ary support." [60]

Second, the union's conduct impairs policies imbedded in the labor laws. It restrained expression protected not only under Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act,[61] but also under Title I of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act (LMRDA), the "Bill of Rights" for union members.[62] Section 101(a)(2) of that statute, 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(2) (1976), provides that "[e]very member of any labor organization shall have the right to meet and assemble freely with other members; and to express any views, arguments or opinions[.]" [63] Congress intended this free speech right to parallel the rights conferred under the First Amendment; it hoped to secure union democracy by establishing a right to express dissenting views without fear of discipline. The LMRDA was in part "designed to protect the rights of union members to discuss freely and criticize the management of their unions and the conduct of their officers." Salzhandler v. Caputo, 316 F.2d 445, 448–449 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 996, 84 S.Ct. 344, 11 L.Ed.2d 275 (1963).[64]

The importance of protecting the free speech rights of union members has been consistently recognized by courts asked to consider the scope of Section 101(a)(2) of the LMRDA. See, e.g., Grand Lodge of Internat'l Ass'n of Machinists v. King, 335 F.2d 340, 344 (9th Cir.), cert denied, 379 U.S. 920, 85 S.Ct. 274, 13 L.Ed.2d 334 (1964).[65] Indeed the right of free speech has been described as "almost absolute." Turner v. Air Transport Lodge 1894 of Interna'l Ass'n of Ma-

> It can hardly be maintained with any degree of persuasion that a rule prohibiting members from meeting to attempt to generate support for a redirection in their representation's negotiating strategy is one which either reflects a legitimate union interest or * * * impairs no policy Congress has embedded in the labor laws.

Id. at 601. In Carpenters Local Union No. 22, 195 NLFB 1 (1972), the Board held that a union could not fine a member who had challenged a union election.

> Here the Union, in the guise of enforcing internal discipline, has sought to deprive its members of the right, as guaranteed by the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, to participate fully and freely in the internal affairs of his own union. A fine for that purpose not only in our opinion fails to reflect a legitimate union interest but rather in fact impairs a policy that Congress has imbedded in the labor laws.
> * * *

Id. at 2.

As the language quoted from Carpenters and Operating Engineers suggests, the questions whether a rule reflects a legitimate union interest and whether it overrides a policy imbedded in the labor laws are closely related. In both Carpenters and Operating Engineers the Board based its conclusion that the union rule did not reflect a legitimate union interest in part on the ground that it would interfere with rights extended under the Labor-Management Report and Disclosure Act. Carpenters Local Union No. 22, supra, 195 NLRB at 2; Internat'l Union of Operating Engineers Local 400, supra, 225 NLRB at 601–602. See also text and notes at notes 61–67 infra.

[62] Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (LMRDA), 29 U.S.C § 411 et seq. (1976). Moreover, § 101(a)(2) protects dissemination of written materials as well as speech, see Internat'l Brhd of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, Blacksmiths, Forgers & Helpers v. Rafferty. 348 F.2d 307 (9th Cir. 1965); Farowitrz v. Associated Musicians of Greater New York, Local 802, 330 F.2d 999 (2d Cir. 1965); Salzhandler v. Caputo, supra note 64; *Morrissey v. chinists, 590 F.2d 409, 410 (2d Cir. 1978).[66] Thus it is clear that the union conduct at issue here, by interfering with Helton's efforts to challenge the Teamsters' leadership, deprived him of rights guaranteed by the LMRDA. If the union's conduct were endorsed, an important policy of the federal labor laws would be undermined.[67]

As for the third prong of the Scofield test, it seems unlikely that Helton could have avoided the union's action by resigning his membership. Presumably, the union would have removed Helton's materials from the bulletin board even if he had not been a union member. Under the circumstances, it is difficult to view the union's activity simply as an effort to police its membership.[68]

IV. AVAILABILITY OF ALTERNATIVE MEANS OF COMMUNICATION

As further support for its decision in this case the NLRB notes that "Helton had ready access to other, equally effective, means of distributi[ng]" PROD material.[69] It suggests that Helton could have posted the material on the sick fund board, or simply left stacks of literature in the breakroom. This argument lacks merit.

In the first place, it is not clear that Helton actually did have access to equally effective alternatives. He was not permitted to use the locked company board. Items posted on the sick fund board, which is no longer available, might not have had the same impact as items posted on the union board. Leaving stacks of literature in the breakroom would have been an inadequate substitute because company custodians would have removed the literature whenever they cleaned up.[70] Moreover, there is no assurance that the union itself would not have removed such material. In any event, this approach would have been relatively expensive.

More important, the existance of alternatives is irrelevant. It is well established that the availability of other channels of communication does not justify employer restraint of employees' Section 7 rights in nonwork areas at nonwork times. In

NLRB v. Magnavox Co., 415 U.S. 322, 94 S.Ct. 1099, 39 L.Ed.2d 358 (1974), the Supreme Court stated that unless the employer could show that productivity or discipline required restraint of Section 7 rights, it would not be appropriate to "balance the availability of alternative channels of communication against a legitimate employer business justification for barring or limiting in-plant communications." Id. at 326–327, 94 S.Ct. at 1102–1103. See also Eastex, Inc. v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 556, 570–576, 98 S.Ct. 2505, 2514–2517, 57 L.Ed.2d 428 (1978); NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105, 113, 76 S.Ct. 679, 685, 100 L.Ed. 975 (1956); Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 65 S.Ct. 982, 89 L.Ed. 1372 (1945).[71] We see no reason why a different rule should apply here, where union conduct is at issue.[72] This simple fact that the union has attempted to restrain an employee in the exercise of his Section 7 rights is enough to justify a finding of a Section 8(b)(1)(A) violation.[73]

[66] As we have seen, the rights of union members under the LMRDA are analogous to the free speech rights secured by the First Amendment. It is therefore relevant to note that the First Amendment decisions strongly disapprove of any form of content regulation. See Office Dep't of City of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 95, 92 S.Ct. 2286, 2290, 33 L.Ed2d 212 (1972) ("above all else, the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content"); Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 24, 91 S.Ct. 1780, 1787–1788, 29 L.Ed.2d 284 (1971); Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576, 89 S.Ct. 1354, 22 L.Ed.2d 572 (1969); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 269–270, 84 S.Ct. 710, 720–721, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964).

[67] Indeed, even though the LMRDA does not explicitly grant enforcement powers to the NLRB, the NLRB has held that union conduct infringing upon LMRDA rights constitutes an unfair labor practice under § 8(b)(1)(A). See Internat'l Union of Operating Engineers Local 400, supra note 59; Carpenters Local Union No. 22, supra note 59. These decisions provide an independent basis for our conclusion that the union's conduct in this case violates § 8(b)(1)(A). Again, it is clear that the union's conduct deprived Helton of rights secured under the LMRDA.

[68] Even if this surmise is incorrect, our conclusion remains the same. The union's conduct clearly fails to pass the other two requirements of the Scofield test.

[69] NLRB Decision, 248 NLRB at 83, App. 13.

[70] Testimony of Helton, reprinted at App. 45.

[71] The NLRB has consitently ruled that the presence of alternative methods of communication is not relevant in determining the rights of employees. See H & F Binch Co., 168 NLRB 929, 935 (1967); Armco Steel Corp. [v. N.L.R.B.] 148 NLRB 1179, 1185 (1964), enforcement denied, 344 F.2d 621 (6th Cir. 1965). Most circuit courts also embrace this view. See United Steelworkers of America v. NLRB, 393 F.2d 661 (D.C. Cir. 1968); NLRB v. United Aircraft Corp., 324 F.2d 128 (2d Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 376 U.S. 951, 84 S.Ct. 969, 11 L.Ed.2d 971 (1964); Time-O-Matic, Inc. v. NLRB, 264, F.2d 96 (7th Cir. 1959).

[72] The NLRB argues that the availability of alternatives is relevant where union conduct is involved because it demonstrates that the union "has not engaged in collusion with the Company to alter employee communication rights incident to the employment relationship." Respondent's brief at 13 n.4. In other words, it has not engaged in economic coercion by relying on the economic power implicit in the employer-employee relationship. But we have already rejected the NLRB's contention that simple restraint is not enough to violate § 8(b)(1)(A), and that the union must engage in economic coercion or threaten violence. In any event, we find the NLRB's claim that union conduct closing all channels of communication constitutes economic coercion to be unconvincing. See note 47 supra.

V. CONCLUSION

We conclude that the union committed an unfair labor practice. The union's conduct constituted restraint of Helton's Section 7 rights within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A). It was not insulated by the internal union affairs proviso since it did not serve a legitimate union interest and would have frustrated the free speech rights guaranteed by the LMRDA. Even if alternative means of comunication were available, their availability was irrelevant. We grant Helton's petition for review. The NLRB will submit a proposed decree in accordance with this opinion.

So ordered.

Vitek Electronics, Inc. v. NLRB

653 F.2d 785 (3rd Cir.), June 30, 1981—249 NLRB 885

On petition to review and cross-petition to enforce Board Order

Before Rosenn and Higginbotham, Circuit Judges, and McCune, District Judge[*]

Rosenn, Circuit Judge: This petition for review and cross-application for enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board presents a number of issues concerning the propriety of union conduct preceding a representation election. On April 5, 1979, the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers (the IUE or Union) filed a petition with the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) for a representation election at the Edison, New Jersey, plant of Vitek Electronics, Inc. The election, involving a bargaining unit of 120 employees previously not represented by a union, was held June 7, 1979. The Union won, 70 to 45. Vitek filed eight objections with the Board's Regional Director (the "RD"). After an administrative investigation that included ex parte interviews with potential Vitek witnesses, but no hearing, the RD recommended that Vitek's objections be overruled. Vitek filed exceptions with the Board, but the Board, also without a hearing, adopted the RD's findings and recommendations.

Vitek, as a method of challenging the election, subsequently refused to bargain with the Union. On February 4, 1980, the General Counsel issued a complaint alleging violation of section 8(a)(1) & (5) of the National Labor Relations Act. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) & (5) (1976). The Board entered summary judgment in favor of the General Counsel because the only issues raised by Vitek were essentially already litigated and lost by Vitek in the underlying representation case. Vitek filed this petition for review of the Board's subsequent order; the Board has cross-applied for enforcement. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) & (f) (1976).

Our review is essentially a review of the Regional Director's post-election findings and conclusions as adopted by the Board. See Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 61 S.Ct. 908, 85 L.Ed. 1251 (1941); Anchor Inns, Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 292, 293 (3rd Cir. 1981). In his report the RD dealt with Vitek's eight objections in four groups. On its petition to this court Vitek attacks the findings and conclusions with respect to two of these groups of objections—one alleging union intimidation and another alleging union misrepresentation in campaign literature. We conclude that Vitek's objections to the Union's alleged misrepresentations, as presented to the RD, disclosed "substantial and material factual issues" that required the RD or the Board to conduct an evidentiary hearing prior to certification of the election results. We grant the petition for review and deny enforcement.

I.

According to Vitek's initial submission to the RD, "[o]n the day of the election itself, and possibly on * * * the day prior to the election, the Union distributed to employees" two "handbills" (among others) whose contents were allegedly false. One was titled "IUE-Vitek News" (the "News" handbill) dated June 4, 1979. Its front page declared that although [73] In addition to his claim that the union committed an unfair labor practice, Helton contends that it breached its duty of fair representation. First, he suggest that any arbitrary union action violates the duty. Second, he argues that the union was not entitled to agree to contract terms that restricted postings on its bulletin board to official union business. We need not reach these arguments here. See also note 21 supra (noting that we neither approve nor disapprove the ALJ's statement that union action would have been justified if it had enforced contract provision limiting use of bulletin board to union matters).

[*] Honorable Barron P. McCune, United States District Judge for the Western District of Pennsylvania, sitting by designation.

> [l]atest figures issued by the government indicate that the cost of living is going up at a rate of 14% . . . the Vitek Company provides no cost of living protection for its workers, another reason why we need a union at Vitek.
> In other plants in this area, where the people have previously voted in the IUE, the Union has negotiated cost of living protective clauses.
>
> Under their union contract
> - AT EDISON PRODUCTS (WHITE-WESTINGHOUSE), EDISON, N.J.
> - AT GULTON INDUSTRIES, METUCHEN, N.J.
> - AT DELCO BATTERY, NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J.
> the wages of IUE members are increased regularly, throughout the year, to keep pace with the cost of living increase announced by the U.S. Department of Labor.
>
> This is the kind of protection we need at Vitek where wages are low enough without being further "cut" by runaway prices.

(Emphasis added.)

Vitek asserted that the IUE contracts at Edison Products, Gulton Industries, and Delco Battery did "not guarantee to employees absolute and unlimited protection against cost of living increases, as stated in the Union leaflet. Rather those cost of living formulas are 'capped' and keyed to a specific formula."

Another handbill was entitled "A Story By and For Vitek Workers" (the "Story" handbill). "Chapter One" of this story told the following unhappy tale:

> In the "good ole" days, before the union came on the scene, the company had every opportunity to make Vitek a decent place to work.
> But they goofed. Rates of pay were the lowest in the area. Seniority meant nothing when it came to promotions or overtime.
> Few safety precautions were taken to protect the people from carbon monoxide fumes, and when they got sick because of the fumes, many of the workers lost pay.
> Employees could be fired with no chance of appeal and all in all, management was completely in the driver's seat. (Emphasis added.)

Vitek contended that these statements were "completely false and misleading. For example, Vitek's rates of pay are among the highest in the area for similar work." [1] As to both handbills, moreover, Vitek claimed that the timing of the distribution effectively precluded Vitek from having "an adequate opportunity to obtain the necessary information and to prepare and distribute an appropriate response to these misrepresentations."

On June 27, 1979, Vitek's president, Robert G. Geissler, submitted an affidavit to the RD in support of Vitek's objections. He detailed the circumstances making impossible effective rebuttal of the Union's misrepresentations. He also explained why the Union handbills were, in his view, false and misleading. He noted that a Board agent had been provided with copies of the collective bargaining agreements between the IUE and Edison, Gulton, and Delco. Geissler also provided a comparison of Vitek's wages (both before and after April 15, 1979) and current wages at ten other area employers for allegedly comparable "unskilled" work. This comparison showed that of the eleven companies, Vitek's wages had been not the lowest but the highest, both before and after April 15, 1979.

Apparently in response to the Board agent's request for further information, Vitek submitted additional information in support of its objections, including a list of its various pay scales in effect from January 2, 1976 (the date on which "Vitek started hiring its own employees") through April 14, 1979. This list confirmed Geissler's earlier assertion, and showed that Vitek's wages had, since at least October 24, 1977 (and not, as suggested by the dissent, only since April 15, 1979), exceeded those of ten local labor-market competitors.

[1] Vitek made and supported objections to other alleged misrepresentations in the "Story" handbill. Its petition in this court preserves these same objections. In view of our conclusion that a hearing was warranted by at least one misrepresentation in this handbill, we do not find it necessary to discuss in detail all of Vitek's additional arguments based on this handbill. But see note 10 infra. Upon remand Vitek will have the opportunity to show, in the course of a hearing, all of the prejudicial effects flowing from it.

Finally, on August 31, Vitek submitted detailed calculations of the precise extent to which the Union's "News" handbill had misrepresented its cost of living agreements at Edison, Gulton and Delco.

In his report, adopted by the Board, the Regional Director overruled all of Vitek's objections and recommended that the Union be certified. Regarding the Union's "Story" handbill, the RD held that "in the good ole days, before the Union came on the scene" referred to "some unspecified period of time in the past."[2] On the other hand, the evidence marshalled by Vitek to counter the assertions concerning relative wage rates related only to wages that took effect as of October 24, 1977. Thus, the RD found that there was "no evidence * * * submitted to support the Employer's assertion that the Petitioner's contention concerning wages was a material misrepresentation of fact." Further, the RD found that even if this was a misrepresentation, Vitek had (a) "prompted" it by its April 2 announcement to employees that it was conducting a "study of area wages," and (b) deliberately chosen to let it remain uncontested. Regarding the "News" handbill, relating to cost of living adjustment (COLA) clauses, it was "undisputed that Petitioner [i.e., the Union] does in fact have cost of living protective clauses which are designed to keep pace with increases in the cost of living albeit not at the actual rate of increase in the cost of living." Thus, the RD found that the handbill was not a "substantial departure from the truth." For these reasons, among others, the representations were held to be immaterial to the validity of the election.

II.

We begin by noting what was, prehaps, too obvious for the RD to mention in his report. Both of the handbills at issue here contained representations as to which Vitek raised at least a genuine issue concerning their falsity. Vitek's president stated by sworn affidavit that Vitek's pre-April 15, 1979 wage scale exceeded those of ten local competitors. Vitek further documented its claim that this same wage scale had existed since October 1977, well before the Union had "come to the scene" to engage in the current organization effort.[3] Thus, Vitek, did submit "comparative data * * * concerning * * * competitors' wage structures" that, if true, seemed to negate the truth of the Union's claim that Vitek's wages were "the lowest in the area." Secondly, it is apparent from the face of the Union's "News" handbill that in it the Union seemed to claim that its contracts at other plants insulated workers from the adversities of inflation. And Vitek clearly presented ample evidence to show that in fact those contracts fell short of such absolute protection by unquestionably substantial amounts: between 33 and 89 cents per hour, averaging 61 cents per hour.

Significantly, the RD never went so far as to find that the Union's statements were more than "arguably true." We agree. The other side of the coin, of course, is that he was implicitly saying that they were at least "arguably untrue." And Vitek's objections and supporting materials were sufficiently specific to raise a prima facie case of inaccuracy.

However, in assessing campaign rhetoric, "the Board tolerates a degree of hyperbole, intemperance and inaccuracy." Aircraft Radio Corp. v. NLRB, 519 F.2d 590, 593 (3d Cir. 1975). Thus, while we objectively raise the arguable falsity implicit in the "arguable" truth attributed by the RD to the Union's literature, this issue does not in itself afford us adequate ground for granting Vitek's petition. An election will only be set aside when there has been a substantial departure from the truth that "may reasonably be expected to have a significant impact on the election." General Knit of California, Inc., 239 N.L.R.B. 619, 620 (1978).

Nor do we conclude on the basis of inaccuracy alone that Vitek's objections raised the "substantial and material factual issues" necessary to entitle it to a hearing under 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(d) (1980). In numerous decisions since Hollywood Ceramics Co., 140 N.L.R.B. 221 (1962), the Board and the courts have recognized many elements that render a misrepresentation "immaterial" in this sense. Thus, the force of a misrepresentation may be substantially diluted when the employees possess special independent knowledge or sophistication which enables them to evaluate the statements critically;[4] where the employees had no reason to believe that the author of certain verbal denigration had any special knowledge on which they could rely;[5] where the employer had an adequate opportunity to set the record straight;[6] or where the inaccuracy is itself too minor or insignificant to affect the voters' choice, i.e., is not a "substantial departure from the truth." Hollywood Ceramics Co., 140 N.L.R.B. at 224.

[2] In any event, the period must have pre-dated April 5, 1979, the date on which the Union petitioned for an election.

[3] In fact, Vitek submitted evidence of its own wage scales for a period extending back to January 1976. Given the rate of inflation in the economy as a whole, and given the size of Vitek's wage rate increase in 1977, there was good reason to believe that Vitek's competitors, whose 1979 wage rates fell below Vitek's 1979 rates, similarly lagged behind Vitek in 1976 and 1977.

Although this brief catalog is not complete, it necessarily informs us that factual determinations must enter into the decision whether the misrepresentations here warranted setting aside this election. See NLRB v. Bill's Institutional Commissary Corp., 418 F.2d 405, 407 (5th Cir. 1969). Taking into account the proffer submitted by Vitek to support its post-election objections, we are persuaded that the grounds upon which the RD recommended certification could not adequately be developed without an evidentiary hearing. Of course, in reaching this conclusion that Vitek's ob- 791 jections entitled it to a hearing, our inquiry necessarily touches upon areas committed in some degree to the Board's discretion.[7] However, the ultimate question that we reach and decide today—whether Vitek has raised substantial and material factual issues—"is a question of law and ultimately a question for the courts." NLRB v. Bata Shoe Co., 377 F.2d 821, 826 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 917, 88 S.Ct. 238, 19 L.Ed.2d 265 (1967) (citing, inter alia, NLRB v. Sun Drug Co., 359 F.2d 408, 415 (3d Cir. 1966) (denying a request for an evidentiary hearing on the issue "whether there was a substantial and material question of fact" because "[t]his is a question of law")); accord, NLRB v. Polyflex M Co., 622 F.2d 128, 129 (5th Cir. 1980) (per curiam); Methodist Home v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 1173, 1179 (4th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Skelly Oil Co., 473 F.2d 1079, 1083 n.5 (8th Cir. 1973).

Because the representations were purportedly truthful assertions concerning wages, they could not be dismissed as "mere prattle or puffery"; wages are the breath and "stuff of life for Unions and members, the self-same subjects concerning which men organize and elect representatives." Peerless of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 576 F.2d 119, 124 (7th Cir. 1978) (quoting Contract Knitter, Inc. v. NLRB, 545 F.2d 967, 971 (5th Cir. 1977)). The Union's claim that it was describing its own contracts with nearby employers, as well as general wage rates in its geographical area of operation, lent its misrepresentations an air of authenticity that likely carried significant weight in the minds of Vitek's employees. Moreover, the Union's apparent expertise in this field was not countered by independent knowledge that Vitek's previously nonunionized employees were likely to possess.

Finally, the statements, insofar as they were (arguably) untrue, were hardly "insubstantial" departures from the truth. For instance, the Board does not dispute that IUE contract wages at Edison, Gulton, and Delco had, in the recent past, lost an average of 61 cents per hour to inflation. Thus IUE wages failed, by this amount, "to keep pace with" inflation, (arguably) contrary to the representation made in the "News" handbill. The realities of the marketplace render it indisputable that a 61 cent per hour misrepresentation of the wages obtained by the Union for workers in other bargaining units would have been a distortion of sufficient magnitude to exert an impermissible influence on the election results. NLRB v. Millard Metal Service Center, Inc., 472 F.2d 647, 650 (1st Cir. 1973); see also Howard Plating Industries v. NLRB, 635 F.2d (6th Cir. 1980) (per curiam); Luminator Division of Gulton Industries, Inc. v. NLRB, 469 F.2d 1371 (5th Cir. 1972).

The RD argued in his report that the interpretive premise of this objection was not "necessarily" correct. The "News" handbill did not, said the RD, literally assert the existence of COLA clauses to "guarantee to employees absolute and unlimited protection." In fact, the handbill stated that IUE member wages were "increased regularly * * * to keep pace with the cost of living increase announced by the U.S. Department of Labor." The RD noted that adjustments "to" keep pace with inflation were "quite different" than adjustments that "would" keep pace with, and therefore afford "absolute protection" against, inflation. He concluded that the handbill contained not a simple lie, but rather a statement "subject to varying interpretations."

Cactus Drilling Corp.*, 455 F.2d 871, 876 (5th Cir. 1972) (distinguishing rebuttal from opportunity to rebut).

[7] The scope of that discretion has, of course, been effectively narrowed over the years since Hollywood Ceramics was handed down, as this and other courts have gradually given factual content to the rather abstract pronouncements in the Board's seminal decision.

For purposes of determining whether a genuine issue of fact existed as to the accuracy of the statement, we have difficulty, to say the least, appreciating this subtle distinction. We think such subtlety would be even less appreciated by employees in the heat of an election campaign. Furthermore, we find incomprehensible the RD's conclusion that "to keep pace with" and "would keep pace with" the cost of living were "quite different." If two workers each start the year making $3.30 per hour but at the end of the year their wages differ by $.61 per hour, it satisfies neither common sense nor common English usage to assert that the wages of either have been adjusted "to keep pace with" the wages of the other. Even the Board's reputed expertise in labor matters[8] cannot prompt us to accept the RD's conclusory determination that Vitek's workers would be likely to interpret the phrase "to keep pace with" in such a way as to render the Union's handbill congruent with the truth.

As a result, we conclude that Vitek's objections and supporting material established a prima facie case for setting aside the election because of the content of the Union handbills. This, together with the apparent last-minute nature of the union misrepresentations, entitled Vitek to a hearing on its objections. Anchor Inns, Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d at 296; see, e. g., Peerless of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 576 F.2d 119 (7th Cir. 1976); NLRB v. Mr. Fine, Inc., 516 F.2d 60 (5th Cir. 1975); NLRB v. Bill's Institutional Commissary Corp., 418 F.2d 405 (5th Cir. 1969); see also NLRB v. Staiman Brothers, 466 F.2d 564, 567 (3d Cir. 1972) ("It is implicit in a Consent Election agreement that * * * any proceedings pursuant thereto will satisfy minimal due process standards."). The RD, however, looked to other facts which he believed made the alleged misrepresentations immaterial. According to his report, > the investigation revealed that the Employer, by letter dated April 2, 1979, advised its employees that it was conducting a "study of area wages," and by letter dated April 17, 1979, announced its newly established wage rates. It therefore appears that * * * [the Union's] statement regarding wages * * * was prompted by the actions of the Employer itself; and as the Employer had already conducted a study of area wages, it appears that it could have immediately and effectively responded to [the Union's] statement notwithstanding its statement to the contrary. * * * [T]he Employer, although admittedly aware of Petitioner's statement a full day before the election and having recently conducted a wage comparability study within the area, chose to let Petitioner's statement remain uncontested.

The Regional Director thus appears to have resolved factual issues bearing on materiality through consideration of material uncovered in an administrative investigation. But "[o]nce the right to a hearing is established, the investigation is not a substitute for it." Anchor Inns. Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d at 297 (quoting NLRB v. Claxton Manufacturing Co., 613 F.2d 1364, 1366 (5th Cir. 1980)). In this case the data submitted to the Board raised "substantial and material issues" regarding all of the necessary factual predicates for overturning the election, including Vitek's preclusion from timely offering a rebuttal to the Union's misrepresentations.[9] Yet the RD chose to resolve these issues not through a hearing but through an administrative investigation. Not only did this deprive Vitek of an opportunity to meet those arguments marshalled by the RD to negate materiality, but it also deprived this court and the Board of an adequate basis upon which to evaluate the validity of the process by which the RD arrived at his findings that the misrepresentations were immaterial.

[8] See Zieglers Refuse Collectors, Inc. v. NLRB, 639 F.2d 1000, 1010 (3d Cir. 1981); cf. Peerless of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 576 F.2d at 122 n.3 ("scholarly criticism for more than a decade has questioned that expertise").

[9] President Geissler averred in his affidavit that I was unable to present this information to our employees before they voted because the Union made its allegations concerning our pay rates on the very last day and it was impossible to assemble the information on "Exhibit 3" [the list of ten area competitors with wage rates lower than Vitek] prior to the vote. In fact, it has taken my staff more than two (2) weeks to assemble the information on "Exhibit 3", since many companies are nataurally reluctant to reveal their wage rates to outsiders.

Our reluctance to accept the RD's findings without the benefit of a record after hearing is compounded by the shallow basis upon which the RD overruled Vitek's objections. He seems to have held that (a) the Union's misrepresentation of past area wage rates was pardonable because it was "prompted" by Vitek's announcement of a current "study of area wages," and (b) Vitek's announcement of a wage study dispelled any genuine factual issue concerning its ability to respond to the Union's misrepresentation in the one available day preceding the election.

We fail to perceive how Vitek's April 2 announcement of a wage study provided justification for Union misrepresentation of area wages that prevailed in "the 'good ole' days." Vitek's announcement did not make factual claims that the Union was forced to rebut. Had that occurred, we might take into account whether the Union was time-pressured into an erroneous rebutal based upon tentative conclusions. We express no opinion whether under such a hypothetical set of facts, this court would also "excuse" plain misrepresentations. However, the record of this case discloses no substantial evidence upon which to predicate such a holding. The Union's alleged misrepresentation was published over two months following Vitek's announced study. More centrally, the Union misrepresentation referred to past wage rates, while Vitek's study was aimed at current rates. In addition, the RD relied on nothing but sheer supposition in assuming that, prior to the election, Vitek possessed sufficient data to rebut the wage claims. The RD did not indicate whether a formal study was actually made, or if so, how it was conducted, or what it revealed. We can understand how the mere announcement of a planned study might enter into a credibility determination on the issue of ability to rebut. We cannot, however, understand how the making of such an announcement can be used by the RD to deprive Vitek of the forum to which it would be otherwise entitled (viz., an evidentiary hearing) in which to resolve the rebuttal issue.

We similarly reject the RD's resolution of the COLA issue on the ground that it involved no 'substantial departure from the truth." In concluding that the Union's "News" handbill was subject to "varying interpretations," the RD drew his ultimate distinction between truth and falsity by resort to a specious semantic distinction. As a result, we do not believe that he could properly determine on the basis of his investigation that, as a factual matter, the audience to which it was addressed would adopt an interpretation other than Vitek's. In view of the significance of the alleged discrepancy and our own skepticism that the item would be interpreted as other than a misrepresentation, we conclude that the RD should not have reached his decision without first affording Vitek a hearing in which to challenge the RD's assumption that the handbill would be interpreted by its intended audience consistently with the truth of the underlying facts.[10]

III.

[10] The RD also found, in connection with the "Story" handbill, that there was "no evidence * * * submitted by the Employer that it had a seniority job-posting program or grievance procedure prior to April 2, 1979." Also the Union's assertion relating to lost pay from sickness due to carbon monoxide fumes was found by the RD to be, in part, corroborated. Nor was the RD troubled by the assertion that "[F]ew safety precautions were taken," since "no evidence was offered to show which steps were taken. Accordingly, I again find Petitioner's statement arguably true, and if steps were in fact taken to improve ventilation, employees would have been aware of these actions and, therefore, fully capable of evaluating Petitioner's statement."

We are not impressed by the harmlessness of the Union's allegations about carbon monoxide fumes and lost pay. Although the Union claims in this case do not match the invidiousness or the falseness of the claim in NLRB v. Trancoa Chem. Corp., 303 F.2d 456 (1st Cir. 1962), or portray "spiteful, inhuman treatment" as in Ipsen Indus. Div. of Alcoa Standard Corp., 180 N.L.R.B. 412 (1969), we cannot be blind to the significant impact in the context of this campaign that the Union's fume-related literature may have had. It conveyed the impression that the factory was generally unsafe, that Vitek callously put workers to the rather barbaric choice between ruining their health or earning their pay, and that it was the appearance of the Union "on the scene" that had created the present, more healthful climate at the Vitek plant.

However, Vitek submitted evidence that the fume problems were a transitory, short-term problem related to Vitek's February 1979 move and that the problem arose and was resolved in a matter of weeks after the move. Moreover, its evidence tended to show that the only workers who lost pay due to claimed illness were those for whom Vitek had no reason to believe that it or its heating gas system were to blame. Thus the implication in the handbill, namely that Vitek improved its treatment of employees only after "the Union came on the scene," may well have amounted to a significant distortion of the truth.

Vitek has also argued here and below that it was entitled to a hearing on the question of whether the Union poisoned the pre-election atmosphere by intimidation. Vitek argues that a hearing is necessary because it needs compulsory process to compel testimony in its favor that would otherwise remain silenced by the thoroughness of the Union's intimidation.

Unfortunately, there is no adequate record here from which to tell whether the RD correctly determined that no hearing was necessary. When Vitek presented the RD with its allegations of intimidation, supported by nine affidavits specifying numerous "specific events concerning specific people," NLRB v. Dobbs House, Inc., 613 F.2d 1254, 1259 (5th Cir. 1980), the RD concluded that three of the affidavits, even if true, set forth legally permissible behavior. He explained his legal conclusions at length. Next, the RD distinguished seven employees named in the other affidavits whose "suggested evidence * * * if supported by these witnesses themselves, would set forth arguable objectionable conduct." Yet the RD did not identify which employees, or which incidents, were cause for concern. A Board agent interviewed the (unnamed) witnesses. Their interviews apparently did not corroborate the arguably objectionable conduct set forth in the affidavits. The RD declines to interview six of the employees named in the affidavits because the evidence proferred concerning their testimony did not even arguably consitute objectionable conduct. Again, the RD did not explain which six employees or incidents he found useless to his inquiry.[11]

As a result, we cannnot tell whether Vitek's affidavits did or did not, in the RD's view, set forth "substantial and material issues of fact." Nor, in view of the uncertainly of the substantive legal questions raised by the affidavits and the importance of the right to a hearing, will we decide the question on our own de novo review of the affidavits views on the subject. The Board argues that the RD, like a trial judge on motion for summary judgment, is entitled to ignore issues of fact that are raised by affidavits not setting "forth such facts as would be admissible in evidence." Fed. R.Civ.P. 56(e). Because most of the legally objectionable incidents are allegedly set forth by way of hearsay, the Board now argues that the RD was entitled to ignore those incidents for purposes of deciding whether there was a substantial and material issue of fact. This contention deserves little credence on this appeal for at least three reasons. First, the RD did not draw any distinction between hearsay and nonhearsay evidence of objectionable conduct, and its impossible for us to assume, on this record, that this was the sole or dispositive basis for his decision not to hold a hearing.[12]

795

Second, Rule 56(e) does not apply here, but even if it did, and even if the evidence relating to the legally objectionable incidents was solely hearsay, it might still be admissible in evidence in the requested hearing.[13] Finally, it is undisputed that at least some of the narrations in the supervisors' affidavits were not hearsay for all purposes. We find it inappropriate at this time to engage in a de novo determination of what those purposes might be and whether or not they would actually warrant the RD in refusing to admit them at hearing. The RD may set forth his reasons for so finding, should he choose to once again deny Vitek a hearing on the intimidation issue.

IV

The case will be remanded with direction to the Regional Director to conduct a hearing on the issues of the alleged misrepresentation and for appropriate findings on the need for any further requested hearings prior to any recommendation to certify the results of the election.

---

[11] Vitek has asked this court to require that the RD submit the results of its ex parte investigation to the Board for its review. See generally NLRB v. North Elec. Co., 644 F.2d 580 (6th Cir. 1981). Because Vitek's request could affect only the Board's decision on the merits of the intimidation claim, and because we are unable to dispose of the threshold issue, viz, whether or not absence of a hearing on this claim was justified, it will be unnecessary for us to confront Vitek's request at this time. We therefore find it unnecessary to grant Vitek's motion in this court to amend the record on reivew for purpose of informing us as to the RD's failure to submit particular documents to the Board.

[12] See, e.g., NLRB v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 380 U.S. 438, 444, 85 S.Ct. 1061, 13 L.Ed.2d 951 (1965); Monmouth Medical Ctr. v. NLRB, 604 F.2d 820, 823 n.5 (3d Cir. 1979).

We cannot help but notice that the RD's inability to believe the content of the supervisor affidavits may indeed have played a large role in his failure to overturn the election. Thus for all that this record show, the RD may have impermissibly used the administrative investigation to resolve an issue of credibility that could only be properly resolved after a hearing.

[13] Subject to certain exceptions not relevant here, "[a]ny hearing" before the regional director on objections to the conduct of an election "shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of * * * [29 C.F.R. [§ 102.66] * * *." 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(e) (1980). Section 102.66(a) provides that "[t]he rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law and equity shall not be controlling."

Costs taxed against the Board.

I.

A. Leon Higginbotham, Jr., Circuit Judge, dissenting: This case presents the question whether the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) erred in certifying the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union) after an election campaign in which it was alleged that the Union misrepresented material facts and intimidated employees.[1] Vitek Electronics, Inc. (Vitek) argues that it did not have adequate time to respond to the Union's misrepresentations and that certain threats made by the Union and its agents against Vitek employees necessitated a hearing before the Regional Director (RD) to determine if the "laboratory conditions" of the election were so polluted as to require the setting aside of the Union's 70 to 45 victory.

The majority concludes that the RD and the Board erred by failing to grant Vitek a hearing. Thus, it ordered the Board to set aside the Union's 25 vote majority and to conduct a hearing on Vitek's objections. I have concluded that the Board could find that the Union's statement were within the permissible range of campaign rhetoric and that Vitek failed to meet its burden of establishing the need for a hearing on the intimidation issue. While I am not suggesting that it would have been impermissible for the Board to have ordered a new election or to have had further hearings on Vitek's complaints, I would hold that the Board was not required to order a new election and was not required to have any further hearings.

Whether one is considering elections on the national political scene or in the context of labor relations, it would be ideal if all the parties spoke the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. It would be preferable that every statement given be precisely accurate and in no way misleading. But, reality tells us that such idyllic standards do not exist among vigorous adversaries who have much at stake riding on the outcome of an election. In any event, from media advertisements for consumer products, to extravagant promises made by political candidates, Americans are used to exaggerations, overstatements and distortions. And, as a consequence, working men and women are not so gullible that they necessarily believe that every statement uttered in election campaigns is precisely accurate. As Abraham Lincoln once wrote, "you can't fool all of the people all the time."

Congress has delegated to the Board the power to determine (1) whether a particular misstatement is sufficiently material so as to fool or mislead employees unfairly at the polling place and (2) whether another election, where hyperbole is reduced, is required. In all due respect, the majority opinion reflects what I believe to be a failure in this circuit clearly to differentiate or appreciate the limited role of appellate review in National Labor Relations Board cases. Simply stated, it is for the Board to gauge the effect of campaign polemic. We are not empowered to sit as a super-board to try de novo what are essentially findings of fact. In short, the majority decision steps over the boundary lines for apellate review and invades the role which Congress gave exclusively to the Board. I, therefore, respectfully dissent from the majority's opinion.

I.

The burden is on the party seeking to overturn a Board-conducted representation election to establish that the election was not fairly conducted. N.L.R.B. v. Mattison Machine Works, 365 U.S. 123, 81 S.Ct. 434, 5 L.Ed.2 455 (1961) (per curiam). Whether the challenged conduct tended to interfere with the employees' free choice is to be determined primarily as a function of the Board's discretion. N.L.R.B. v. A.J. Tower, 329 U.S. 324, 330, 67 S.Ct. 324, 327, 91 L.Ed. 322 (1946); N.L.R.B. v. Bancroft Mfg. Co., 516 F.2d 436, 439 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 424 U.S. 914, 96 S.Ct. 1112, 47 L.Ed.2d 318 (1976); N.L.R.B. v. Trinity Steel Co., 214 F.2d 120, 123 (5th Cir. 1954).

The Board's basic policy is to seek to insure that in selecting a bargaining representative the employees have full and complete freedom of choice. The board attempts, insofar as possible, to encourage laboratory conditions so that employees may exercise this right. Hollywood Ceramics, Inc., 140 NLRB 221, 224 (1962). Gross misrepresentations with regard to material issues in an election, however, and disrupt these conditions and interfere with the expression of free choice. Yet, neither absolutely precise statements nor complete honesty exist in most election campaigns, and they are not even expected by the employees. Election campaigns, after all, are often hotly contested matters prone to the overstatement of one's own virtues, and the zealous condemnation of the other side's vices. Thus, "the Board must balance the right of the employees to an untrammeled choice, and the right of the parties to wage a free and vigorous campaign with all the normal legitimate tools of electioneering." Id.

[1] The alleged misrepresentations concerned cost-of-living clauses, wages, job safety, seniority and job security.

Reflecting this balance, the Board recognizes that a certain amount of inaccuracy and ambiguity are endemic to campaign propaganda. Hence, to warrant setting aside an election, the Board requires that there be a substantial misrepresentation of a material fact, made by one with special knowledge of the true facts and communicated to the parties so shortly before the election that the other party has no opportunity to correct it. Id. at 223, 224. Moreover, the misrepresentation must involve facts about which the employees are not in a position to know the truth. General Knit of California, 239 NLRB (1978); Peerless of America, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 576 F.2d 119, 123 (7th Cir. 1978). The mere fact "that a message is inartistically or vaguely worded and subject to different interpretations will not suffice to establish such misrepresentation as would lead [a court] to set [an] election aside." Hollywood Ceramics Inc., 140 NLRB at 224. In fact, "even where a misrepresentation is shown to have been substantial, the Board may still refuse to set aside the election if it finds upon consideration of all the circumstances that the statement would not be likely to have had a real impact on the election." Id. The rule could not be otherwise lest the losing party to an election be afforded too great an opportunity to delay the implication of the election results by litigating the accuracy of factual assertions which did not affect the election results. The application of this sound policy to the present facts in my view dictates that we enforce the Board's certification order.

Vitek objects to the Union's campaign handbill entitled "IUE–Vitek News, No. 3." In this leaflet, the Union asserted that the cost of living in America is rising at the rate of 14% and that at other plants in the area it has negotiated cost of living clauses that increase employee wages regularly "to keep pace with" the cost of living. The employer argues that the cost-of-living clauses are "capped" and "keyed" to formulas that do not guarantee cost-of-living adjustments equal to the actual rise in the cost of living. It contends and the majority apparently holds that this campaign document materially misrepresents the cost-of-living protective clauses the Union negotiated with three other employers and thereby establishes a prima facie case for setting aside the election. In so holding, the majority interprets this handbill to be a Union representation that the cost-of-living clauses in its contracts at Edison Products, Gulton Industries, and Delco Batteries guarantee cost-of-living increases equivalent to the actual rise in the cost-of-living. I do not agree.

The Board found that this handbill nowhere stated that any of its cost-of-living protective clauses would guarantee cost-of-living raises equal to the actual rise in the cost of living. The Company admits this. Nevertheless, it maintains that the employees interpreted the statement "to keep pace with the cost of living increase announced by the U.S. Department of Labor" as an absolute guarantee of "dollar for dollar" protection against inflation.[2] I would hold that it was proper for the Board to interpret this statement not to provide such protection.

Furthermore, the Board recognized that the Union had in fact negotiated cost-of-living protective clauses with the companies in question that did provide their employees with some protection against inflation. Thus, although this document is "vaguely worded and subject to different interpretations," Hollywood Ceramics, Inc., at 224, it is not sufficiently misleading to justify setting the election aside. The Board's conclusion, therefore, in this regard is not so outlandish as to constitute an abuse of discretion. Citizens to Preserve Overton Park, Inc. v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 91 S.Ct. 814, 28 L.Ed.2d 136 (1971).

[2] In fact, Vitek argues that the handbill guarantees a "dollar for dollar" cost of living increase despite the fact that the leaflet contains the following comment with respect to former President Carter's 7% wage controls:

> FLASH
> A federal court has just upheld the IUE–AFL–CIO lawsuit charging that President Carter's 7% wage controls are illegal.
> This is an important step forward in the union's fight to see that workers at plants such as Vitek are not held down at this time when the cost of living is going up at a rate of 14%
> IUE has performed a service, not just for its own members, but for workers throughout the country, by fighting against wage controls. It shows the strength of our union and our concern for the needs of working people.

Vitek also asserts that it did not have adequate time to respond to this document prior to the election. The document in question, however, invites the Company to speak to the employees at Union meetings on June 6, 1979 (the day before the election) regarding the statements made by both parties during the campaign. Surely, had Vitek felt the matter important enough, it could have taken this opportunity to explain to its employees that the cost-of-living clauses were capped at a certain percentage or keyed to a specific formula that did not provide an absolute guarantee of "dollar for dollar" protection against inflation.

III.

The majority also objects to portions of the Union handbill entitled "A Story By and For Vitek Workers." The majority attacks this handbill because it states that "Back in the 'good ole' days" the employer's wages were the lowest in the area. I do not feel that the record in this case reveals this statement to be a material misrepresentation of fact. Indeed, Vitek initiated its uniform wage rates on January 2, 1976

798

(revising them thereafter on October 2, 1976) and offered no evidence to indicate that between January 2, 1976 and October 2, 1976—before the Union came on the scene—its wages were not the lowest in the area. Hence, the Board could reasonably infer that such evidence did not exist.

Moreover, although as of April 15, 1979, Vitek did increase its minimum wage to about $1.00 more per hour than ten other area companies, this took place after the Union began its organization drive and had filed its representation petition on April 5, 1979. Accordingly, the Company's comparison of its pay scales with those of other area companies after April 15, 1979 are irrelevant to us since these rates reflect a wage increase given to the employees after and not before the Union began to organize.[3]

In conclusion, I believe that given the circumstances of this case, the Board could find that the alleged misrepresentations by the Union are not so substantial as to be reasonably expected to have had a significant impact upon an election which the Union won by a margin of 70 to 45, an election in which they garnered 61% of the total vote. Therefore, the Board did not abuse its discretion in holding that the challenged conduct did not interfere with the employees' free choice.

V.

Finally, the majority contends that "there is no adequate record here from which to tell whether the RD correctly determined that no hearing was necessary" on the question of whether the Union poisoned the pre-election atmosphere by intimidation. In support of this view, Vitek submitted into evidence the affidavits of several employees and supervisors, pinpointed several employees from whom affidavits were taken, and provided the names of numerous other employees whom it asserted had information relevant to its objections to the election. Vitek's legal counsel, however, was advised that if the Company was unable to provide more specific details with respect to the potential testimony of 17 of [3] I would also conclude that it was proper for the Board to find that this Union handbill did not materially misrepresent the Company's policies with regard to its safety precautions, or its seniority and discharge programs. In short, the Board found that the Union's campaign statement that "few safety precautions were taken to protect the people from carbon monoxide fumes and when [people] got sick because of the fumes, many of [them] lost pay" was not a material misrepresentation of fact.

---

In this regard, Vitek argues that extensive safety precautions had been taken and all employees reimbursed for time lost due to the fumes. Yet when the Company was requested to support its assertion with regard to the extensive safety precautions, it was only able to demonstrate that as of February 12, 1979 it had installed a new vent "to increase the amount of outside air entering the plant when the exhaust fans were on."

Second, Vitek's records indicate that on the day the new vent was installed, February 12, 1980, ten employees were sent to a local hospital's emergency room and then home by a doctor due to fume-induced sickness. On February 16 and February 26, 1979, 30 employees and seven employees, respectively, left work due to what they believed to be fume-induced illness. Hence, it was reasonable for the Board to infer that one fresh air vent had not solved the problem.

Third, the record shows that at least ten employees who felt they were suffering from a fume-induced illness, were not paid for all of their lost time. The Company unilaterally determined that seven of these employees failed to substantiate their claim of illness and that no reason existed for it to believe there was a problem with the heating system at the time. But, just because this is Vitek's view, the Board was hardly compelled to believe that, therefore, the Union's opposing view was a material misrepresentation of fact.

In any event, the Union statements about safety precautions involved matters within the context of the employee's working environment. Thus, the employees were in a position to possess independent knowledge with which to evaluate these statements.

Finally, I also would hold that the Board properly found that the Union did not materially misrepresent the Company's seniority and discharge policies. The Union asserted in its leaflet that before it came on the scene seniority had no effect on promotions and overtime and that employees could be fired with no chance of appeal. Vitek did institute a seniority job posting program and a grievance procedure on April 2, 1979. But, the Company presented absolutely no evidence that it had a seniority job-posting program or grievance procedure prior to April 2, 1979—that is before the Union began its campaign.

its witnesses, they would not be interviewed. It is well established that the objecting party has the burden of supplying the Board with specific evidence that warrants setting aside an election before the Board must pursue an investigation. See National Labor Relations Board Cashandling, Manual (Part Two) Section 11392.5. In fact, the objecting party has the burden of producing specific evidence tantamount to an offer of proof before the Board is required to hold an evidentiary hearing or pursue an investigation. Howard Johnson Company d/b/a Howard Johnson Distribution Center, 242 NLRB 1286 (1979).

The RD properly concluded in this instance that (1) upon the basis of the evidence as a whole the Company failed "to raise substantial or material issues with [regard] to conduct affecting the results of the election" and; (2) that since "no evidence was offered that any of the employees not interviewed possessed any relevant information which would raise material or substantial issues concerning conduct affecting the results of the election, the Board agents acted in accordance with established Board policy in refusing to inverview" the employees in question. In this light, the Board has held that > * * * where an objecting party presents prima facie evidence demonstrating that the election was not fairly conducted, we do not hesitate to make the necessary investments of time and money, nor can we then avoid the concomitant delay in making our procedures effective. On the other hand, where there has been no prima facie showing of misconduct * * * [it] * * * is not only proper but necessary to prevent dilatory tactics by employers or unions disappointed in the election returns.

Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, 239 NLRB 82, 83–84 (1978).

For the foregoing reasons, I would deny the petition to review and set aside and grant the cross-application for enforcement of the Order of the National Labor Relations Board.

NLRB v. Wilker Brothers Company, Inc.

652 F.2d 660 (6th Cir.), June 30, 1981—236 NLRB 1371

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Merritt, Kennedy and Boyce F. Martin, Jr., Circuit Judges,

661

The National Labor Relations Board petitions this Court for enforcement of its order dated July 6, 1978 in case No. 26–CA–6388–1,2 holding the respondent, Wilker Brothers Company, Inc., guilty of violating §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3). The Board found that the company had conducted coercive interrogations and statements to employees, had made promises of benefits and implemented new benefits to undermine the union organizing effort, had reduced a benefit, and had discharged employee Linda Lewis for union activities. The employer argues the decision of the Board is not supported by substantial evidence.

More specifically, the Board found Vice-President Blumenthal had asked one employee, Linda Lewis, to help her find the "termites" in the plant and offered her a different job than she had wanted. He had told several employees whose names appeared on a union telegram naming the union in-plant organizing committee that they had stabbed him in the back. Blumenthal questioned one employee about charges filed with the Board, told another she was stupid for joining the union and that he would scratch her back if she scratched his when she asked for time off, and questioned others about union activities. Very shortly after the union telegram was posted, the employer announced two new holidays. The next month, Blumenthal announced he was going to lower the prices on the vending machines ten cents (prices had been raised by the supplier several months earlier) and he would pay the difference as another benefit to the employees. He did not say that the difference would be made up by not making the customary contributions to the Helping Hand Fund, a fund which was for employees in need and which had been funded by commissions from the machines. The month before the union telegram was sent, but after the union had begun organizing, the employer had announced new insurance benefits.

The Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) found that these statements were coercive and the granting of these benefits were violations of the Act. The ALJ did not find that the reduction in contributions to the Helping Hand Fund was a violation because the employees did not learn about this action until the hearing on the violations. The Board held this was a violation because it was a reduction in benefits.

The ALJ found that Linda Lewis was discharged due to union activities, although admittedly she had always been a poor worker, because she was discharged shortly after the telegram had been posted and the ALJ discredited the testimony that her work had become worse the last two weeks. The Board issued a cease and desist order and ordered notices to be posted, reimbursements to be made to the Helping Hand Fund, and reinstatement and back pay be granted to Linda Lewis.

The employer argues that the ALJ relied upon the uncorroborated evidence of an interested witness, contrary to the testimony of three witnesses, to award Lewis back pay and reinstatement. It also filed a motion before this Court to remand the reinstatement order to the Board because of newly discovered evidence that Linda Lewis has subsequent to the filing of this appeal been convicted of possessing schedule two controlled substances and of stealing from her employer.

The findings of the Board must be affirmed if supported by substantial evidence. See 29 U.S.C. § 160(e); DeLorean Cadillac, Inc. v. NLRB, 614 F.2d 554, 555 (6th Cir. 1980) (Order). The choice between two conflicting views in the record is for the Board to decide. See Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

This Court has reviewed the record and the decisions by the ALJ and the Board. It concludes that substantial evidence supports the Board's conclusion that the employer conducted coercive interrogations and improperly granted benefits. However, substantial evidence does not support the Board's conclusion that reduction of contributions to the Helping Hand Fund was a violation of the Act. A conferral or denial of benefits prior to an election violates the Act if timed to affect the employees with respect to their union activities. See NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 409–10, 84 S. Ct. 457, 459–60, 11 L.Ed.2d 435 (1964). But, employees can hardly be affected or coerced in their activities with respect to the union if they do not know about the employer's action. Here they were unaware until the hearing that the Helping Hand Fund's contributions were reduced.

This Court further finds that no substantial evidence supports the discharge of Linda Lewis. Her record shows intermittent complaints about her work all along, with three reports written up within two weeks of her discharge date. She admitted never being a very good worker and always being reprimanded (nearly every day), but denied her work worsened. Three of her supervisors testified to the contrary. This Court has held that the uncorroborated testimony of an interested witness who stands to gain from a back pay award should be subject to strict security. See DeLorean, supra, 614 F.2d at 555. This Court denies reinstatement and back pay to Linda Lewis. This Court need not address the motion to remand based on her criminal convictions.

This Court denies enforcement of the Board's order insofar as it orders reimbursement to the Helping Hand Fund and reinstatement and back pay to Linda Lewis. The Board's order is enforced in all other respects.

NLRB v. Clayton Construction Corporation

652 F.2d 6 (8th Cir.), June 24, 1981—250 NLRB 798

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before McMillian and Arnold, Circuit Judges, and HANSON,* Senior District Judge

PER CURIAM: The National Labor Relations Board (the Board) petitions this court for enforcement of its order requiring the Clayton Construction Corp. of Urbana, Missouri (the Company) to immediately reinstate Floyd Groves as a Union steward and "make him whole for any loss of wages he may have suffered" by reason of the unlawful termination in violation of § 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). For the reasons discussed below, we enforce the order.

The Board, adopting the findings of the administrative law judge (ALJ), concluded that Floyd Groves was discharged because of a good faith protest about the Company's assignment of work to certain employees in violation of its agreement with the Union. For reversal the Company argues that (1) the record fails to contain substantial evidence to support the conclusion that Groves was engaged in protected union activity at the time of his discharge and (2) Groves was discharged because of flagrant and persistent insubordination.

Larry Clayton is the Company's president and principal stockholder. As president, Mr. Clayton exercises responsibility for hiring, firing and supervising assigned work. In May, 1977, Mr. Clayton signed a collective bargaining agreement with the Union and has followed the terms of the agreement at the Urbana job site.

Floyd Groves was hired by the company in March, 1978, and was appointed Union steward in 1979 and served in that capacity until July 16, 1979, when he was discharged.

The events that took place on July 16 are the crux of this dispute. It is conceded that Mr. Groves was terminated because of his actions on that day and that he would not have been terminated otherwise.

On the morning of July 16, 1979, a piece of equipment was unexpectedly put out of operation for the day. As a result, Larry Clayton sought to shift working assignments among his employees so as to maintain production. A supervisor of the Company approached certain employees during their lunch break and told them of the afternoon's work assignments. The assignments included placing Groves on one machine and assigning Clint Harmon as an operator of another machine to work on the main sewer line.

Clint Harmon was employed by the Company as a laborer during normal work hours. After normal work hours, Harmon worked as an independent contractor for the Company. Harmon was not a member of the Union and thus, pursuant to the collective bargaining agreement, was not to operate equipment on the main sewer lines but rather was to limit his work to equipment on the lateral lines.

Groves, the Union steward, raised a question with Mr. Clayton about the job assignments made by his immediate supervisor on July 16. The substance of the conversation which took place at a separate location on the site is in dispute. Because of what was said during the conversation, Larry Clayton discharged Groves.

The conflicting testimony concerning what was said during the conversation required the ALJ to determine the credibility of various witnesses. After reviewing the testimony concerning the July 16 conversation and the events which took place that day, the ALJ found Larry Clayton to be an uncredible, impulsive and belligerent witness. The ALJ credited the testimony of Groves and Harmon concerning the conversation and the sequence of events.

The Board adopted the ALJ's findings without any substantial revision. Specifically, the Board found that (1) the Company unlawfully discharged Groves and (2) such discharge violated Groves' rights guaranteed him under § 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Our study of the briefs and the record convinces us that there was substantal evidence on the record as a whole to justify the Board's conclusion.

This court has consistently held that such activity is protected, even if the assertion made by the union steward is ultimately incorrect. *Keokuk Gas Service Co. v. SEITZ, Chief Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (Board) petitions for enforcement of its order against Permanent Label Corporation (Company). To remedy the many unfair labor practices that the Board found the Company had committed, the Board ordered the Company to cease and desist from certain unlawful actions, to reinstate and grant backpay to certain employees, and to recognize and bargain collectively with the Distributive Workers of America, District 65 (Union). The Company resists enforcement on the ground that the various findings of unfair labor practices made by the Board, and the remedies ordered by the Board, are not supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole.

I.

Our factual narration is based on the findings of the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ), which were adopted by the Board. In February 1977, a Company employee, Bernard Daly, contacted a Union agent and began talking to his fellow employees about the advantages of organizing their plant. Daly ceased his organizing activities when Supervisor Michael Bevilacqua informed him that he could be fired for talking about the Union while in the plant.

Daly resumed his organizing efforts in September 1977, after he and employee Michael Roberts were contacted by, and met with, Union organizer Tom Acosta. Together, Roberts and Daly interested other employees in joining the organizing effort. They recruited, among others, Eleanor Ott, Dorothy Saracco, and Elton DeMonteverde. By mid-October, Union organizer Acosta began holding meetings at which employees signed authorization cards, paid Union dues, and formed a Union, organizing committee.

In late October 1977, Supervisor Bevilacqua became aware of rumors of organizing activities in the plant. He investigated these rumors, asking Daly if he knew anything about an attempt by the Company's employees to organize. Daly denied any knowledge of such activity.

On November 1, 1977, Daly was summarily discharged by the Company, allegedly for excessive absenteeism. The next day Ott was discharged, allegedly for the same reason. Neither employee had ever received a warning or disciplinary notice concerning excessive absenteeism.

Two days after the discharges of Daly and Ott, Company Vice-President Robert Tancredi met with employees on each of the plant's three shifts and delivered a speech expressing the Company's opposition to the Union. In this speech, Tancredi told employees that the Union could promise them more than the employer, but could only guarantee that they would pay monthly dues; that only the Company could guarantee job security; that it was important for job security to maintain the current level of business; that unionized plants sometimes became uncompetitive and found it difficult to stay in business; and that thus far the Company's success had been accomplished without outside interference.

In the meeting with second-shift employees, Tancredi permitted Roberts to read a petition directed to management that had been signed by approximately thirty employees. This petition asserted that the discharges of Daly and Ott were unjust, and that both should be rehired. Tancredi accepted the petition from Roberts and said he would consider it and return with an answer. Tancredi then adjourned the meeting, stating that he would stay and talk to employees about their grievances.

On November 9, the Union filed a complaint with the Board, and served a copy on the Company. This complaint asserted that the allegedly unlawful discharges of Daly and Ott constituted unfair labor practices. On November 15, Daly and Ott accepted the Company's offer of reinstatement, but the Company treated their two-week absence as justified suspension and offered them no back pay.

During the course of the organizing campaign, Production Control and Office Manager Jack Studt approached many employees individually, asking why they thought they needed a union and what problems or grievances they had about conditions in the plant. Studt told the employees that he thought the Company could resolve the problems within one year without the Union.

On November 11, 1977, Union organizer Acosta, accompanied by some members of the in-plant organizing committee, met with Plant Manager Doug Contreras. Acosta presented sixty-seven signed authorization cards and asked the Company to recognize the Union. The proposed bargaining unit included approximately 125 employees. Contreras replied that he did not recognize either the organizing committee or the Union as the representative of the employees. The Union filed a representation petition with the Board on November 14, 1977.

The Company's antiunion efforts continued after the Union had presented the authorization cards as evidence of its majority support. For example, on November 18, 1977, employee Zenaida Esquilin asked Saracco, who was a member of the employees' in-plant organizing committee, for a Union authorization card for a co-worker, Maria Garcia. Garcia signed the card. However, before she could return it to Saracco, foreman Bevilacqua confronted her and asked who had given her the card. She explained that it came from Esquilin and Saracco. Later that day, foreman Bevilacqua called Saracco into his office and told her not to pass out Union cards on Company time. He also told her that while she might talk to other employees on her break time, she could not at any time pass out Union cards or literature while on Company property.

On November 29, 1977, Roberts stationed himself at an employee entranceway near an employee parking lot in order to distribute information leaflets to employees arriving at the plant for their work shifts. Supervisor Robert Sanders told Roberts that he would be subject to disciplinary action if he continued to distribute the information leaflets. Although Roberts was stationed on Company property, he distributed the literature only in a nonwork area during his off-duty time. As a result of the Company's threat of disciplinary action, Roberts ceased distributing materials.

Later that day, Roberts, Linderoth and Ott attended a Board conference with Company representatives. One half hour before they were to start their work shifts, Roberts called the plant to say they would be five or ten minutes late for work. On the phone, Supervisor Sanders, who earlier had threatened Roberts with discipline for distributing literature, told Roberts that the Company had instituted a policy that foreclosed employees who were late for a shift from working during that shift. Consequently, Sanders informed Roberts that all three employees should consider themselves suspended for the day. Sanders was acting under Plant Manager Contreras' instructions; Contreras, in turn, received his orders from Vice-President Tancredi, who was attending the Board conference and had called and told Contreras that the three employees would not be able to check into work on time.

During this period Company President Al Contreras, who normally spent little time at the Clifton plant, spoke individually with approximately 500 Clifton employees, expressing the Company's opposition to the Union. In the course of these conversations President Contreras coercively interrogated employees, solicited grievances, coerced employees to campaign against the Union, discouraged employees from wearing Union buttons, promised benefits, and threatened reprisals or other adverse consequences if the Union was elected as the employees' bargaining representative. For example, Contreras apparently offered employee Mia Mehmeti assistance for schooling and reassured Ott that she was eligible for health insurance. He stated to employees Iwanicki and Linderoth that if the Union was elected he would no longer care about the Company and not work hard for it because the Union would "ruin him"—it was clearly implied that along with his downfall would go that of the Company.

In the week of December 6, Plant Manager Contreras summoned Linderoth, Saracco, and Alice Gorski to his office. Vice-President Tancredi testified that he was aware of this meeting and its purpose. Some department and shift supervisors were present. The three employees were advised that they were considered to be supervisors; therefore, it was unlawful for them to engage in Union activity. Further, they were informed that the Company had the right to take action against them if they engaged in Union activity. The employees testified that they left this meeting with the understanding that each was in jeopardy of being fired if he or she had anything more to do with the Union. The three employees had never been advised that they were supervisors, and they did not consider themselves, nor did their fellow employees consider them, to be supervisors.

One week before the December 30, 1977 election, the Company paid year-end bonuses to all of its employees. In January 1977, the Company had posted a notice on the employee bulletin board announcing that to be eligible for a 1977 year-end bonus an employee had to have been on the Company payroll on December 31, 1976. This notice was removed at the end of November. The Company did not replace it with a new explanation of bonus eligibility or a statement of change in Company policy. Instead, one week to the election, the Company paid the 1977 year-end bonus to all its employees, including those with less than one year service.

Finally, on December 28, 1977, two days before the representation election, President Contreras delivered a prepared speech to employees on each of the shifts. He noted that he expected the Company to grow but that the introduction of the Union into the plant would hinder that growth. He stated:

> Our largest customer, the Mennen Company, which accounts for some 40% of this plant's sales is nonunion. We are the sole decorator of Menn packages. They have felt comfortable with our clean record of no union trouble and no > strikes at Permanent Label over the past 25 years. Sometimes when a company is unionized, customers divide their business between two or more vendors with different union contract expiration dates. They do this to eliminate the possibility of being cut off by a strike. I don't want to give the impression that just because a union is in a company there will be a strike, but we have shown you District 65's strike record, and you have seen the emphasis on strikes in their constitutions.

The ALJ found that there was no basis in fact for Contreras's predictions.

On December 30, 1977, the representation election was held. The Union lost by a vote of sixty-five to Sixty-four, with six challenged ballots. The filing of these unfair labor charges followed.

II.

The Board adopted the conclusion of the ALJ that the Company had committed several unfair labor practices during the pre-election period. The Board also adopted the recommendation of the ALJ that a bargaining order was necessary to remedy the unfair labor practices, but it modified the ALJ's bargaining order to run from November 11, 1977, the date on which the Union presented the Company with authorization cards signed by a majority of the employees and demanded recognition. The Company urges that we find that neither the findings of unfair labor practices nor the conclusion that a bargaining order was a necessary remedy are supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. The Board adopted the following conclusions of law:

> 1. In October—December 1977, by soliciting grievances and promising benefits and correction of grievances if the employees would forget the Union, and by threatening no correction of grievances and loss of jobs if they brought the Union in; by granting bonus benefits, just prior to the election; by coercive interrogation of employees concerning organizing, who supplied Union cards, and employee interest in the Union; by interfering with the employees wearing Union insignia; by promulgating and enforcing rules prohibiting solicitation by employees of Union memberships in plant work areas on nonwork time, and distribution of Union literature by employees in nonwork areas during nonwork time; by coercion to induce or attempt to induce influential employees to induce other employees to cease Union support; and by instructing nonsupervisory employees, under threat of discipline, to cease support of the Union, Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. By discharging employees Bernard Daly and Eleanor Ott on November 2, 1977, because of their Union activity and to discourage employees interest and membership in the Union, Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. The change of their discharge, on November 16, 1977, to suspension without pay for the prior two weeks, reduced the severity of the discriminatory action but continued the violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

3. By suspending for one day without pay, on November 29, 1977, employees Michael Roberts, Robert Linderoth, and Eleanor Ott, because they attended a Board conference to assist the Union with the representation petition, Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(4) of the Act.

4. By refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as representative of a majority of the employees as requested on November 11, 1977, but instead engaging, from the end of October to the end of December 1977, in commission of the unfair labor practices enumerated in paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 above, Respondent undermined the majority in the unit of employees that the Union represented, and made impossible the holding of a fair representation election. Respondent's refusal to bargain and embarking upon this course of misconduct constituted an unfair labor practice in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. Respondent's pre-election unfair labor practices nullified the results of the December 30, 1977 representation election, and these unfair labor practices cannot be corrected by conventional remedies, including a rerun election. Accordingly, it is appropriate and necessary that Respondent be ordered to bargain with the Union * * *.

A.

Before we reach the question whether the bargaining order should be enforced, we address the contention of the Company that the findings that it committed several unfair labor practices under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158 (1976) (Act), are not supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. First, the Company argues that the finding that it engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of section 8(a)(1) of the Act lacks sufficient evidentiary support. We have reviewed the record evidence, and we have no hesitancy in finding that it forms more than a sufficient legal basis for the Board's conclusion. The Company apparently bases primary reliance on its contention that some of the ALJ's credibility findings were improper. Given the strong deference that we accord to credibility findings of the ALJ, we cannot say that they lack substantial record support. In any event, the totality of the record fully supports the ALJ's ultimate conclusions, even assuming infirmity in some of the few credibility findings challenged. Therefore, we conclude that the Company clearly overstepped the bounds of legality and violated section 8(a)(1) many times during the organization campaign.

Second, we consider the Board's determination that the Daly and Ott discharges, later converted to suspensions, were unfair labor practices under section 8(a)(3) and (a)(1) of the Act. The Company's basic contention seems to be that it was not aware of the Union organization effort at the time of the discharges; therefore, such discharges could not properly be attributable to antiunion animus.

We have reviewed the entire record and we believe that the evidence amply supports the conclusion that these initial discharges constituted unfair labor practices. When the reasons given by the Company for the discharges are viewed in light of the circumstances surrounding the discharges, we believe that the ALJ and the Board were justified in finding these reasons to be mere pretexts. We conclude that the finding that the discharges of Daly and Ott violated section 8(a)(3) and (a)(1) of the Act is amply supported by the record.

Third, the Company challenges the Board's finding that the one-day suspensions of Roberts, Linderoth and Ott, when their attendance at a Board conference caused them to be ten minutes late for their work shifts, were unfair labor practices in violation of section 8(a)(4). We believe that the record as a whole more than warrants the conclusion reached by the Board that the suspensions were retaliatory actions because of the employees' assistance to the Union. Therefore, these suspensions violated section 8(a)(4).

Finally, the Board adopted the conclusion of the ALJ that the Company's numerous unfair labor practices interfered with the free choice of the Company's employees, and therefore destroyed the "laboratory conditions" desirable for the conduct of a Board election. As a result, the Board concluded that the election of December 30, 1977 must be set aside. We think that the record findings, which we have found sufficient to support the findings of numerous violations of the Act, clearly support this determination.

B.

The Company contends that there is not substantial evidence to support the Board's conclusion that a bargaining order should issue because the Company violated section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as requested on November 11, 1977, and instead engaging in the unfair labor practices detailed above, which both undermined the Union's majority status and prevented the holding of a fair election. As our previous discussion has demonstrated, substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the plethora of unfair labor practices found. However, it is established, at least in this circuit, that when the Board imposes a bargaining order, it must articulate the factors that justify the choice of this remedy over the ordering of a new election. See, e.g., Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, 558 F.2d 1137 (3d Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Armcor Industries, Inc., 535 F.2d 239 (3d Cir. 1976). If the ALJ provides a statement of reasons for recommending that the Board impose a bargaining order, the Board need only specifically adopt the findings and reasoning of the ALJ. A separate articulation by the Board of the reasons for imposing a bargaining order is unnecessary. See Kenworth Trucks v. NLRB, 5809 F.2d 55, 62–63 (3d Cir. 1978).

Nevertheless, the Company argues that the Board should have provided a statement of reasons justifying the imposition of a bargaining order independent of that provided by the ALJ because it modified the ALJ's bargaining order to run from the date of the Union's demand for recognition based on its card majority and not the date of the first unfair labor practices.[1] In making this argument, the Company relies on Rapid Manufacturing Co. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 144 (3d Cir. 1979). According to the Company, Rapid Manufacturing Co. prohibition the Board from supporting a Gissel II bargaining order by relying on conduct that occurred before the Union demanded recognition. We do not read Rapid Manufacturing Co. this broadly. Obtaining a majority of Union authorization cards is a continuing process, and the length of time it takes to achieve a majority varies from plant to plant, often depending on the number of employees involved. We believe that in some circumstances the Board may properly consider unlawful conduct that occurred before the Union demanded recognition in determining whether the employer's course of unlawful conduct was sufficiently pervasive to undermine the Union's majority support and to make the possibility of a fair rerun election slight, and thus to support the imposition of a Gissel II bargaining order. Forbidding the Board from considering such conduct sets an artificial time barrier and ignores the possible cumulative effect of antiunion activity.

In this case, the course of unlawful conduct commenced approximately two weeks before the Union demanded recognition. The Union had arleady obtained a significant number of authorization cards. Therefore, we do not believe that the Board is precluded from relying on the statement of reasons for imposing a bargaining order provided by the ALJ merely because he relied on both premajority and postmajority conduct.

The Board specifically affirmed the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the ALJ, and adopted his order as modified. Therefore, if the ALJ provided a sufficient statement of reasons for recommending that the bargaining order be issued, the order of the Board should be enforced.

[1] The Company's argument is based on the assumption that by modifying the date of the bargaining order, the Board implicitly indicated that the Company's unfair labor practices were not sufficiently egregious to suport a Gissel I bargaining order. See NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547(1969). In his opinion, the ALJ distinguished the "outrageous and pervasive" practices that fall within the Gissel I category and justify the imposition of a bargaining order without regard to majority status from the "less pervasive" practices that comprise the Gissel II category and he stated that he believed that a bargaining order was appropriate under either category. For a discussion of the distinction between Gissel II categories, see Rapid Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 144, 148 (3d Cir. 1979). We will assume for purposes of this appeal that the Board's modification of the date of the bargaining order was based on the reason asserted by the Company.

The ALJ issued a fifty-three page opinion in which he detailed the Company's numerous violations of section 8(a)(1), (a)(3), (a)(4), and (a)(5). While detailing the course of conduct that gave rise to these violations, the ALJ described the attitude of the Company. The following characterization is representative:

> Respondent's antiunion animus was clear and unrelenting. As President Contreras stated, there had been attempts to organize the plant before this attempt, he was constantly vigilant against renewed attempts, and he had been successful in keeping the Union out. The summary of his actions in this case, together with the related actions of the other managerial and supervisory staff of Respondent, denoted a spirit and willingness to take any means deemed necessary to defeat the Union and to deprive the employees of an untrammeled choice of a bargaining representative, including unlawful means.

In one section of his opinion, the ALJ concluded that the election must be set aside. In the next section, the ALJ addressed "whether a rerun election would be an adequate remedy, or would appear to be a futile act that would permit Respondent to benefit by its misconduct in the pre-election period, requiring instead the remedy of a bargaining order under the principles enunciated in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Company, 395 U.S. 575 [89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547] (1969)." The ALJ recommended that a bargaining order should issue for the following reasons:

> [U]pon becoming aware that the Union had begun organizing and was seeking representative status, Respondent engaged in a campaign designer to thwart the organizing and destroy any majority the Union may have succeeded in obtaining. Commencing about two weeks before the Union requested recognition * * *, Respondent engaged in * * * interrogation of the leading union proponent among the employees concerning organizing, then discharged him, and a coworker associated with him in organizing activity, in violation of section 8(a)(3), and launched a countercampaign against the Union affecting all employees, starting with "captive audience" employee meetings used to convey its antiunion hostility and to sound warnings of the dire consequences of bringing in the Union. * * *
> Respondent continued its countercampaign during November and December until the election of December 30, with its president interviewing every employee on the plant floor between one and five times each, followed by a final "captive audience" speech; and by its vice president, plant manager, department heads, and shift foremen engaging in discussions with employees on and off the plant floor. In the course of this barrage of campaigning against the Union, Respondent's officers and supervisors overstepped the bounds of legality many times. Employees were promised benefits and correction of solicited grievances if they would forget the Union, and threatened with no correction of grievances and loss of jobs if they brought the Union in. A substantial group of employees, not entitled to year end bonuses under Respondent's written policy, were paid a bonus along with the other employees just prior to the election. Respondent illegally interferred with the employees' self organizational rights by coercive interrogation concerning their Union interest, interference with wearing of Union insignia, interference with employee solicitation of Union memberships and distribution of Union literature by promulgation and enforcement of illegal rules, coercion to induce influential employees to induce other employees to cease Union support, threatening discharge of three leading Union supporters unless they ceased Union activities under a sham claim that they were supervisors, and disciplining three employees for attendance at a Board conference to assist the Union on the representation petition.
> In sum, Respondent sought to impress upon the employees the futility of voting the Union in, and that there would be harsher dealing and reprisal if they did. The mass of violations of section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act were egregious unfair labor practices, which had the tendency to undermine, and undermined, the Union's majority strength in the election * * * and prevented the holding of a fair election.

* * * * *

Under the circumstances of this case, the sentiment of the unit employees expressed through the Union authorization cards is a more reliable measure of their desires on issue of representation. * * * To remedy Respondent's unfair labor practices * * *, a bargaining order is necessary.

Upon reviewing the entire opinion of the ALJ, we believe the conclusion is inescapable that the ALJ delineated these factors, not merely as justification for setting aside the election, but as reasons why a rerun election "would appear to be a futile act that would permit Respondent to benefit by its misconduct in the pre-election period," thus justifying the imposition of a bargaining order. The fact that the ALJ had found that the election must be set aside in the previous section of his opinion supports this conclusion.

The primary purpose of requiring that the Board provide a statement of reasons leading to the imposition of a bargaining order is "to assist a reviewing court in determining whether the standards of Gissel have been satisfied." Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB 629 F.2d 305, 309 (3d Cir. 1980) (in banc) (Hedstrom II). Moreover, requiring a statement of reasons is intended to add predictability and stability to this important area of labor law. This requirement is not intended to burden the Board, not to limit the issuance of bargaining orders. See, e.g., id.; Armcor Industries, Inc, 535 F.2d at 245.[2] We believe that the ALJ's statement of reasons in this case in more than sufficient to allow this court to determine whether the standards of Gissel have been met.

In this case the ALJ did not merely state conclusorily that the bargaining order should issue. Instead, he demonstrated that the violations were widespread, thus indicating the Company's proclivity to exceed the limits of the law in its attempt to prevent unionization. He also explained that high-level officers, including the president and vice president, had threatened reprisals, coercively interrogated employees, and illegally promised benefits. Moreover, he demonstrated that each employee in the plant was not only interviewed individually by the president but was also subjected to "captive audience" speeches. Therefore, he found that bargaining order was necessary to remedy these extensive unfair labor practices. We do not believe enforcement should be denied merely because the ALJ did not write down the inescapable inference he made in recommending that a bargaining order issue—that merely ordering the Company to refrain from future violations would not erase the effects of these threats and other egregious violations from the employees's memories, and thus that the possibility of a fair rerun election was slight.

We believe that it is sufficient for the ALJ to provide an extensive list of the factors giving rise to his recommendation that a bargaining order be issued, as was done in this case. If we were to require that the ALJ also specifically state each inference drawn from these factors no matter how obvious it is from the opinion, we would elevate form over substance and overstep the appropriate limits of judicial review of the Board's choice of remedy. Finally, the conclusion of the Board that a bargaining order is necessary to remedy the substantial unfair labor practices committed by the Company is supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, and is consistent with NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).

III.

The order of the Board will be enforced.

ALDISERT, Circuit Judge, concurring: Although I concur in the result reached by the majority, I take advantage of this in banc opportunity to set forth my dissatisfaction with the rule both the majority and dissenting opinions apply. The rule fabricated by this court on previous occasions provides that when the NLRB proposes a Gissel bargaining order, it must articulate in detail the factors that justify its choice of this remedy rather than ordering a new election.[1] See Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 305 (3d Cir. 1980) (in banc) (Hedstrom II) cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 101 S.Ct. 1699, 68 L.Ed.2d 196 (1981); Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, 558 F.2d 1137 (3d Cir. 1977) (Hedstrom I); NLRB v. Armcor Industries, Inc., 535 F.2d 239 (3d Cir. 1976). In my view, this procedural rule was promulgated without authority and rests on certain unwarranted assumptions about the factfinding competence of Administrative Law Judges never openly articulated in the opinions supporting the Armcor-Hedstrom rule. Moreover, our decisions indicate that rather than applying the rule in a neutral fashion, the panes of this court have manipulated it primarily to achieve the results a given panel majority desires.[2] [2] We note that in Kenworth Trucks, 580 F.2d 55, a panel of this court found a similar statement of reasons sufficient to enforce a bargaining order. Although it is true that the Kenworth Trucks panel focused on whether the Board must separately articulate the reasons for imposing a bargaining order, it necessarily decided that the statement of reasons given in that case was sufficiently detailed to enforce the Board's order. For this court to enforce the bargaining order in Kenworth Trucks and to deny enforcement in this case would lead to the very inconsistency and unpredictability that requiring a statement of reasons justifying the imposition of a bargaining order was intended to prevent. See, e.g., Armcor Indus., Inc., 535 F.2d at 245.

The rule has experienced a battered history in this court. The issue of what the ALJ and NLRB must find and say to impose a bargaining order has required three in banc sittings, NLRB v. Armcor Industries, Inc., No. 77-1495 (November 15, 1978) (Armcor II) (unreported per curiam),[3] Hedstrom II, and the present case, and a number of panel opinions, e.g. NLRB v. K&K Gourmet Meats, Inc., 640 F.2d 460 (3d Cir. 1981); Electrical Products Division of Midland Ross Corp. v. NLRB, 617 F.2d 977 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 101 S.Ct. 210, 66 L.Ed.2d 91 (1980); NLRB v. Garry Mfg. Co., 630 F.2d 934 (3d Cir. 1980); Rapid Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 144 (3d Cir. 1979). I joined the majority in Hedstrom II with the hope that the rule could be applied evenhandedly and because I felt that its purpose could be considered salutary: "to assist a reviewing court in determining whether the standards of Gissel have been satisfied." Hedstrom II, 629 F.2d at 309. The rule, I thought, was intended to add predictability and stability to an important area of labor law.[4] See majority op., at 519, 520. That the present case should be before us in banc so quickly after Hedstrom II eloquently attests to the utter failure of the rule to achieve its goal. We are en banc because the original panel disgorged three separate views on how to decide what I consider to be a very pedestrian case.

I.

In my view, this court's first error is its wrongful assumption of authority to promulgate an essentially procedural rule for the NLRB. This is not the only occasion when this court has ventured into rulewriting escapades for a federal administrative agency. We began these independent intellectual frolics when we imposed ourselves as a special procedural rules committee for the Social Security Administration. See, e.g., Hargenrader v. Califano, 575 F.2d 434 (3 Cir. 1978) (requirement in Social Security disability claim that hearing officer articulate "a statement of subordinate factual foundations on which ultimate factual conclusions [sic] are based" [5]); Baerga v. Richardson, 500 F.2d 309 (3d Cir. 1974) (dicta), cert. denied, 420 U.S. 931, 95 S.Ct. 1133, 43 L.Ed.2d 403 (1975). Although such a requirement may be "helpful in the joint work of the administrative agency and the courts," Baerga, 500 F.2d at 313, this observation alone cannot justify our intrusion into the procedures of a coordinate branch. This is not a federal common law area, nor an exercise of supervisory authority over courts inferior in the hierarchy. We must therefore look to Congress for any authority because, as I maintained in Hargenrader, 575 F.2d at 438-39 (dissenting opinion), federal courts of appeals were not given general supervisory powers over agencies of the executive branch. See also Cotter v. Harris, 642 F.2d 700, 708 (3d Cir. 1981) (Garth, J., dissenting). I found no Congressional authority in the Social Security cases; I find none here.

523

The judiciary's relationship to the NLRB is defined by 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) & (f). We are instructed that "findings of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall be conclusive," 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). Congress has given little additional guidance for reviewing Board orders. When put to the task of defining the courts of appeals' scope of review of the NLRB's remedial orders, the Supreme Court has stressed our limitations:

[1] The Board may satisfy this requirement by specifically adopting the ALJ's findings and reasoning without separate analysis. See Kenworth Trucks v. NLRB, 580 F.2d 55, 62-63 (3d Cir. 1978).

[2] Although I refer to the precept applied in this case as a rule, it fails to meet the criteria to deserve the name. Strictly speaking, a rule is a "precept attaching a definite, detailed legal consequence to a definite, detailed set of facts." Pound Hierarchy of Sources and Forms in Different Systems of Law 7 Tul.L.Rev. 475, 482 (1933). See United States v. Criden, 633 F.2d 346, 354 n.4 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 101 S.Ct. 924, 66 L.Ed.2d 842 (1981). The hallmark of a rule is its predictable application. As discussed below, application of this rule yields anything but predictable results.

[3] Denying enforcement of a Gissel order by an equally divided court.

[4] I joined the court's opinion in Hedstrom II, but I am now convinced that the full court erred in not administering the last rites to the Armcor innovation when we had the chance to do so then. In changing my view, I am mindful that "[w]isdom too often never comes, and so one ought not to reject it merely because it comes late." Henslee v. Union Planters National Bank & Trust Co., 335 U.S. 595, 600, 69 S.Ct. 290, 293, 93 L.Ed. 259 (1949) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting). See also R. Aldisert, The Judicial Process 861 (1976).

[5] I attempted recently to clarify this impenetrable formulation of a standard. See Smith v. Harris, 644 F.2d 985, 990 (3d Cir. 1981) (concurring opinion).

> A statute expressive of such large public policy as that on which the National Labor Relations Board is based must be broadly phrased and necessarily carries with it the task of administrative application. There is an area plainly covered by the language of the Act and an area no less plainly without it. But in the nature of things Congress could not catalogue all the devices and stratagems for circumventing the policies of the Act. Nor could it define the whole gamut of remedies to effectuate these policies in an infinite variety of specific situations. Congress met these difficulties by leaving the adaptation of means to end to the empiric process of administration. The exercise of the process was committed to the Board, subject to limited judicial review. Because the relation of remedy to policy is peculiarly a matter for administrative competence, courts must not enter the allowable area of the Board's discretion and must guard against the danger of sliding unconsciously from the narrow confines of law into the more spacious domain of policy.

Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 194, 61 S.Ct. 845, 852, 85 L.Ed. 1271 (1941). The Board's remedial orders may not be set aside "unless it can be shown that the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the act." Virginia Elec. & Power Co. v. NLRB, 319 U.S. 533, 540, 63 S.Ct. 1214, 1218, 87 L.Ed. 1568 (1943).

Contrary to the position of this court, review of a Gissel bargaining order has been dealt with no differently:

> It is for the Board and not the courts * * * to make [the] determination, based on its expert estimate as to the effects on the election process of unfair labor practices of varying intensity. In fashioning its remedies under the broad provisions of § 10(c) of the Act (29 U.S.C. § 160(c)), the Board draws on a fund of knowledge and expertise all its own, and its choice of remedy must therefore, be given special respect by reviewing courts. See Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203 [85 S.Ct. 398, 13 L.Ed.2d 233] (1964). "[I]t is usually better to minimize the opportunity for reviewing courts to substitute their discretion for that of the agency." Consolo v. FMC, 383 U.S. 607, 621, 86 S.Ct. 1018, 1027, 16 L.Ed.2d 131 (1966).

Gissel, 395 U.S. at 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct. at 1939. The Court could not have been more clear in its limitation of review, yet circuit judges continue to be so "profoundly convinced of their own expertise in such matters," NLRB v. General Stencils, Inc., 472 F.2d 170, 176 (2d Cir. 1972) (Hays, J., dissenting), that they freely impose procedural rules on the Board when the remedy chosen is a bargaining order. Our review is much more limited: was there substantial evidence to support the factual findings? or, was the decision abitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with the law?

Of course the Supreme Court does not require reviewing courts to rubber-stamp NLRB decisions. Rather, the Court has required the Board to provide some articulation of the reasons for its decisions. See NLRB v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 380 U.S. 438, 443–44, 85 S.Ct. 1061, 1064, 13 L.Ed.2d 951 (1965);[6] see also SEC v. Chenery Corp., 332 U.S. 194, 195–96, 67 S.Ct. 1575, 1577, 91 L.Ed. 1995 (1947) (Chenery II) (administrative decision must reveal its basis). These precedents, however, do not authorize the meticulous inquiry this court undertakes in every Gissel case. They require no more than an indication that the agency has in fact exercised its discretion. See Metropolitan Life, 380 U.S. at 443, 85 S.Ct. at 1064. It is up to the agency to decide how detailed this explanation must be once it crosses the minimum threshold of clarity.[7] If the record is unsufficient to reveal the bases for the decision, the court can remand to the agency for "such additional explanation of the reasons for the agency decision as many prove necessary." Camp v. Pitts, 411 U.S. 138, 143, 93 S.Ct. 1241, 1244, 36 L.Ed.2d 106 (1973). Even in conceding that a remand may at times be appropriate, however, the Court indicated that minimal explanations suffice. "The [agency's] explanation may have been curt, but it surely indicated the determinative reason for the final action taken: the finding that a new bank was an uneconomic venture in light of the banking needs and the banking services already available in the surrounding community." Id. Although it remanded the case to the court of appeals, it suggested that little else need be said for the court to review the decision. Nor do I understand the Supreme Court to require more exhaustive explanations when

[6] "[C]ourts may not accept appellate counsel's post hoc rationalizations for agency action * * * ." Burlington Truck Lines v. United States, [371 U.S. 156, 168, 83 S.Ct. 239, 245, 9 L.Ed 207 (1962)]; see Securities & Exchange Comm'n v. Chenery Corp., 332 U.S. 194, 196, 67 S.Ct. 1575, 1577, 91 L.Ed. 1995 [1947]. For reviewing courts to substitute counsel's rationale or their discretion for that of the Board is incompatible with the orderly function of the process of judicial review. Such action would not vindicate, but would deprecate the administrative process for it would "propel the court into the domain which Congress has set aside exclusively for the administrative agency."

the NLRB chooses to impose a Gissel bargaining order simply because elections are a favored manner of selecting a bargaining representative. Cf. NLRB v. Walton Mfg. Co., 369 U.S. 404, 407–408, 82 S.Ct. 853, 854–855, 7 L.Ed.2d 829 (1962) (per curaim) ("There is no place * * * for one test of the substantiality of evidence in reinstatement cases and another test in other cases.").

The rule applied in the present case goes far beyond the minimum threshold, and the dissent would require far more. As Justice Black observed in Chenery I, a judical requirement of detailed findings as the price of court approval of administrative action will "bog the administrative power in a quagmire of minutiae." 318 U.S. at 99, 63 S.Ct. at 464 (dissenting opinion). More important, "[h]ypercritical exactions as to findings can provide a handy but an almost invisible glideway enabling courts to pass 'from the narrow confines of law into the more spacious domain of policy.'" Id. (quoting Phelps Dodge, 313 U.S. at 194, 61 S.Ct. at 852).

The Supreme Court has recently reemphasized that federal courts should not interfere with administrative action in areas in which Congress has charged an agency with primary responsibility for settling difficult and complex social problems. It acknowledged that agencies must grant a minimum threshold of procedural rights, but stressed that although "[a]gencies are free to grant additional procedural rights in the exercise of their discretion, . . . reviewing courts are generally not free to impose them if the agencies have not chosen to grant them." Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Corp. v. NRDC, 435 U.S. 519, 524, 98 S.Ct. 1197, 1202, 55 L.Ed.2d 460 (1978). The Court warned:

> [T]his much is absolutely clear. Absent constitutional constraints or extremely compelling circumstances the "administrative agencies 'should be free to fashion their own rules of procedure and to pursue methods of inquiry capable of permitting them to discharge their multitudinous duties.'" FCC v. Schreiber, 381 U.S. [279, 290, 85 S.Ct. 1459, 1467, 14 L.Ed.2d 383 (1965)], quoting from FCC v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. [134, 143, 60 S.Ct. 437, 441, 84 L.Ed. 656 (1940)]. Indeed, our cases could hardly be more explicit in this regard. * * * [T]he basic reason for [the] decision [in FCC v. Schreiber] was the Court of Appeals' serious departure from the very basic tenet of administrative law that agencies should be free to fashion their own rules of procedure.
> We have continually repeated this theme through the years, * * * [W]hile a court may have occasion to remand an agency decision because of the inadequacy of the record, the agency should normally be allowed to "exercise its administrative discretion in deciding how, in light of internal organization considerations, it may best proceed to develop the needed evidence and how its prior decision should be modi-

[7] Justice Frankfurter, speaking for the Court in SEC v. Chenery, 318 U.S. 80, 95, 63 S.Ct. 454, 462, 87 L.Ed. 626 (1943) (Chenery I), indicated that the "articulation requirement" is quite minimal:

> In finding that the Commission's order cannot be sustained, we are not imposing any trammels on its powers. We are not enforcing formal requirements. We are not suggesting that the Commission must justify its exercise of administrative discretion in any particular manner or with artistic refinement. We are not sticking in the bark of words. We merely hold that an administrative order cannot be upheld unless the grounds upon which the agency acted in exercising its powers were those upon which its actions can be sustained.

There the considerations urged in support of the SEC's order were not those on which the SEC relied. Thus the holding in Chenery I, reiterated in Chenery II, was nothing more than the familiar requirement that an administrative order cannot be sustained if based on a misperception of the law, even if it might be sustained on other grounds not articulated by the agency. To hold otherwise would allow a court to substitute its discretion for that of the agency, confusing administrative review with the kind of review applied to district court decisions.

> fied in light of such evidence as develops." [FPC v. Transcontinental Gas Pipe Line, 423 U.S. 326, 333, 96 S.Ct. 579, 583, 46 L.Ed.2d 533 (1976)].

435 U.S. at 543–44, 98 S.Ct. at 1211 (footnotes omitted); see also Chrysler Corp. v. Brown, 441 U.S. 281, 312–13, 99 S.Ct. 1705, 1723, 16 L.Ed.2d 208 (1979); Wallace Corp. v. NLRB, 323 U.S. 248, 253, 65 S.Ct. 238, 240, 89 L.Ed. 216 (1944). The Armcor rule simply cannot be justified on grounds that a Gissel bargaining order violates "constitutional constraints" or presents "extremely compelling" circumstances. Rather than being one of those "extremely rare" cases, the imposition of a bargaining order as a remedy is typical of the matters Congress delegated to agency discretion for the resolution of labor conflicts.

The rule announced in Armcor and applied here ignores the Supreme Court's admonitions and leads to needless friction between the courts and agencies with, at best, marginal benefits for the litigants and employees. In outlining permissible Gissel orders, the Supreme Court recognized the complexity of the decision and clearly left it in the hands of the agency. See 395 U.S. at 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct. at 1939. The Board, in turn, recognizing the peculiarities of each Gissel case, has avoided the promulgation of precisely defined rules, instead treating each case on its facts. See, e.g., General Stencils, 195 NLRB 1109 (1972).

II.

Because I find no Congressional authority for the rule, I conclude that other reasons underlie its continued use. I perceive two reasons for the rule's vitality even though in practice it yields unpredictable results: first, the rule sounds so obviously good that one opposes it only at the risk of inveighing against motherhood and apple pie, and second, the rule can be manipulated to achieve the subjective ends of the judges as they apply it more or less strictly. I will take the risk, and focus on the second reason. That the rule can be manipulated to produce desired results is evident from the cases this court has decided since Armcor.[8] Judge Gibbons has already noted that it is "no secret" that a significant number of judges on this court have been signalling the Board that Gissel bargaining orders "are unwelcome in this circuit" while another group of judges is giving quite a different signal. NLRB v. K&K Gourmet Meats, Inc., 640 F.2d 460, 470–71 (3d Cir. 1981) (dissenting opinion) (comparing, inter alia, cases cited in note 8, supra). The Armcor line of decisions took the tack of refusing to enforce Gissel orders which recognized the union's representation by concluding that the Board's opinions were so opaque that a remand would be necessary. Like Judge Gibbons, I had hoped that the Board had hit upon a formula for stating its reasons satisfactorily. See K&K, 640 F.2d at 471–72. That the present unsophisticated case was voted in banc proves that my hopes were ill-founded.

A superficial reading of the opinions here suggests that the court is split over the application of a settled rule to a given state of facts. I doubt that many perceptive observers of this court will be deceived. The dispute here is not over application of a rule, but over the existence of an entirely different precept: whether the NLRB has the power to order an employer to bargain with a union that has not obtained representation status by an election because of an employer's pervasive unfair labor practices. Although recognizing that Gissel is binding precedent, panels of this court have nonetheless tried to subvert it indirectly, focusing their denial of enforcement on the Board's procedural failures. A rule that is manipulated to achieve desired results is not a "neutral principal," and in my view the decisions applying it are not genuinely principled decisions because they do not rest on "analysis and reasons * * * transcending the immediate result * * *." Wechsler, Toward Neutral Principles of Constitutional Law, 73 Harv.L.Rev. 1, 15 (1959).

The panels and in banc courts will continue to divide as long as the opinions are cast as disputes over application of this dubious precept, settled though it may be. The precedential impact of cases at this level of dispute is severely limited by the facts presented. This in banc offering contains no assurance that panels will apply the rule more evenhandedly because each subsequent case will be factually distinguishable, and it may be that similar cases will be before us in banc (for who is to say that thrice is the limit stop of jural masochism?) as the particular labor-management philosophy of the randomly selected panel members continues to produce inconsistent results.[9] In fine, the Armcor-Hedstrom rule permits a two-judge panel majority to foist on the Board its notions of our national labor policy in a given case or controversy, a practice directly contrary to the Congressional mandate which has lodged this responsibility in the NLRB.

III.

In addition to hostility to Gissel bargaining orders, I also detect in the Armcor-Hedstrom rule a distrust of the persons charged with making an initial determination of the necessity of a Gissel bargaining order, the administrative law judges. This view is confirmed by the Baerga-Hargenrader line of cases, in which this court has imposed increasingly rigorous factfinding requirements on Social Security Administration ALJs only when the decision of the ALJ is to deny social security disability benefits. See Cotter v. Harris, 642 F.2d 700, 708–712 (3d Cir. 1981) (Garth, J., dissenting). Such distrust, I suspect, stems from a belief that ALJs are second-class judges (if judges at all), marginally qualified, beholden to the employing agency, and, often, veterans of the agency whose cases they now decide. Many Article III judges, as well as scholarly critics and attorneys, consider the federal judiciary's life tenure, employment by a separate branch, and other indicia of independence to be singular assurances of impartial judgment and easily scorn agency "employees" who perform judicial functions without the full investiture of Article III privileges.

Accepting for purposes of argument that to be impartial judges must be independent of all political or employment pressures, I submit that the view that the ALJs are not sufficiently independent or competent is now so shopworn as to be totally obsolete. To the contrary, ALJs, though not yet annointed with life tenure, enjoy an independence that in my view is plainly sufficient to satisfy reasonable doubts.[10]

For example, although ALJs are considered agency personnel, they are selected by the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) independently of agency recommendation or rating, 5 U.S.C. § 5362, and cannot be removed from office without a hearing establishing good cause before the Merit Systems Protection Board 5 U.S.C. § 7521. Their pay is controlled by the Civil Service Commission. ALJs can be disqualified from a case only upon petition by either the agency or a private party. 5 U.S.C. § 556(b). Similarly, cases are assigned on a rotating basis so that the agency cannot "fix" the result by choice of judge. 5 U.S.C. § 3105. They are not subject to the whim of the agency. ALJs are strictly independent of investigative or prosecutorial personnel in the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 554(d).

Moreover, the selection process for ALJs should inspire more respect for this office than is generally extended by Article III judges; it is a process that requires rigorous inquiries into the background and competence of the candidates. Applicants must supply twenty professional references. A minimum of seven years of litigation experience is required to meet the threshold selection requirement. A test opinion must be drafted and evaluated on the basis of many factors including clarity and conciseness. See Office of Personnel Management, Announcement No. 318, Administrative Law Judge 13–16 (1979). Finally, after the various scores have been combined, applicants considered tentatively eligible are interviewed by a special panel usually composed of an OPM official, an attorney qualified in the field of administrative law, and an agency official. This committee submits a recommendation to the director of OPM who makes final eligibility determinations among qualified candidates. Once appointed to an agency, an ALJ is not subjected to the usual probationary employment period for agency employees, further insuring ALJ independence. 5 U.S.C. § 3321.

[9] As a dispute over application of law to facts, this case does not meet our usual requirements for rehearing in banc. This court's internal Operating Procedure VIII B. provides: "This court does not ordinarily grant rehearing in banc where the panel's statement of the law is correct and the controversial issue is solely the application of the law to the circumstances of the case."

[10] See generally Lubbers, Federal Administrative Law Judges: A Focus on our Invisible Judiciary, 33 Admin.L.Rev. 109 (1981); Admin. Conference of the United States, Federal Administrative Law Judge Hearings 7–20 (1980). Cf. Nash v. Califano, 613 F.2d 10 (2d Cir. 1980) (ALJ has standing to challenge attempted interference with decisional independence by Social Security Administration).

The Supreme Court recognized in Butz v. Economou, 438 U.S. 478, 98 S.Ct. 28947, 57 L.Ed.2d 895 (1978), that ALJs are "functionally comparable" to judges employed in the judicial branch and conferred on them absolute immunity for judicial acts. In doing so the Court observed:

> There can be little doubt that the role of the modern federal hearing examiner or administrative law judge within this framework is "functionally comparable" to that of a judge. His powers are often, if not generally, comparable to those of a trial judge. * * * More importantly, the process of agency adjudication is currently structured so as to assure that the hearing examiner exercises his independent judgment on the evidence before him, free from pressures by the parties or other officials within the agency. Prior to the Administrative Procedure Act, there was considerable concern that persons hearing administrative cases at the trial level could not exercise independent judgement because they were required to perform prosecutorial and investigative functions as well as their judicial work * * * and because they were often subordinate to executive officials within the agency * * *. Since the securing of fair and competent hearing personnel was viewed as "the heart of formal administrative adjudication," Final Report of the Attorney General's Committee on Adminstrative Procedure 46 (1941), the Administrative Procedure Act contains a number of provisions designed to guarantee the independence of hearing examiners.

438 U.S. 513–14, 98 S.Ct. at 2914 (citations omitted).

The rigors of the selection procedure and the statutory protections of ALJ independence suggest to me that the federal judiciary need not look down its collective nose at ALJ decisions. Cf. Eastern Engineering & Elevator Co., Inc. v. NLRB, 637 F.2d 191 (3d Cir. 1980) (NLRB must respect special competence of ALJ who has the benefit of first-hand observation of witnesses). I am not proposing that the judiciary abandon all distinctions between ALJs and Article III judges when reviewing decisions, for Congress has clearly intended that review be on a different level. Of course, in the review of the choice and application of legal precepts, a judicial function dramatically different from reviewing factfinding, I have not been loath to criticize either the ALJ or the agency. See Allegheny General Hospital v. NLRB, 608 F.2d 965, 967–69 (3d Cir. 1979). But I perceive that under the legislative schema, at least in the context of factfinding, the difference may well be more tenuous than our decisions in the Gissel and Hargenrader context indicate.

IV.

I concur in the judgment enforcing the bargaining order in this case, but I reject the standard applied to the Board's decision. I reject the standard because it represents unwarranted interference with choices committed by Congress to the agency and thereby impedes the development of a coherent national labor policy by the NLRB. I also reject the standard because it is a rule applied to achieve results not based on the reasons given. I am convinced that as long as the court continues to anatomize the Board's reasons for imposing a bargaining order, these cases will continue to be self-inflicted wounds that will drain our energies; energies that should be husbanded, not dissipated.

I.

GARTH, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part, with whom JAMES HUNTER, III, and WEIS, Circuit Judges, join: I agree with the majority that there is substantial evidence to support the Board's findings of unfair labor practices. I also agree with the majority's reaffirmance of our precedents which require that the Board articulate its reasons for imposing a bargaining order. Maj. op. typescript at 11; Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 305 (3d Cir. 1980) (en banc) (Hedstrom II); NLRB v. Armcor Indus., Inc., 535 F.2d 239 (3d Cir. 1976). I do not agree, however, that either the ALJ or the Board complied with our articulation requirement and thus I would deny enforcement of the bargaining order.

529

II.

Both the majority and I recognize this court's insistence that the Board explain why it imposed a bargaining order rather than ordering a re-run election. In this respect we are all aware that the Supreme Court has admonished the Board that elections are the preferred way to ascertain whether a union has majority support. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 602, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1934, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). The Second Circuit has summarized the law governing the Board's choice of remedies for employer unfair labor practices committed during a representation election as follows:

> Where an employer's misconduct taints a prior union election by adversely affecting the employees' freedom of choice, the traditional remedy, frequently characterized as the "preferred" or "superior" remedy, see NLRB v. Jamaica Towing, Inc., 602 F.2d 1100, 1104 (2d Cir. 1979); Donn Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 613 F.2d 162, 165 (6th Cir. 1980); Peerless of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 484 F.2d 1108, 1122 (7th Cir. 1973), has been to (1) vacate the election, (2) enjoin the employer from engaging in such misbehavior, (3) require him to post "contrition" notices to his employees, disavowing any future interference, and (4) direct him to give union representatives reasonable access to the employees. This is then followed by a new Board-supervised election. The issuance by the Board of a bargaining order in lieu of a cease-and-desist order is only proper if, after an objective review of all of the relevant surrounding circumstances, including the nature of the employer's misbehavior and any later events bearing on its impact on the employees, it may reasonably be concluded that the employees will be unable to exercise a free choice in an Board-supervised rerun election.

Thus, to deny an election, and by so doing, to disenfranchise the employees, the circumstances must be egregious, and the reasons for the denial must be explained.[1] The only difference between the majority's opinion and this opinion is that whereas the majority is satisfied with the Board's "explanation", I am not. In order to explain my position respecting the absence of explanation and articulation by the Board in this case, a brief review of the context in which the problem arises is necessary.

Any discussion of bargaining orders must start with Gissel which established two categories of cases in which bargaining orders may be imposed. I agree with the majority that here we are concerned with a Gissel II case. See maj. op., typescript at 11, n.1. In Gissel II cases—"less extraordinary cases marked by less pervasive practices which nevertheless still have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election process", NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 614 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1940, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969)—it first must be shown that at one point the union had a majority. The Board then should consider:

> the extensiveness of an employer's unfair practices in terms of their past effect on election conditions and the likelihood of their recurrence in the future. If the Board finds that the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and or ensuring a fair election (or a fair rerun) by the use of traditional remedies, though present, is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order, then such an order should issue * * *

We have implemented this teaching by persistently requiring that the NLRB explicate the basis for the imposition of a bargaining order. See Kenworth Trucks v. NLRB, 580 F.2d 55, 59–60 (3d Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Craw, 565 F.2d 1267, 1271–72 (3d Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Eagle Material Handling, Inc., 558 F.2d 160, 166–68 (3d Cir. 1977); *Hedstrom Co. v. [1] Judge Weis has expressed his views as to why bargaining orders should not be issued in an ordinary case:

> Routine issuance of bargaining orders after a review of the facts and a conclusory finding that the unfair labor practices were "egregious," "prevasive" or "chilling" is simply unacceptable. Bargaining orders have been defended as a necessary sanction to deter misconduct by an overreaching employer, but such orders do not affect the employer alone—they also fall on employees. It is they who lose the right to vote in favor of one union or another or none at all—rights that the National Labor Relations Act guarantees to them. Moreover, the Board's remedies should right the wrong—not act as punitive measures. Republic Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 7, 61 S.Ct. 77, 85 L.Ed. 6 (1940).
> In imposing bargaining orders, the Board is subordinating the employee's right to express his choice to its forecast as to who would have won the election if the employer had maintained laboratory conditions. When that prediction is little more than a guess, however, the Board's paternalism does not justify depriving the employees of their vote. The extreme response of a bargaining order should be the exception and not the norm—a principle recognized by this court in Armcor and Hedstrom.

Electric Prods. Div. of Midland-Ross v. NLRB, 617 F.2d 977, 991 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ——, 101 S.Ct. 210, 66 L.Ed.2d 91 (1980) (Weis, J., dissenting) (footnotes omitted).

I); NLRB V. Armcor Indus., Inc., 535 F.2d 239 (3d Cir. 1976). This requirement aids our review of a petition for enforcement by helping to ensure that the Board has given full consideration to the preferred alternative of a re-run election. See Armcor, supra at 245.

In the en banc decision of Hedstrom II, we wrote:

> The primary purpose of this requirement is to assist a reviewing court in determining whether the standards of gissel have been satisfied. Since the propriety of a bargaining order depends upon the existence of certain circumstances, it is fitting for the board to "explain with specificity the results of the unfair labor practices and, in particular, the unlikelihood of a fair election," NLRB v. Craw, 565 F.2d 1267, 1272 (3d Cir. 1977), before seeking enforcement of such an order. This is not to say, of course, that a reasoned elaboration of the basis for a bargaining order by itself will assure that a careful weighing of the evidence has occurred, but only that it should help to further such an aim.

Id. at 309 (footnote omitted).

Our court held in Hedstrom II that the Board must provide a reasoned analysis, setting forth those factors justifying the imposition of a bargaining order. The analysis need not be elaborate, but the Board must:

> "estimate the impact [of the unfair labor practices], taking into account the factors in the particular case which are indicative of actual effect or which plausibly, in the light of existing knowledge, would contribute to or detract from an actual inpact," and appraise "those factors which might reasonably have a bearing" on the likelihood of a fair rerun election.

Hedstrom II at 309 quoting Peerless of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 484 F.2d 1108, 1118 n. 16 (7th Cir. 1973). Peerless was also quoted in Kenworth Trucks of Philadelphia v. NLRB, 580 F.2d at 60, NLRB v. Craw, 565 F.2d at 1271, and NLRB v. Armcor Industries, Inc., 535 F.2d at 245.

Hedstrom I had resulted in a remand to the Board because no such analysis, articulation or explanation had been made by the Board in justifying the imposition of a bargaining order. Thereafter, in Headstrom II, the Board, complying with our directive, explained that a bargaining order was necessary and that a rerun election could not fairly be ordered. On the record of that case the Board found that:

> the total effect of the threats of closure, and the numerous other unfair labor practices against the background of the general awareness of the Fitchburg experience, was to instill in employees a strong fear of loss of employment that would continue to be operative even in the event of a second election. This fear could only have been exacerbated by the publication of the newspaper editorial.
> We find that "the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election (or a fair rerun) by the use of traditional remedies, through present, is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order.* * *"[11] This conclusion is not significantly affected by the reviewing court's reversal of our finding that President Ketcham violated Section 8(a)(1) by threating to fire an employee. The reversal does not disturb any of the findings concerning the threats of plant closure, or the overall context in which those threats occurred, which form the basis for our conclusion that a bargaining order is warranted.

(Appendix Hedstrom II at 10a) (footnotes 10 and 12 omitted).

In further compliance with our requirements, the Board also reasoned and explained that the passage of time had not increased the prospects of a fair election:

> the effect of Respondent's threats of plant closure and its extensive unfair labor practices during the course of the campaign was to instill in employees the fear that they would lose their jobs through plant closure if the Union won the election. There is nothing to indicate that this fear has been erased during the past 3 years. To the contrary, recent events indicate that Respondent's vigorous opposition to the Union continues to result in unfair labor practices, thereby sustaining, reinforcing, or increasing the fear that the Company might still carry out its earlier threat to close operations if the Union prevails.

(Appendix 11a–12a). Finally, the Board reexamined our reversal of the Section 8(a)(5) violation and concluded that even absent that violation, a bargaining order was necessary.

A majority of this court held that the Board's explanation satisfied our mandate of a "reasoned analysis."

Our court is not alone in requiring the Board to explain its reasons for rejecting a re-run election in favor of imposing a bargaining order.[2] The Seventh Circuit, whose opinion in Peerless of America Inc. v. NLRB, 484 F.2d 1108 (7th Cir. 1973) was relied upon by this court in Hedstrom II, Craw and Armcor, has again forcefully reiterated an identical instruction to the Board in Red Oaks Nursing Home v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 503 (7th Cir. 1980). The court in that case found the Board's reasons for imposing a bargaining order insufficient. The ALJ, in an opinion adopted by the Board, had stated:

> I do not, however, consider the unfair labor practices committed to be minor in view of their nature, number, and extent of probable impact throughout the bargaining unit. In my opinion, neither the factors recited above nor the Board's traditional remedies for Section 8(a)(1) violations render it likely that another election would result in a truer measure of unihibited employee choice than the authorizaiton cards executed on or before August 22, 1977. I therefore in all the circumstances of this case find that the Respondent's unfair labor practices have undermined the Union's majority and make the holding of a fair election most unlikely, and recommend that the petition in Case 25–RC–6717 be dismissed and the Respondent be ordered to bargain on request.

Quoted in id. at 509.

In denying enforcement of the Board's order, the Seventh Circuit wrote:

> the opinion of the ALJ contains no consideration of the effectiveness of the ordinary remedies, the continuing impact of the unfair labor practices on the election process, and the probability of repeated violations, which are also prerequisites for a bargaining order. See Peerless, supra, 484 F.2d at 1118. By not stating separately why the circumstances of this case require a bargaining order, the > Board appears in effect to be automatically issuing bargaining orders on the basis of virtually any unfair labor practice, a policy clearly not in accordance with Gissel. See NLRB v. Appletree Chevrolet, Inc., 608 F.2d 988, 998, 103 LRRM 2066 (4th Cir. 1979).

It is thus evident that this Circuit is not the only circuit that requires the Board to provide an adequate articulation of reasons before it issues a bargaining order.

Requiring the Board to articulate its reasons for imposing a bargaining order does not represent an unwarranted judicial interference with administrative procedure. Indeed that requirement, as we have pointed out, stems from the Supreme Court's instructions in Gissel, and from fundamental rules of administrative law. See, e.g., SEC v. Chenery Corp., 332 U.S. 194, 196–97, 67 S.Ct. 1975, 1577, 91 L.Ed. 1995 (1947); 5 U.S.C. § 557(c)(3)(A) (1976). The Supreme Court has consistently instructed that > [i]f the administrative action is to be tested by the basis upon which it purports to rest, that basis must be set forth with such clarity as to be understandable. It will not do for a court to be compelled to guess at the theory underlying the agency's action; nor can a court be expected to chisel that which must be precise from what the agency has left vague and indecisive. In other words, "We must know what a decision means before the duty becomes ours to say whether it is right or wrong." United States v. Chicago, M., St.P.& P.R. Co., 294 U.S. 499, 511, 55 S.Ct. 462, 467, 79 L.Ed. 1023.

Chenery at 196, 67 S.Ct. at 1577.

This basic requirement which focuses on effective judicial review cannot be deemed to constitute an undue burden on the Board, and does not intrude upon internal Board procedures in a manner proscribed by the principle expressed in Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Corp. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 435 U.S. 519, 98 S.Ct. 1197, 55 L.Ed.2d 460 (1978). See Kenworth Trucks v.

[2] See, e.g., NLRB v. Jamaica Towing, Inc., 632 F.2d 208, 211 (2d Cir. 1980); Chromalloy Mining and Minerals v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 1120, 1129–30 (5th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Appletree Chevrolet, Inc., 608 F.2d 988, 998 (4th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Pilgrim Foods, Inc., 591 F.2d 110, 119 (1st Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Pacific Southwest Airlines, 550 F.2d 1148, 1152 (9th Cir. 1977); Peerless of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 484 F.2d 1108 (7th Cir. 1973).

NLRB, 580 F.2d 55, 61–63 (1978). Our requirement of reasoned articulation does no more than mandate that the Board inform us of the basis upon which its decision is predicated. "When the Board * * * exercises the discretion given to it by Congress, it must 'disclose the basis of its order' and 'give clear indication that it has exercised the discretion with which Congress has empowered it.' Phelps Dodge Corp. v. Labor Board, 313 U.S. 177, 197 [61 S.Ct. 845, 853, 85 L.Ed. 1271]." NLRB v. Metropolitan Insurance Co., 380 U.S. 438, 443, 85 S.Ct. 1061, 1064, 15 L.ED.2d 951 (1965). The obligation of reasoned analysis is essential to perform our reviewing function and to guarantee the integrity of the administrative process.

III.

I cannot agree with the majority that the opinion of the administrative law judge adopted by the Board in this case, satisfies the standard set forth in Hedstrom II. When contrasted with the analysis and articulation of the Board in Hedstrom II, it is quite apparent that the conclusory discussion of the administrative law judge in this case is woefully deficient. It is even less detailed than the analysis rejected in Red Oaks. Virtually the entire thrust of the ALJ's discussion here was focused not on the reasons why a fair re-election was impossible, but rather on the reasons why the initial election of December 30, 1977 had to be set aside. After summarizing the unfair labor practices found, he stated:

> In sum, Respondent sought to impress upon the employees the futility of voting the Union in, and that there would be harsher dealing and reprisal if they did. The mass of violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act were egregious unfair labor practices, which had the tendency to undermine, and undermined, the Union's majority strength in the election of December 30, 1977, and prevented the holding of a fair election.
> By refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union, as requested on November 11, 1977, and instead engaging in this course of unlawful conduct which undermined the Union's majority status and prevented the holding of a fair election, Respondent also violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, Trading Port, Inc., 219 NLRB 298, 300–301 (1975).
> Under the circumstances of this case, the sentiment of the unit employees expressed through the Union authorization cards is a more reliable measure of their desires on the issue of representation than the election held December 30, 1977. To remedy Respondent's unfair labor practices, including its Section 8(a)(5) refusal to bargain, a bargaining order is necessary, whether the violations be viewed as category one unfair labor practices under Gissel, supra, see J.P. Stevens & Co., Inc., Culistan Division v. N.L.R.B., 441 F.2d 514, 521–522 (C.A. 5, 1971), cert. denied 404 U.S. 830 [92 S.Ct. 69, 30 L.Ed.2d 59], or as category two unfair labor practices, see N.L.R.B. v. Kaiser Agricultural Chemicals etc., 473 F.2d 374, 382–383 (C.A. 5, 1973). The bargaining order will be issued as of the end of October 1977, when Respondent embarked on its course of unlawful conduct.

The reasoning of the ALJ was that since unfair labor practices had prevented the holding of a fair election and had undermined the union's majority strength, a bargaining order was necessary. At no time did he satisfy the Hedstrom II obligation to estimate the impact of the various violations and appraise "those factors which might reasonably have a bearing on the likelihood of a fair re-run election." Hedstrom II at 309. The ALJ never discussed in this section of this opinion why "the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election (or a fair rerun) by the use of traditional remedies, though present, is slight * * *" Gissel 395 U.S. at 614, 89 S.Ct. at 1940. Only in the conclusions of law section of his opinion does the ALJ state, unsupported by any articulation of reasons, that "these [pre election] unfair labor practices cannot be corrected by conventional remedies, including a rerun election." App. at 50. He failed completely to address, let alone answer, the crucial inquiry whether there was a likelihood that the unfair labor practices would recur, a consideration that Gissel indicates should be taken into account. Gissel at 614, 89 S.Ct. at 1940.

Moreover, the ALJ and the Board, in holding that a bargaining order was necessary under Gissel II, did not distinguish between pre- and post-card majority violations. See Rapid Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 144 (3d Cir. 1979). I agree with the majority that unfair labor practices that occur before a card majority is attained, may, under certain circumstances, support the imposition of a Gissel II bargaining order. Yet in my opinion, an inference is present that pre-card (as contrasted with post-card) majority unfair labor practices do not significantly undermine the union's majority strength. This inference can be drawn because in Gissel II cases, where a majority is required, the union obviously gains adherents even after the occurrence of pre-card majority unlawful conduct. Normally such pre-majority violations would provide less support for the imposition of a bargaining order than would post-majority violations. Accordingly, when finding that the possibility for a fair re-run election is slight, the Board, if it relies on pre-card majority unfair labor practices, must carry a heavier burden in explaining why this conduct supports its imposition of a bargaining order. No such burden has been satisfied here by the Board. Indeed the ALJ and the Board failed even to distinguish between pre- and post-card violations. Thus I cannot agree with the majority that the ALJ's opinion, which the Board adopted, satisfies the Gissle or Hedstrom II requirements.[3]

I do not believe that it is incumbent upon the members of this court to point out constantly and repetitively those factors which the Board must consider before it concludes that a fair re-run election cannot be held and that a bargaining order must be imposed. The Board, not the court, has the statutory burden of determining which remedy is appropriate. 29 U.S.C. § 160(c) (1976). See Gissel at 612 n. 32, 89 S.Ct. at 1939.[4] Certainly this court alone has furnished more than ample guidance to the Board, as to what is expected in meeting this burden.

At the last, the Board in its review of the ALJ's findings, should have considered: the closeness of the vote; the extent to which the impact of the unfair labor practices persisted in the minds of the employees and whether this impact likely would have tainted a future election; the change in the composition of the workforce; the status of the Mennen contract; the weight to be given pre-card majority violations; the effect of the passage of time; the probability of repeated violations by Permanent Label; and the effectiveness of perferred traditional remedies. There are undoubtedly other factors and facts that the Board should have considered, but since this court has repeatedly instructed the Board in various contexts as to what constitutes a proper analysis, see Hedstrom II at 311–12; Rapid Mfg. Co., supra; NLRB v. Garry Mfg. Co., 630 F.2d 934 (3d Cir. 1980) (Weis, J., dissenting); Electrical Prods. Div. of Midland-Ross Corp. v. NLRB, 617 F.2d 977, 990 (3d Cir.) cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 101 S.Ct. 210, 66 L.Ed.2d 91 (1980) (Weis, J., dissenting), I am loathe to once again tread the same ground.

I do not believe that we as a court should be forced to infer from the ALJ's opinion, which lacks a reasoned articulation, what the ALJ intended to explain to justify the bargaining order. The majority in its interpretation of the ALJ's opinion, maj. op., at 520, has for the first time supplied the required articulation of reasons which neither the [3] I recognize that the "articulation" of the administrative law judge which was adopted by the Board in Kenworth Trucks v. NLRB, 580 F.2d 55 (3d Cir. 1978) could be equated in some respects to the articulation of the Board which we reject in this case. But I am satisfied that Kenworth does not compel the enforcement of the Board's order here. Nowhere in Kenworth did the Court address the sufficiency of the ALJ's explanation. Instead the Kenworth panel, as Chief Judge Seitz's opinion recognizes, maj. op., at 521 n.2, focused on whether the Board itself, as distinct from the ALJ, was required to analyze and articulate the reasons for the issuance of a bargaining order. After first holding that the Board had an independent obligation to formulate the reasons for issuing a bargaining order, the court on rehearig held that a separate articulation was not necessary the Board could simply adopt the ALJ's explanation. After having decided the central issue before it, the court then proceeded to enforce the Board's order, withour assessing the sufficiency of the ALJ's articulation of reasons.

On its face, the discussion implicitly accepted by the court in Kenworth is not dissimilar to the conclusory discussion found in this case. However, as I have pointed out, the court in Kenworth did not direct its attention to the adequacy of the ALJ's analysis. Thus, Kenworth may not be construed as holding that a conclusory analysis and conclusory articulation of reasons for the imposition of a bargaining order is all that is required. Even if Kenworth was construed as standing for such a proposition, our decision in Hedstrom II filed some two years after Kenworth and issuing from an en banc court clearly demonstrates that the type of conclusory statement found in Kenworth may not be relied upon to support a bargaining order.

Hence, whatever vitality may have once been attributed to such a construction of Kenworth, has been thoroughly undermined by Hedstrom II, and cannot fairly be read as diluting the Hedstrom II standard reaffirmed today.

[4] Cf. Red Oaks Nursing Home v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 503, 509 (7th Cir. 1980) ("typically, this court has reached the merits of the propriety of the order, in part to avoid further compromise of employee rights inherent in the delay of remand. * * * Thus, the effect of the Board's continuing neglect to fashion standards for the exercise of its discretion is to place exclusive reliance on judicially prescribed standards for determining the need for bargaining orders, a practice not contemplated by section 10(c) of the Act.")

ALJ nor the Board furnished. It is possible that these are the same reasons which the Board would have articulated in explaining its denial of a re-run election. But then again, the possibility exists that the Board's explanation may have differed from that now provided by the majority. It is for that very reason that the Supreme Court emphasized the following:

> simple but fundamental rule of administrative law * * * that a reviewing court, in dealing with a determination or judgment which an administrative agency alone is authorized to make, must judge the propriety of such action solely by the > grounds invoked by the agency. If those grounds are inadequate or improper, the court is powerless to affirm the administrative action by substituting what it considers to be a more adequate or proper basis. To do so would propel the court into the domain which Congress has set aside exclusively for the administrative agency.

Securities and Exchange Commission v. Chenery, 332 U.S. 194, 196, 67 S.Ct. 1575, 1577, 91 L.Ed. 1995 (1947).

Because in this case the Board has once again failed to comply with our oft-repeated instructions, I would deny enforcement to its order so that a re-run election could immediately be ordered [5] or at the very least, I would remand for the explanation which this court requires. Thus, to the extent that the majority would give effect to the bargaining order, I respectfully dissent from the majority's opinion.

---

[5] The longer a re-run election is delayed the less likely the union's chances of reversing the outcome of the first election. Gissel at 611 n.30, 89 S.Ct. at 1938. A remand also raises the possible need for further judicial review, and hence further delay.

Revco D.S., Inc., and/or White Cross Stores., No. 14 v. NLRB

653 F.2d 264 (6th Cir.), July 1, 1981—243 NLRB 261

On petition to review and cross-petition to enforce Board Order

Before EDWARDS, Chief Judge, KEITH, Circuit Judge, and CECIL, Senior Circuit Judge

264

KEITH, Circuit Judge: This case is before us on a petition for review and cross petition for enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board. The Board found that the employer in this case violated Section 8(a) of the National Labor Relations Act [1] by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the duly certified representative of its employees. The Board's decision and order is reported at 243 N.L.R.B. No. 35.

265

On April 21, 1978, a representation election was held at the employer's retail store at Penn Mall in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Seven votes were cast for the Retail Store Employees' union; four were cast against the union.

The company objected to the election, claiming that union misconduct had tainted the election results. The Regional Director conducted an administrative investigation of the objections. On June 30, 1978, the Regional Director issued a Report and Recommendation on Objections in which he concluded that company's objections raised no "substantial or material issues with respect to conduct affecting the results of the election." Accordingly, the Regional Director recommended that the company's objections to the election be overruled and that the union be certified as the exclusive bargaining representative of the company's employees. On September 14, 1978, the Board adopted the Regional Director's findings and recommendations and certified the Union.

In order to obtain appellate review of the Board's certification of the union, the company refused to bargain with the union. The company claimed that it refused to bargain because the union was improperly certified. The Board rejected the company's claims, issued a bargaining order and ordered the customary notices to be posted.

[1] Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1); (5) provide in relevant part:

> It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7 * * * (5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees * * *

Section 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157 provides:

In this appeal, the company challenges the fairness of the election. We note at the outset that the company has a heavy burden to justify overturning a secret ballot election. As we noted in Harlan # 4 Coal Co. v. N.L.R.B., 490 F.2d 117, 120 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 986 94 S.Ct. 2390, 40 L.Ed.2d 763 (1974), "[C]ongress has entrusted to the Board considerable latitude in resolving disputes concerning representation, and our task is to determine whether the Board has acted arbitrarily in the exercise of its wide degree of discretion." See also Randall Burkart/Randall Div. v. NLRB, 638 F.2d 957 (6th Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Pinkerton's, 621 F.2d 1322 (6th Cir. 1980).

Most of the company's objections dealt with alleged union misconduct during the pre-election campaign. The company claimed that the union made numerous misrepresentations and put out unfair propaganda. The NLRB is cautious in setting aside elections on these grounds. The standard that the Board applies is whether pre-election misstatements "may reasonably be expected to have a significant impact on the election". Hollywood Ceramics Co., Inc., 140 NLRB 221, 224 (1962), reaffirmed in General Knit of California, Inc., 239 NLRB No. 101 (1978).[2]

The regional director did find that a union agent had stated to employees that a collective bargaining agreement could be obtained by January 1979, and that another union agent stated that the union had 1 year in which to obtain an agreement. However, the regional director concluded that these instances did not warrant overturning the election, since the union had not promised employees tangible benefits which it had the exclusive power to deliver nor had it misrepresented any existing material facts.

Similarly, the company complained that the employees were promised $50 per week in strike benefits should a strike occur, that their strike effort would be joined by one of the union's sister locals, and that local Pittsburgh customers would not cross the picket line anyway. The regional director concluded that the evidence did not support the allegations. However, even assuming the truth of the allegations, the regional director concluded that any discussion of strike benefits was not related to the election results, nor did it affect how the employees voted.

In addition, the company claimed that employee Paul Schwartz informed a fellow employee that if it wasn't for the union campaign, she would not have a job. Here, the regional commissioner accepted the fact that this statement was made. However, he pointed out the Schwartz was not an officer or agent of the union, and there was no basis for attributing the statement to the union. At best, the commissioner thought that Schwartz's statement was simply a private opinion.

The company further complained about remarks made by two employees during the campaign. These remarks were to the effect that the company had cut employee working hours because of a bonus that was given to a manager, that only 3% of the company's profits went to payroll, and that the Pittsburgh store could easily afford to pay $.50—$.75 per hour higher wages. Here, the regional director pointed out that the people in question were employees who supported the union campaign. The director found no basis for attributing these remarks to the union. The director characterized the employee statements as simply uninformed speculation, and concluded that any employee voter would readily recognize and discount assertions by co-workers, especially where there was no showing that the union was aware of or ratified the employees' conduct.

We agree with the regional director and the Board that the company's allegations are insufficient to warrant overturning the election or conducting an evidentiary hearing. In addition to the Board's above-outlined reasons for rejecting the company's claims, we note that the company at no time was precluded from making an effective reply to the alleged misrepresentations. The pre-election campaign was conducted for about a month prior to the election. As the Board notes in its brief, the company was not helpless to correct any misunderstanding.

In addition to the above-stated "campaign objections", the company also claimed that there was misconduct on election day. The employer presented two witnesses, Emmanuel Zimmerman, the company supervisor of stores for the greater Pittsburgh area, and Paul Christopher, merchandise manager. Zimmerman claimed that on the day of the election, union representative Jack Lewis came into the store and pointed at each of the employees present, but did not say anything to them. Zimmerman further testified that Lewis then walked over to where one employee was standing at the back of the store, grabbed his shoulder, and said "Hi, Bill", and started talking to him. Zimmerman said that he permitted the employee and Lewis to converse for about 30 seconds, after which time he instructed the employee to work in the front of the store. Christopher stated that on the day of the election he observed union representatives in the store on two occasions, and on each occasion they spoke to a single employee.

The regional director concluded that there was no objectionable conduct. The director pointed out that any conversation with employees occurred away from the polling area about three hours before the starting time of the election. There was no evidence that any of the remarks made by the union representatives were improper.

We have no problems with the Board's determination so far. The company has a stiff burden to show circumstances warranting the overturning of a union election. We agree with the Board that the circumstances presented in this case do not warant additional inquiry at a hearing or overturning the election.

The final argument the company makes is that the Regional Director overlooked additional evidence supplied by company supervisor Zimmerman. This evidence shows that on the day of the election union agent Lewis, accompanied by company supervisor Zimmerman, visited each of the employees at the store. The purpose of this joint visit was to notify the employees that the polls were open. According to Zimmerman, when employees Kevin and Judy Wilson expressed uncertainty over whether they were going to vote, Lewis gave them a "look". Thereupon, both indicated that they would vote.

The company alleges coercive conduct. However, its own supervisor, Zimmerman, who was present at the scene, did not allege that any threatening or menacing conduct occurred. Accepting the company's assertions as true, there is no showing that Lewis coerced the Wilsons, or that he did more than register disapproval when they said they were undecided about voting. As the Board notes in its brief, Board elections would be fragile indeed if such conduct required that they be set aside. We must agree with the Board that the company's allegations do not warrant an evidentiary hearing.

II

The company also makes a procedural objection. The company claims that the "record" before the Board was deficient because it did not include the affidavits uncovered during the Regional Director's investigation.

In several recent decisions this court has ruled that "the Board abuses its discretion by adopting the report of the Regional Director when the Regional Director fails to transmit to the Board the evidence relied upon by the Regional Director." NLRB v. North Electric Co., 644 F.2d 580 (6th Cir. 1981), citing NLRB v. Curtis Noll Corp., 634 F.2d 1027, 1029 (6th Cir. 1980). See also Prestolite Wire Div. v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 302 (6th Cir. 1979).

We find these authorities to be distinguishable. This Court has never retreated from its position in NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., 379 F.2d 172 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 958, 88 S.Ct. 338, 19 L.Ed.2d 364 (1967) (Cecil, J.) that:

> It is incumbent upon the party seeking a hearing to clearly demonstrate that factual issues exist which can only be resolved by an evidentiary hearing. The exceptions must state the specific findings that are controverted and must show what evidence will be presented to support a contrary finding or conclusion. Mere disagreement with the Regional Director's reasoning and conclusions do[es] not raise "substantial and material factual issues." this is not to say that a party cannot except to the inferences and conclusions drawn by the Regional Director, but that such disagreement, in itself, cannot be the basis for demanding a hearing. To request a hearing a party must, in its exceptions, define its disagreements and make an offer of proof to support findings contrary to those of the Regional Director. The Board is entitled to rely on the report of the Regional Director in the absence of specific assertions of error, substantiated by offers of proof. [Citations omitted.]

In the above-cited cases, this court found that the company's allegations required either a hearing, NLRB v. Curtis Noll Corp., supra; Prestolite Wire Div. v. NLRB, supra, or at least required the Board to "interpret * * * and giv[e] weight to the evidence developed by the Regional Director." NLRB v. North Electric Co., supra at 584. Our examination of the company's allegations in this case, outlined above in part I, convinces us that the company's allegations are not sufficient to require a remand to the Board to consider the additional affidavits. There are simply not sufficient substantial and material issues raised. See Reichart Furniture Co. v. NLRB, 649 F.2d 397 (6th Cir. 1981); Randall, Burkart/Randall Div. v. NLRB, 638 F.2d 957 (6th Cir. 1981); Birmingham Ornamental Iron Co. v. NLRB, 615 F.2d 661 (5th Cir. 1980); Prestolite Wire Div. v. NLRB, supra at 305-06 (citing cases). See also Fotomat v. NLRB, 634 F.2d 320 (6th Cir. 1980).

Courts should be wary of reversing the Board on procedural irregularities, absent evidence of prejudice. All such reversals do is cause further delays and add to the already unfortunate backlog of NLRB cases pending before this court. As Judge Cecil wrote in a related context:

> If a hearing is required to be held on all exceptions to an election or report of a Regional Director, it would unduly lengthen and prolong labor unrest, contrary to the very purposes of the National Labor Relations Act.

NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., supra, 379 F.2d at 178. See also NLRB v. Basic Wire Products, Inc. 516 F.2d 261, 266 (6th Cir. 1975) ("were we to mandate hearings every time a losing party cries 'foul,' we would frustrate the policy of the Act that calls for prompt certification of a properly victorious bargaining representative.")

Accordingly, the company's petition to review the Board's order is denied, and the Board's cross-petition for enforcement is granted.

Kenneth and Mary M. McGlaughlin, co-partners d/b/a Hudson-High Super Duper v. NLRB

652 F.2d 673 (6th Cir.), July 2, 1981

On petition to review Board Order

Before LIVELY, KEITH and MERRITT, Circuit Judges

Kenneth and Mary McGlaughlin, co-owners of a Super Duper Market in Columbus, Ohio, petition this Court to review an NLRB decision (247 N.L.R.B. No. 199) that they violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by coercively interrogating a job applicant concerning his union activities, and § 8(a)(3) by refusing to hire that applicant because of his union activities. They also request that this Court deny enforcement of the Board's order, which requires that the applicant be offered immediate employment in the position applied for (or one substantially equivalent) and that he be given backpay to the date he would have commenced employment. The NLRB cross-petitions for enforcement of its order. 29 U.S.C. §§ 160(e) and (f).

The case arises from petitioners' failure to hire a job applicant for the position of produce clerk. Shortly after the super market opened under the petitioners' ownership, vacancies appeared imminent in two of its produce positions—one because a clerk failed to appear for work and the other because a clerk planned on leaving the job to return to college. Petitioner Kenneth McGlaughlin told his manager to contact Gary Motz, who had earlier applied for a position in the produce department, to see if he was still interested in employment there. At the time Motz worked full-time as a truck driver and part-time as a produce clerk at another store. The focal event of the case is a telephone conversation between Douglas Jones, the manager of petitioner's store, and Motz. After reiterating his interest and availability for the position, Motz told Jones that he was still working at the other grocery store but was on strike supporting a union recognitional drive. The two then argued about the value of unions. The close of the conversation is disputed.

Petitioners claim that Jones simply thanked Motz for his time and said he had all the information he needed. Motz testified, the administrative law judge found, and the Board argues, that Jones told Motz he would be wasting his time if he came to the store to work out any further details of the job. That was the final contact between the parties. The clerk who had planned to return to college decided to stay on at the market, and petitioners hired no one in Motz's stead.

Charges were filed with the NLRB shortly thereafter. After a hearing the administrative law judge found that petitioners had violated §§ 8(a)(1) and (3) (App. 91–106). On review the Board upheld the bulk of the administrative law judge's decision (App. 106–14), but it modified the remedy. The Board found that when contacted by Jones, Motz was being considered for immediate employment to replace the employee who did not appear for work, and not to replace the student (id. at 110 & n.6). The Board therefore altered the remedy to require petitioners to offer Motz employment in the same or similar position regardless of whether one had later become available, and ordered backpay to the date Motz would have commenced work had he been hired shortly after his phone conversation with Jones.

Petitioners challenge the Board's decision on three grounds. First, they argue that the evidence does not demonstrate that the phone conversation, including the discussion about unions, amounted to an interrogation, nor that any coercive element existed. The Board argues that Jones' expression of anti-union sentiment and questioning Motz as to his sympathies, especially in light of the fact that Motz was not hired, lent coercive overtones to the conversation. Petitioners' second argument is that the decision not to hire was based upon legitimate economic reasons, viz. falling produce sales and the decision of the college student to remain on the job. The Board responds that the decision not to hire Motz was motivated solely by anti-union animus, evidenced by Jones' complete about-face during the phone conversation. The fact that later economic considerations could support a decision not to hire a produce clerk cannot serve as a post hoc justification for a decision that at the time it occurred was based upon illegal motives. Petitioners state finally that the Board erred in modifying the administrative law judge's remedy, and they rely again on the argument that no position in the produce department was available or filled by any other applicant. In response, the Board again relies upon its finding that a job opening existed when Motz was interviewed and for which he would have been hired in the absence of the unfair labor practices.

Each of these issues arises from a question of fact, and the scope of judicial review of a factual finding by the Board is narrow. Board determinations will be upheld if supported by substantial evidence in the record, even if the court might reach a different conclusion were it to resolve the controversy de novo. NLRB v. S.E. Nichols of Ohio, Inc., 472 F.2d 1228 (6th Cir. 1972); Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). A review of the record in this case convinces us that sufficient evidence exists to support the Board's conclusion as to the coercive nature of the telephone conversation, petitioners' motivation in refusing to hire Motz, and petitioners' initial intent to hire a produce clerk to replace the clerk who failed to report to work. Although the evidence may be open to different constructions, upon a review of the entire record we do not think that the Board's interpretation is unsupported by substantial evidence. Universal Camera, supra, at 487–88, 71 S.Ct. at 463–64.

Accordingly, the petition to reverse the Board's order is denied, and the cross-petition for enforcement is granted.

Charge Card Association v. NLRB

653 F.2d 272 (6th Cir.), July 7, 1981—247 NLRB 835

On petition to review Board Order

Before ENGEL and MERRITT, Circuit Judges, and PORTER, Senior District Judge*

273

Petitioner, Charge Card Association, seeks review and respondent enforcement of the National Labor Relations Board order finding of violations of § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

---

*The Honorable David S. Porter, Senior Judge, United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio, sitting by designation.

Charge Card Association provides retail customer credit checking, billing and related services to its member banks. This case centers around the employees of the keypunch department. In the summer and fall of 1977, Local 10 of the Office and Professional Employees International Union conducted an organizing campaign at Charge Card. In late November or early December of 1977, keypunch department supervisor Mary Litwin gathered four small groups of employees in her office to discuss the Union campaign. The meeting lasted about fifteen minutes, during which Litwin gave the employees a three page document by the Association president to read. The Administrative Law Judge found that "Litwin asked why the employees felt that they needed a union; gave the employees reasons why she felt they did not need a union and named the benefits that the employees had with the Respondent." (A. 447). In October of 1977 Patricia Walter, the afternoon supervisor in the keypunch department, met with employee Sandra J. Clark, with whom she was friendly. The Administrative Law Judge found that "Walker attempted to 'diagram' for Sandra J. [Clark] how the Respondent 'would fold if the Union came in,' by showing 'how the banks would eventually pull out one by one'." (A. 448). Three weeks later Walker called Clark at home and offered to trade information, but Clark refused to exchange information. The Administration Law Judge specifically credited Clark and discredited Walker's denial that she had conversed with Clark concerning unions. The Administrative Law Judge concluded that the actions of the two supervisors put pressure on employees to reveal information concerning protected activities, in violation of §8(a)(1) of the Act.

It is not a violation of the National Labor Relations Act for an employer to express views, argument or opinion concerning unionization, or to solicit information from employees, as long as the expression does not coerce or interfere with the employees in exercising their rights. 29 U.S.C. § 158(c); N.L.R.B. v. Paschall Truck Lines, Inc., 469 F.2d 74, 76 (6th Cir. 1972); Hughes & Hatcher, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 393 F.2d 557 (6th Cir. 1968). It is questionable whether the acts of supervisor Litwin in reading the Association statement and asking employees why they felt they needed a union constitute coercive interrogation in violation of the Act. It is evident, however, that supervisor Walker's statement that the Association "would fold if the Union came in" was a violation of the Act. N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1942, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969) (predictions of effect of unionization must be based on objective fact to convey employer's belief as to demonstrable probable consequences beyond his control). Enforcement of the NLRB order is granted as to this charge.

The remaining charges stem from acts that occurred after the attempt to formally organize was abandoned. The Union voluntarily withdrew its representation petition in December of 1977. There continued to be dissatisfaction in the keypunch department, and on Monday, January 9, 1978, thirteen of the nineteen department employees sought to present their grievances as a group to the Association president, who was out of town. In lieu of a group meeting, vice president Nagy met with the individual employees throughout the day. Nagy was aware that some of the employees appeared dissatisfied with the results of the meetings. The following day at least ten keypunch department employees called in sick. Day shift supervisor Litwin reported the abnormally high absences to personnel director Collins. Collins had the absent employees notified that they would not be permitted to return to work unless they presented a doctor's certificate attesting illness. The personnel manual states that the supervisor "may require written verification for any sick day taken, particularly where there is a history of excessive absenteeism." (A. 456). The Administrative Law Judge credited testimony, however, that it was the employer's practice to not require a certificate for absences less than five days unless the absence was near a holiday or there was a record of excessive absenteeism (A. 456–57).

When the keypunch employees returned to work the following day without a doctor's certificate they were not permitted to work and were ordered off the employer's premises. They were excluded the following day as well. That day they sent a letter to vice president Nagy stating that they had "staged a work stoppage in protest" and that they were "unconditionally ready to return to work" with the understanding that they would receive a deduction in pay for the one-day work stoppage (A. 451). The employees continued to report to work but were refused admission. On January 23d and 24th, personnel director Collins met with each employee and gave each a letter informing them that "[b]ecause of your actions, you have been suspended without pay" and that an adjustment in pay would be made for the day that they received sick pay. They were allowed to return to work "on a 180 day probationary status" during which "any unexcused absenteeism or tardiness * * * or any other disruption, insubordination or poor performance will result in the immediate termination of your employment." (A. 452). Each employee was asked to sign the letter but was not required to do so. The Administrative Law Judge credited testimony that during the meeting personnel director Collins expressed concern that the employees' actions "disrupted the Company" and that the purpose of the probation was to make sure that something like the action of the employees "didn't happen again." (A. 452). Four of the employees who participated in the work stoppage never returned to work. All other employees, except Sandra J. Clark, who was ill, returned to work. Three weeks after they returned to work each of the six employees involved in the work stoppage received a disciplinary letter from personnel director Collins. On April 11th three employees received additional disciplinary letters stating that they had violated the terms of the probation and that any further unexcused tardiness or absence would result in a five-day suspension without pay. Employee Sandra J. Clark was later suspended for five days when she failed to present a doctor's certificate for the full time of her absence (See A. 458-59).

The Administrative Law Judge concluded that the refusal to allow keypunch employees to return to work after the one-day work stoppage and the subsequent probation were violations of the Act. He also concluded that the suspension of Sandra J. Clark was unlawful. The Administrative Law Judge ordered the employer, among other things, to offer reinstatement to the employees.

A walkout of unorganized employees is a protected activity under the Act, Vic Tanny International, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 622 F.2d 237 (6th Cir. 1980); cf. N.L.R.B. v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9, 82 S.Ct. 1099, 8 L.Ed.2d. 298 (1962) (non-union employees did not lose right to engage in concerted activity merely because they did not present demand to employer prior to walkout), and an employer may not discipline or discharge an employee for engaging in protected activity. An employer, however, may discipline or discharge if such discipline would have been imposed even absent the protected activity. 29 U.S.C. § 160(c). The proper test for evaluating mixed-motive cases is whether punishment of protected activity or anti-union animus was a dominant motive in the employer's actions. The burden has been placed on the general counsel to demonstrate that absent protected activities the suspension or discharge would not have taken place. Propak Corp. v. N.L.R.B. 578 F.2d 169 (6th Cir. 1978). In Wright Line, 251 NLRB No. 150, 105 LRRM 1169 (1980), the Board determined that the General Counsel must make a prima facie showing that an illegal purpose was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision. Once the prima facie case has been established the burden shifts to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have been taken in the absence of the illegal motivation or factor. Under either the dominant motive test or the shifting burden as established in Wright Line, we conclude that there is not substantial evidence to support the conclusion that the reason for disciplining the employees was to punish them for engaging in a protected walk-out. The Administrative Law Judge agreed that it was an "admittedly unusual occurrence" to have more than half of the keypunch department call in sick on the same day. Charge Card, as an employer, "has the right to demand tht its employees be honest and truthful in every facet of their employment." NLRB v. Mueller Brass Co., 509 F.2d 704, 713 (5th Cir. 1975). The fact that the employees falsely claimed to be sick in the course of engaging in protected activities does not insulate them from suspension for abusing their sick time. This Court cannot excuse lying even if in the context or protected activity. When the false calling in sick is viewed as an improper activity for which the employer may rightly suspend employees, it becomes apparent that substantial evidence supports a conclusion that lying was the dominant motive for the suspension. N.L.R.B. v. Howell Automatic Ma- chine Co., 454 F.2d 1077, 1083 (6th Cir. 1972) (court need not accept inference colored by improper view of rights and duties of parties). Had the employees truthfully announced that they were withholding their services for one day in protest of the work conditions, the suspensions would have clearly been improper. As it was, the employees called in sick. In light of the unusally high absenteeism that day, it was not unreasonable for the employer to demand that the employees support their assertion of illness. This is true even if Charge Card suspected that the employees were in fact protesting work conditions. Just as employees cannot express dissatisfaction with work conditions by physically abusing their supervisors, employees cannot express their dissatisfaction with work conditions by lying.

Because the employer did not improperly place the employees on probation, the subsequent acts, including the suspension of Sandra J. Clark, were also not in violation of the Act.

Enforcement is granted with respect to paragraphs 1(a)-(c) and 1(e) of the NLRB order and denied with respect to the remainder of the order. Paragraph 2(g) is enforced to the extent consistent with the enforcement granted herein.

NLRB v. Klingler Electric Corporation, Klingler Electronics Division and Klingler Manufacturing Division

656 F.2d 76 (5th Cir.), July 7, 1981—245 NLRB 1247

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before SKELTON,* Senior Judge, and RUBIN and REAVLEY, Circuit Judges

78

REAVLEY Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB" or "the Board") has applied for enforcement of an order issued against Klingler Electric Corporation ("Klingler") for unfair labor practices in refusing to negotiate with the union certified by the Board to represent Klingler's employees. In response, Klingler alleges that the Board's certification of the union was improper because of certain irregularities in the original election of the union. We grant the Board's request for enforcement.

I. The Background Facts

Klingler operates a plant in Jackson, Mississippi, to produce electronic wiring boards. The production and maintenance employees at this plant were not represented by a union prior to May 1978, when the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, AFL-CIO-CLC ("the Union") filed a representation petition with the LNRB, seeking an election for a bargaining unit made up of these employees.

At the formal representation hearing held on June 15, 1978, Klingler argued that eight "leadperson" employees are actually supervisory staff and, therefore, should be excluded from the bargaining unit because they are not "employees" protected by §§ 8(a) (1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act ("the Act"). 29 U.S.C.

§ 158(a) (1) & (3). Each department of Klingler's plant has one leadperson who exercises a loose and somewhat informal supervision over the ten to twenty employees within the department. The duties of each leadperson vary greatly between the departments and personalities involved, but a leadperson typically receives instructions and design specifications from a Klingler plant supervisor and then assigns employees within his or her department to implement those instructions. At all other times a leadperson usually fills a manufacturing position identical to the other employees within his or her department.

The NLRB's acting regional director issued a decision and direction of election on June 30, 1978, finding that the eight leadpersons were not supervisory employees as defined by § 2(11) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(11), and scheduling the union election for July 28, 1978. Klingler filed a request with the Board for review of the acting regional director's decision. On the day before the election, the NLRB notified Klingler by telegram that "a substntial issue is raised concerning the supervisory status of the eight leadmen." Rather than delay the election, however, the board chose to allow the leadpersons to vote under challenge, which would allow Klingler to exclude the votes if it subsequently prevailed on this issue. The election was held on schedule and resulted in 32 votes in favor of the Union, 15 against, and 9 challenged ballots.

*Senior Judge of the United States Court of Claims, sitting by designation.

Shortly after the election Klingler filed timely objections with the Board, claiming that several factors and incidents had destroyed the validity of the election.[1] The acting regional director conducted an administrative investigation of these objections pursuant to the Board's own rules and regulations. No formal hearing was held, but both parties were given full opportunity to submit evidence. Klingler offered several employees to give affidavits, including two plant supervisors and some of the disputed leadpersons. The acting regional director allowed counsel for Klingler to attend the taking of the affidavits from the plant supervisors, but not from the other employees. The acting regional director then took several other affidavits either at the request of the Union or on his own initiative.

On September 26, 1978, the acting regional director issued a supplemental decision and certification of the Union, overruling all of Klingler's objections to the election. It bears emphasis that this administrative investigation of Klingler's post-election objections and challenges sought only to determine whether Klingler had raised factual issues that justified a hearing on those challenges. Klingler had the burden of raising specific factual issues that, if proven, could invalidate the election, but all credibility questions were to be resolved in favor of Klingler in deciding whether a hearing was called for. NLRB v. Singleton Packing Corp., 418 F.2d 275, 280 (5th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 824, 91 S.Ct. 47, 27 L.Ed.2d 53 (1970). The acting regional director concluded that it was not. Klingler asked the NLRB to review this supplemental decision, and the Board granted that request in relation to the supervisory status of the leadpersons and their conduct during the election. The Board instructed the acting regional director to investigate all aspects of this objection, accept new evidence from the parties, and issue a second supplemental decision setting forth the new evidence and transferring the case back to the Board for decision.

The acting regional director conducted this second investigation on January 3 and 4, 1979, taking additional affidavits on the same terms as the earlier investigation. On January 25, 1979, he issued a second supplemental decision based on this investigation. The decision reviewed the relevant evidence, concluded that the leadpersons were not supervisory employees, and recommended that Klingler's objections be entirely overruled. The Board reviewed the record forwarded by the acting regional director and issued its own decision on May 80 31, 1979. The decision adopted the findings and recommendations of the acting regional director and certified the Union as the exclusive representative of Klingler employees in the unit.

In order to force a review of the Board's decision by this court, Klingler still refused to negotiate with the Union. Accordingly, the Union filed an unfair labor practices charge with the NLRB and the general counsel of the NLRB moved for summary judgment. Klingler responded to the motions by admitting the refusal to bargain and asserting as an affirmative defense its earlier objections to the election.[2] The Board found that all of these issues had been litigated in the previous representation proceedings and, therefore, ordered Klingler to bargain with the Union. It is our responsibility to decide whether to grant enforcement to the Board's order under § 10(e) of the Act. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e).[3]

II. The Record Before the Board and Upon Judicial Review

During the course of his administrative investigation, the acting regional director took certain affidavits from Klingler employees and then quoted from and relied upon portions of these affidavits in his decision and recommendations. But, pursuant to the Board's interpretation of one of its own regulations, he did not include these affidavits in the record that he transmitted to the Board. The Board thus adopted findings and recommendations without access to the complete documents upon which those findings and recommendations were, to some extent, predicated. Nor did Klingler have access to several to these affidavits[4] in framing its briefs to the Board and to this court, even though the acting regional director used them as part of the evidentiary basis for his decision. Klingler secured an order from this court that the affidavits be forwarded to us under seal, subject to the Board's legal claim that they should not be considered part of the record in this proceeding. Therefore, we must first address the procedural question whether these affidavits should be considered part of the record.

[1] See section III, below.

[2] Representation proceedings are not subject to direct review by this court, and Klingler was following the appropriate procedure. See NLRB v. Osborn Transportation, Inc., 589 F.2d 1275, 1278 n.4 (5th Cir. 1979), and cases cited therein.

[3] The statute reads, in pertinent part, as follows:

> The Board shall have power to petition any court of appeals of the United States, * * * within any circuit * * * wherein the unfair labor practice in question occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for the enforcement of such order and for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order, and shall file in the court the record in the proceedings, as provided in section 2112 of Title 28.

29 U.S.C. § 160(e).

The Board attempts to justify the exclusion of the affidavits by arguing that post-election objection procedures are purely a creation of their own regulations, because the Act makes no provision for such a proceeding. Consequently, the Board has established a regulation defining the contents of the record in post-election objection and challenge proceedings. 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(g). The pertinent sections of that regulation provide as follows:

> The notice of hearing, motions, rulings, orders, stenographic report of the hearing, stipulations, exceptions, documentary evidence, together with the objections to the conduct of the election or conduct affecting the results of the election, * * * any briefs or other legal memoranda submitted by the parties, the decision of the regional director, if any, and the record previously made [in the pre-election unit determination proceedings] shall constitute the record in the case. Materials other than those set out above shall not be part of the record; except that in a proceeding in which no hearing is held, a party filing exceptions to a regional director's report on objections or challenges, a request for review of a regional director's decision on objections or challenges, or any opposition thereto, may > append to its submission to the Board copies of documents it has timely submitted to the regional director and which were not included in the report or decision.
> 81

The Board interprets this regulation to be in two distinct sections: the first sentence specifying the contents of the record in a case with a formal hearing and the second sentence doing the same for all cases without hearings. Thus the Board argues that any affidavits that Klingler wanted to be seen by the Board should have been appended to its briefs to the Board and that, otherwise, they are not part of the record. We note in passing that that is not an adequate answer to the problem before us. The acting regional director relied upon some affidavits that Klingler has never seen, even from witnesses brought forward by Klingler. The only way that the relevant portions of these affidavits could get into the record is for the regional director to place them there, but the Board argues that § 102.69(g) prohibits him from doing so.

Previous versions of this regulation and the closely-related § 102.68 specified that "any briefs or other documents submitted by the parties" to the regional director should be part of the record (emphasis added). Based on that earlier language, this court once held that employee affidavits submitted by the parties must be sent to the Board as "other documents" within the meaning of § 102.68. Southwestern Portland Cement Co. v. NLRB, 407 F.2d 131, 134–35 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 820 90 S.Ct. 59, 24 L.Ed.2d 71 (1969).[5] But the NLRB subsequently amended both regulations to read "any briefs or other legal memoranda * * *" (emphasis added). 29 C.F.R. §§ 102.68 & 102.69(g) (1977). Since those amendments effectively overruled Portland Cement, this court has on at least three occasions declined to decide whether employee affidavits submitted by the parties were "documentary evidence" required by § 102.69(g) to be included in the record. Birmingham Ornamental Iron Co. v. NLRB, 615 F.2d 661, 665–67 (5th Cir. 1980) (declining to reach the question because the employer's factual allegations were insufficiently specific to require a hearing in any event); NLRB v. Dobbs House, Inc., 613 F.2d 1254, 1260–61 (5th Cir. 1980) (declining to reach the question because the employer had full access to all of the affidavits excluded from the record, and any error was therefore harmless); NLRB v. Osborn Transportation, Inc., 589 F.2d 1275, 1281–82 (5th Cir. 1979) (declining to reach the question for the same reason offered in Dobbs House, 613 F.2d at 1260–61). In the case now before us, Klingler has made specific factual allegations and has never had access to 15 affidavits taken by the acting regional director, at least four of which were specifically citied in his decision. We will therefore decide the issue that we have reserved on these previous occasions.

[4] Some of Klingler's employees voluntarily submitted copies of their affidavits to their employer.

[5] Portland Cement cited § 102.68 as the relevant regulation. That appears to have been in error, because § 102.68 specifies the contents of the record in preelection unit determination hearings. The proceeding at issue in Portland Cement and in this case is is a post-election objection and challenge decided without a hearing, which is governed by 102.69(g). The two sections are quite similar, however.

It is well established that a regional director may, in the course of an administrative investigation, take confidential employee affidavits and withhold them from the parties. See NLRB v. Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. 214, 236–43, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2324–27, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978); NLRB v. Golden Age Beverage Co., 415 F.2d 26, 34–35 (5th Cir. 1969). If the acting regional director does nothing more than accumulate these affidavits for his own investigatory files, we would have no objection to his maintaining their confidentiality. In a post-election objection and challenge proceeding such as this, the objecting party has the burden of raising specific objections, backed by specific offers of proof, indicating that unlawful acts invalidated the election. Thus the acting regional director could have made a decision and recommendation based solely upon evidence known to and offered by Klingler. If that had been the case, it 82 would have been entirely appropriate for him to retain the affidavits he did not use within his investigatory files and decline to reveal them to Kingler or incomporate them in the record forwarded to the Board and to this court.

But that was not the case here: the acting regional director selected portions of the employee affidavits and cited them as the primary and almost exclusive evidentiary basis of his decisions, without revealing any of them to Klingler or incorporating any of them in the record. Certain of these affidavits were from witnesses offered by Klingler, and certain others were taken at the initiative of the acting regional director or at the request of the Union. A few of Klingler's own witnesses voluntarily gave Klingler copies of their affidavits, but Klingler has never seen at least four affidavits specifically cited by the acting regional director. Furthermore, the Board itself has never had access to eight other affidavits of Klingler employees cited by the regional director's decision, nor would we have such access in reviewing the Board's decision, were we to accept the Board's contentions.[6]

It bears emphasis that these affidavits make up almost the entire body of evidence that underlies the regional director's decisions. The only other substantive evidence is the transcript of the pre-election unit determination hearing held on June 15, 1978. This hearing was concerned with the supervisory status of the leadperson and, of course, had nothing to do with the subsequent election conduct that served as the basis for all ten of Klingler's substantive challenges to the election. The Board's interpretation of § 102.69(g) would thus ask us to review an agency action on the basis of a "record" that is devoid of any evidence on the most material issues.

The Board seeks to justify the confidentiality of all of these affidavits by arguing that employees will not be candid during the administrative investigation if their affidavits might be revealed to the employer or the union by being incorporated in the record. But if the affidavits are used as an evidentiary basis for the regional director's decision, the contents so used are no longer confidential anyway: they appear in the decision itself. The regional director could, before incorporating the affidavits in the record, simply screen out the affiant's name and other portions of the affidavit that bear no relevance to the testimony used in his decision. The Board's own regulations require a similar procedure if the affiant is called as a witness at a subsequent hearing. 29 C.F.R. § 102.118(b)(1) & (2)[7] We thus

[6] Admittedly, these eight affidavits would have been included in the record if Klingler had attacked them to its submission to the Board under the exception contained in § 102.69(g). That possibility does not relieve the Board of its responsibility to consider the evidence used by the regional director, or this court of its responsibility to consider all the evidence that underlies an agency action.

[7] The regulation reads as follows:

(1) Notwithstanding the prohibitions of paragraph (a) of this section, [prohibiting release of investigatory documents] after a witness called by the general counsel or by the charging party has testified in a hearing upon a complaint under section 10(c) of the act, the trial examiner shall, upon motion of the respondent, order the production of any statement (as hereinafter defined) of such witness in the possession of the general counsel which relates to the subject matter as to which the witness has testified. If the entire contents of any such statement relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the administrative law judge shall order it to be delivered directly to the respondent for his examination and use for the purpose of cross-examination.

have difficulty identifying any substantial interest in the "confidentiality" of statements that are actually used in the regional director's decision and recommendations.

The only evidence that is actually needed for the regional director's decision is that which is known to and offered by the party seeking to overturn the election. In this challenge procedure, the objecting party bears the entire burden of adducing prima facie proof of facts sufficient to invalidate the election. Singleton Packing, 418 F.2d at 280. Thus the regional director could reach a decision based only on evidence offered by the objecting party. If there is any credibility issue on a point sufficient to invalidate the election, a hearing is required. NLRB v. Claxton Manufacturing Co., Inc., 613 F.2d 1364, 1366–67 (5th Cir. 1980). The regional director may, therefore reach a decision without endangering any of his own confidential investigations because they are, quite simply, not essential for the limited decision before him.

Having thus disposed of any argument based on a policy of administrative confidentiality, we will examine the Board's own regulation to see what it requires. In its briefs and oral argument, the Board argues that the first sentence of § 102.69(g) is intended to refer only to cases involving a formal hearing, because it lists many items that exist only in relation to a hearing. Consequently, the record in an administrative investigation without a hearing, such as this case, would be defined only in the second sentence.

The Board's argument is groundless because the second sentence simply does not specify what the contents of the record should be in a non-hearing case. It only creates an exceptional means by which a party may place before the Board documents submitted to the regional director but excluded from the record by him. The irrationality of the Board's argument is shown by its own failure to follow that interpretation: the transcript of the preelection unit determination proceeding was forwarded to us as part of the record, even though this is a non-hearing case and such a transcript is designated as part of the record only in the first sentence of the regulation.

We interpret the first sentence of § 102.69(g) to define the record in all proceedings, whether or not a hearing is required. It is immaterial that the sentence includes some items that will not apply to a non-hearing case. That is also true under the Board's interpretation: for instance, there may not be any "stipulations" or "exceptions" even in a case with a hearing. We also hold that any reasonable interpretation of "documentary evidence" includes all portions of affidavits or other documents that are relevant to the evidentiary basis of the regional director's decision and recommendation.[8] The Sixth Circuit has given this same interpretation to the regulation.

(2) If the general counsel claims that any statement ordered to be produced under this section contains matter which does not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the administrative law judge shall order the general counsel to deliver such statement for the inspection of the administrative law judger in camera. Upon such delivery the administrative law judge shall excise the portions of such statement which do not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness except that he may, in his discretion, decline to excise portions which although not relating to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, do relate to other matters raised by the pleadings. With such material excised the administrative law judge shall then direct delivery of such statement to the respondent for his use on cross-examination. If, pursuant to such procedure, any portion of such statement is withheld from the respondent and the respondent objects to such withholdings, the entire text of such statement shall be preserved by the general counsel, and, in the event the respondent files exceptions with the Board based upon such withholding, shall be made available to the Board for the purpose of determining the correctness of the ruling of the administrative law judge.

Each affiant is advised of this limitation upon the confidentiality of his affidavit before giving his statement. NLRB Case Handling Manual Part I, Sec. 10058.4.

This regulation causes us some doubts as to how effective assurances of confidentiality can be in encouraging candid employee affidavits. Although the vast majority of proceedings before the Board are resolved without a hearing, See Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. at 241 n.20, 98 S.Ct. at 2326 n.20, 57 L.Ed.2d 159, we-credit witnesses with the intelligence to realize that the more damaging their testimony against the employer, the more likely that a hearing will take place and that they will be called as a witness. Thus the greater the need for confidentiality in the taking of employee affidavits, the less likely the chance that the confidentiality will be observed under the Board's own regulations. The Board's interest in confidentiality seems even more tenuous in light of these regulations.

[8] We are aware that allowing the regional director to screen out portions of the affidavits that he considers irrelevant to his finding and recommendations confers virtually unrestrained discretion upon him. This discretion is considerably greater than that allowed by the Board's own regulations in a similar situation. See note 7 above. That Board may choose to establish some similar guidelines for regional directors in this kind of proceeding, but we will not assume that regional directors will abuse their discretion to screen out irrelevant sections of such affidavits. We will address that problem only if it arises.

NLRB v. North Electric Co., 644 F.2d 580 (6th Cir. 1981).[9] We also agree with the Sixth Circuit that to exclude such documents from the record would raise serious due process problems. Id. at 583. See also NLRB v. Curtis Noll Corp., 634 F.2d 1027 (6th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Cambridge Wire Cloth Co., 622 F.2d 1195, 1197–99 (4th Cir. 1980); Prestolite Wire Div. v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 302, 304–06 (6th Cir. 1979). We need not pursue that constitutional question at this time, however, because we interpret the Board's regulation in a way that does not offend the requirements of due process.

Furthermore, regardless of the Board's own procedures, 28 U.S.C. § 2112(b) requires that affidavits used as the evidentiary basis of decisions of the regional director and the Board must be part of the record available to this court in its review of those decisions.[10] Of course, this statute does not impose requirements upon the internal procedures of the Board, but administrative efficiency is certainly served if the Board has before it the same record that we will require for appellate review of the Board's decision.

If these affidavits were not available to us, or if they offered the slightest basis for a different action by the Board, we would, of course, be required to remand this case to the Board for completion of the record and reconsideration of the case. Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Corp. v. NRDC, 435 U.S. 519, 544–45, 98 S.Ct. 1197, 1212, 55 L.Ed.2d 460 (1978). But as we noted above, the affidavits accumulated by the acting regional director were forwarded to this court under seal. Having found that they must be considered part of the record relied upon by the acting regional director, we have examined the affidavits carefully.[11] We find that none of them contain any information that would add weight to Klingler's case or stand the slightest chance of affecting the Board's action. All of the relevant information they contain was fully and accurately stated in the two decisions of the acting regional director. Under these circumstances, it would be an exercise in futility and pointless delay to remand this case for "supplementation" of the record or "reconsideration" by the Board. The affidavits do not add relevant information, but merely allow us to verify that the acting regional director actually had, and accurately quoted, the evidence that he cited. We may, therefore, proceed to consider the substantive findings that he made and that the Board subsequently adopted.

[9] We note that Reichart Furniture Co. v. NLRB, 649 F.2d 397 (6th Cir. 1981), a recent decision of another panel of the Sixth Circuit, indicates some retreat from the broader language of North Electric and Prestolite Wire Div. v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 302, 304–06 (6th Cir. 1979). The concurring opinion in Reichart Furniture makes explicit something that the majority opinion only implies: that this panel limits the interpretation of § 102.69(g) established in North Electric Company (requiring the regional director to include in the record all affidavits used in his decision) to those cases in which the employer has made allegations justifying a hearing.

We decline to so limit our interpretation of the Board's regulation. Both our holding and the Sixth Circuit's opinion in North Electric Company are based upon an interpretation of the specific language contained in § 102.69(g). But the panel opinion in Reichart Furniture makes no attempt to derive its limitations from the same regulation, nor can we imagine any basis for doing so. In fact the Reichart Furniture opinion makes no attempt to justify its limitation at all. We believe that the need of a party or a court to see the documentary evidence that has been used as the basis of an agency action is at least as great when the regional director decides that a hearing is not justified.

[10] The pertinent part of the statute reads as follows:

> The record to be filed in the court of appeals in such a proceeding [to review or enforce orders of administrative agencies] shall consist of the order sought to be reviewed or enforced, the findings or report upon which it is based, and the pleadings, evidence, and proceedings before the agency, board, commission, or officer concerned, or such portions thereof (1) as the rules prescribed under the authority of section 2072 of this title may require to be included therein, or (2) as the agency, board, commission, or officer concerned, the petitioner for review or respondent in enforcement, as the case may be, and any intervenor in the court proceeding by written stipulation filed with the agency, board, commission, or officer concerned or in the court in any such proceeding may consistently with the rules prescribed under the authority of section 2072 of this title designate to be included therein, or (3) as the court upon motion of a party or, after a prehearing conference, upon its own motion may by order in any such proceeding designate to be included therein. Such a stipulation or order may provide in an appropriate case that no record need be filed in the court of appeals. If, however, the correctness of a finding of fact by the agency, board, commission, or officer is in question all of the evidence before the agency, board, commission, or officer shall be included in the record except such as the agency, board, commission, or officer concerned, the petitioner for review or respondent in enforcement, as the case may be, and any intervenor in the court proceeding by written stipulation filed with the agency, board, commission, or officer concerned or in the court agree to omit as wholly immaterial to the questioned finding. If there is omitted from the record any portion of the proceedings before the agency, board, commission, or officer which the court subsequently determines to be proper for it to consider to enable it to review or enforce the order in question the court may direct that such additional portion of the proceedings be filed as a supplement to the record.

28 U.S.C. § 2112(b).

[11] Theoretically, of course, we should look only at the affidavits actually used by the acting regional director. We would have no way of knowing that with certainty, however, and a remand would be necessary. But the distinction between the affidavits he used and those he did not use is meaningless in this case because all of the affidavits are innocuous and are valuable to the record only as confirmation of what the acting regional director has already cited in his decision.

So that Klingler may satisfy itself that the actual affidavits do not enhance its case, we have issued an order that the Board release to Klingler all relevant portions of affidavits used as evidence in this proceeding and not previously made available to Klingler by its employees. We have extended the tie for filing of a motion for rehearing so that Klingler may bring to our attention any new information that would justify a different result in this case.

III. The Election Violations Alleged by Klingler and the Standard of Judicial Review

Our enforcement of the Board's order requiring Klingler to bargain with the Union is dependent upon the validity of the Board's earlier decision certifying the Union after the election of June 30, 1978. Osborn Transportation, 589 F.2d at 1278 n.4; Golden Age Beverage, 415 F.2d at 28.

Klingler raises three factors as a basis for invalidating the election and, therefore, for denying enforcement to the Board's order:

1) that the lead persons were supervisory employees whose participation in the election on behalf of the Union tainted the election process;

2) that certain actions of the Board's representative in conducting the election influenced the election results; and

3) that Union payments to employees who had given up a day's work in order to testify on behalf of the Union at the pre-election representation hearing exerted improper influence on employee votes.

Our standard of review is based upon the recognition that Congress has entrusted broad discretion to the Board to conduct and supervise employee election. The specialized functions of the Board, such as classification of employees and the identification of an unacceptable degree of interference with free choice in union elections, require a quality and degree of expertise uniquely within the domain of the Board. If the Board's decision is reasonable and based on substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole, our inquiry is at an end. Claxton Manufacturing, 613 F.2d at 1365–66; Dobbs House, 613 F.2d at 1256; Osborn Transportion, 589 F.2d at 1279–80.

In order to gain the right to a new election, Klingler has the entire burden of 1) offering "specific evidence of specific events from or about specific people," and 2) showing that these objectionable activities, "when considered as a whole, either tended to or did influence the outcome of the election." Claxton Manufacturing, 613 F.2d at 1366. The latter showing is especially difficult where, as in Klingler's election, the union won by a wide margin. NLRB v. Sumter Plywood Corp., 535 F.2d 917, 924 (5th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1092, 97 S.Ct. 1105, 51 L.Ed.2d 538 (1977).

But Klingler must first pass the hurdle of earning a hearing on these issues. If the Board assumes the truth of all the specific allegations raised by Klingler, but still finds these facts inadequate to influence the outcome of the election, no hearing is required. Singleton Packing, 418 F.2d at 280. Conversely, if the facts alleged are adequate for that purpose, factual questions may not be resolved against the employer without a hearing. Claxton Manufacturing, 613 F.2d at 1366–67.

IV. Klingler's Objections

A. Participation of Leadpersons

If Klingler's leadpersons are supervisory staff, they should not have been included in the bargaining unit and, under certain conditions, their advocacy of the union might invalidate the election. The Board's decision held, first, that the leadpersons are not supervisory personel and, second, that even if they were supervisors, their participation could not have affected the outcome of the election, based on the few allegations of objectionable conduct raised by Klingler. If the Board's second conclusion is adequately supported, we need not deal with the first. We will, therefore, assume that the leadpersons are supervisors for the purposes of this discussion.

First, we note that the Union won by a margin of 32 to 15 even when the 9 votes of the leadpersons were excluded. The validity of the election is thus not undermined merely by the votes of the leadpersons, and Klingler bears a heavy task in identifying specific conduct of the leadpersons that would tend to influence enough other votes to affect that outcome. In attempting to meet that burden, Klingler first alleges that the leadpersons were active in the organization and election campaigns. But pro-union activities by supervisors are merely an expression of personal preference and are not enought, by themselves, to invalidate an election. NLRB v. Alamo Express, Inc., 430 F.2d 1032, 1035 (5th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 400 U.S.

1021, 91 S.Ct. 584, 27 L.Ed.2d 633 (1971). Klingler must show that the activities > created an environment of tension or coercion such as to preclude employees from exercising a free choice. For conduct to warrant setting aside an election, not only must that conduct be coercive, but it must be so related to the election as to have had a probable effect upon the employee's actions at the polls.

Singleton Packing, 418 F.2d at 281 (quoting NLRB v. Zelrich Co., 344 F.2d 1011, 1015, (5th Cir. 1965)).

The only evidence that Klingler offered of actual coercive conduct by the leadpersons was that two leadpersons made isolated and relatively mild threats of economic reprisals against fellow employees who did not support the union. The first of these statements was merely a misrepresentation that the union would not represent all employees equally in the distribution of benefits after the election, but would favor those who had supported the union.[12] The employee to whom the statement was made asked the union organizer privately about the statement and he publicly corrected the misinformation at an employee meeting immediately thereafter. Klinger offered no indication how this incident could have influenced other employees. The second incident was merely the comment, "she'll be the grease monkey" directed at an anti-union employer by a leadperson standing with several other employees. Nothing further was made of the remark, and it was never even connected directly to the election issue. Clearly, these two incidents standing by themselves are not sufficient to indicate that there was "an atmosphere of tension or coercion such as to preclude employees from exercising a free choice," Singleton Packing, 418 F.2d at 281, and the acting regional director was justified in finding that they would not warrant setting the election aside.[13]

Klingler also claims that the leadpersons signed and solicited union authorization cards, thereby tainting the showing of employee interest that the Board requires prior to directing an election. 29 C.F.R. §§ 101.17 & 101.18. But the second supplemental decision specifically found that the union's showing of interest was sufficient to warrant processing of the petition even if all of the cards signed and solicited by the leadpersons were excluded. Because Klingler does not dispute that finding, the point of error fails.

Klingler does not offer any other evidence that the participation of the leadpersons in the election, even if they are supervisors, tended to influence the outcome of the election. The acting regional director therefore properly overruled the objection.

B. Conduct of the Election

Klingler makes several weak allegations that certain aspects of the conduct of the election prejudiced the results. First, Klingler aruges that the Board should have stayed the election pending resolution of the leadperson supervisory issue, rather than allow the leadpersons to vote under challenge. Klingler raises no specific facts to support this point of error, other than a vague implication that some leadpersons might have been recruited to campaign on behalf of the company if they had been labeled as supervisors prior to the election. But Klingler does not identify any specific leadperson willing to so campaign or offer any evidence that such an effort could have affected the outcome of the election. This allegation is insufficiently specific to require a hearing. Birmingham Ornamental Iron, 615 F.2d at 666–67.

The second point of error based on the conduct of the election is that the Board's agent acted so as to allow a bitter but brief confrontation between a pro-union employee and one of Klingler's observers. When one of the leadpersons approached the ballot box, the company's observer noted to the Board's observer that the company wished to challenge her vote. The lead-person reacted by calling the observer "a bitch." When the Board's representative intervened and asked the leadperson's employment position, she replied that she was "just a general flunkie," that all the employees were "just general flunkies." Even if the conduct of the Board agent did precipitate the incident, which we doubt, it was neither explosive nor likely to influence a significant number of votes. One of the participants acknowledged that the issues between the two employees were essentially pesonal, and the remarks did not have a substantial connection to the election issue. Klingler offered absolutely no evidence of the incident's effect on the election, and the Board was therefore justified in concluding that the allegation was not sufficient to invalidate the election.

[12] This leadperson also participated in a second similar incident prior to the filing of the representation petition. We do not consider that incident because the Board has decided, and this court has affirmed, that any misconduct occurring before the filing of the petition should be considered too remote in time to influence the subsequent election. Golden Age Beverage, 415 F.2d at 31.

[13] Klingler also alleged a third incident of a threat of economic reprisal by a rank-and-file employee. That employee threatened a coworker with the loss of a ride to work if she did not vote for the union. The coworker reported the remark to her employer and she never heard anything more of the threat. This threat was made to a single employee on a single occasion. Even when all three of these incidents are lumped together, they clearly do not amount to an atmosphere of coercion.

Klingler also alleged that this confrontation amounted to a violation of the rule established by the Board in Milchem, Inc., 170 NLRB 362 (1968). In Milchem, the Board prohibited "prolonged conversations between representatives from any party to the election and voters waiting to cast ballots," because "the final minutes before an employee casts his vote should be his own, as free from interference as possible." 170 NLRB at 362. The acting regional director dispensed with this objection solely on the basis that there was no evidence that the leadperson was acting as an agent or representative of the Union.[14] In addition, we note that the comments were not "prolonged," or even a "conversation." The Board clearly had substantial evidence to conclude that the Milchem rule had not been violated.

The third point of error is that the Board's agent departed from the schedule of the election by opening the election 17 minutes late and closing it 15 minutes late. But only two employees out of the 58 eligible employees failed to vote, and Klingler does not offer the slightest indication how this minor departure from the election schedule could have influenced the election. Without such evidence, the Board was justified in overruling Klingler's objection.

C. Union Payments to Employees

The Union asked certain Klingler employees to appear and testify at the pre-election representation hearing in June 1978. The Union then reimbursed at least three of these employees for a day's wages by presenting checks to them at a general employee meeting with the comment by the union representative that he "had a little something or those people who had been at the hearing." Klingler maintains that these payments were excessive because it also paid the employees for those days. The acting regional director rejected that argument in his first supplemental opinion because Klingler had offered no evidence that it had paid the employees or that the payments were "used to improperly unfluence" employees. Subsequent to that opinion, Klingler did offer, in its appeal to the Board, payroll records showing that it had paid the employees for the days in question.

Assuming that these versions of the incident are correct, we agree that the coy remark that accompanied the Union's checks indicates something less than the most straightforward intent on the part of the Union representative. The checks certainly could have been distributed in a manner less likely to create a false impression of union largesse. But this court has held that "[i]n determining whether an election should be invalidated, the focus should be on the effects of a particular act on the electorate rather than on the actor's intent." NLRB v. Gulf States Canners, Inc., 585 F.2d 757, 759 (5th Cir. 1978); Plastic Masters, Inc., v. NLRB, 512 F.2d 449, 450–51 (6th Cir. 1975). The acting regional director primarily looked to the Union's intent, which is never a controlling factor. But he also noted that Klingler had presented no evidence of "objectionable effect," which is the proper focus of the inquiry. Of course, proof of subjective effect upon the minds of the employees is quite difficult to show without a hearing. For that reason, we have held that the employer may justify the need for a hearing by showing that the payments had a "tendency to influence the outcome of the election" when viewed in light of all the relevant facts, a somewhat more lenient standard than the evidence of "objectionable effect" that the acting regional director apparently required in this case. Gulf States Canners, 585 F.2d at 759. If this election had been a close one, Klingler might have introduced evidence sufficient to meet the more lenient standard. When the margin of an election result is narrow, the tendency to influence the outcome may be inferred from little more than the external facts. Id., 585 F.2d at 759. But when the margin is wide, a greater objective impact is required, which "would appear to be more capable of proof

[14] It is clear that, if we were looking at the broader disruptive or prejudicial effect of this incident, it would be immaterial whether the leadperson were acting as a representative of the Union. NLRB v. Carroll Contracting & Ready Mix, 636 F.2d 111, 112–13 (5th Cir. 1981). Klingler essentially raised that broader question in the preceding paragraph. Here, Klingler objects to the incident on the more narrow grounds that it violates a rule established by the Board itself in a specific case Because Klingler has not cited us any NLRB case to indicate that the Board has construed the Milchem rule to require less than literal union representation, we cannot say that it was improper for the acting regional director to base his holding on the absence of that factor alone because of its overwhelming nature." United States Steelworkers of America v. NLRB, 496 F.2d 1342, 1347 n.11 (5th Cir. 1974).

In this case Klingler offered proof of nothing more than the incident itself, and it was simply not egregious enough to influence the outcome of an election decided by such a large margin, at least without more of a showing by Klingler of harmful effect. The acting regional director was, therefore, justified in overruling this objection.

V. Conclusion

The Board seeks to provide "laboratory conditions" for a free election, General Shoe Corp., 77 NLRB 124 (1948), but even laboratories are not perfect environments. When the issue is union representation, feelings run strong and deep, and some departures from a perfectly neutral environment must be expected. Consequently, the need for a post-election hearing or a new election is judged not against a standard of perfection, but against the likelihood that the outcome of the election might have been affected. This election was not perfect, but it was decided by a relatively large margin, and the Board concluded that none of the facts alleged by Klingler were egregious enough to bring into question the integrity of that result. We find that the Board had a substantial basis to reach that conclusion.

The request of the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of its order is GRANTED.

Miami Springs Properties, Inc., and James H. Kinley and Associates v. NLRB

653 F.2d 276 (6th Cir.), July 8, 1981—245 NLRB 278

On petition to set aside Board Order

Before JONES Circuit Judge, PECK, Senior Circuit Judge, and Horton, District Judge*

276

Miami Springs Properties, Inc. petitions this Court to set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board and the Board has cross-petitioned for enforcement of its order. The Board found that the company violated section 8(a)(1) of the Act by laying off and refusing to reinstate 18 employees after the employees engaged in protected concerted activity by walking off the job. The Board also found that the company violated section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging and refusing to reinstate five employees because of their protected concerted activity. Finally, the Board found the company violated section 8(a)(1) of the Act because it threatened to close down to discourage union support, threatened employees with layoffs, promised employees they would be rehired if they withdrew support for the union, and promised other economic benefits if the employees withdrew their support for the union.

Miami Springs contends that there was not substantial evidence to support the Board's order. The Board's asserts that the lay-offs were unfair labor practices and were not cause by the company's troubled financial conditions. It relies on the fact that the lay-offs were not announced and that they took place immediately after the employees stopped work. The Board also relies on evidence of antiunion comments made by the president of the company, and disputes the company's characterization of its finances at the time of the lay-offs. This evidence is ample to support the Board's order.

There is no merit to the company's contention that the administrative law judge was biased against the company. The ALJ made careful assessments of all the facts and testimony and his conclusions are well supported by the record.

The petition of Miami Springs Properties, Inc. to set aside the Board's order is dismissed and the order of the National Labor Relations Board is ordered ENFORCED.

Presbyterian/St. Luke's Medical Center v. NLRB

653 F.2d 450 (10th Cir.), July 8, 1981

On petition to review and cross petition to enforce Board Order

Before BARRETT and LOGAN, Circuit Judges, and O'CONNOR, District Judge*

BARRETT, Circuit Judge. Presbyterian/St. Luke's Medical Center seeks review of an unreported order of the National Labor Relations Board requiring it to bargain with the St. Luke's Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals AFT, CFT, AFL–CIO. The Board cross-petitions for enforcement of the order.

Presbyterian/St. Luke's Medical Center is a three hospital system located in Denver, Colorado. The Center grew out of a July, 1979, merger between St. Luke's Hospital Association and the Presbyterian Medical Center. Prior to the merger, St. Luke's Hospital Association operated a single facility—St. Luke's hospital. The Presbyterian Medical Center operated two institutions—one hospital located ten blocks from the St. Luke's facility, and a second acute-care institution twelve miles away in Aurora, Colorado. See The Presbyterian Medical Center, 218 N.L.R.B. No. 192 (1975).

In October, 1979, the Union filed with the Board a petition for certification as the bargaining representative of the registered nurses employed at the St. Luke's facility of the Medical Center. The Medical Center contested the petition challenging the appropriateness of the bargaining unit. The unit is limited to registered nurses at the St. Luke facility only, rather than all professionals, other than physicians, at all three hospitals. The Medical Center's position was tied to Congress' directive that the Board avoid unnecessary proliferation of bargaining units in non-profit health care facilities.

Following five days of hearings, the Board's regional director found that a separate unit of registered nurses at the St. Luke's facility was appropriate for collective bargaining purposes. The Medical Center's request for Board review was denied in January, 1980. Thereafter, a majority of the employees in the unit selected the Union as their representative. On January 24, 1980, the Board certified the Union as the exclusive collective bargaining representative for all registered nurses at St. Luke's Hospital.[1]

When the Medical Center subsequently refused to bargain with the Union, unfair labor practice charges were filed. Violations of § 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158(a)(1), (5), were alleged. In answer to the charges, the Medical Center admitted the refusal to bargain, defending instead on the inappropriateness of the unit. The Board overruled the Medical Center objections and ordered the Medical Center to bargain with the Union on request, as well as to post notices to that effect.

The sole issue on appeal is whether the Board erred in holding that the Medical Center committed an unfair labor practice by refusing to bargain with the St. Luke's Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals AFT, CFT, AFL–CIO.[2]

The Appropriateness of the Bargaining Unit

For nearly thirty years, non-profit health care institutions were excluded from the operation of the National Labor Relations Act, supra. In 1974, Congress amended the Act extending coverage to large numbers of employees in the industry. See generally, Vernon, Labor Relations in the Health Care Field under the 1974 Amendments to the National Labor Relations Act, 70 NW.U.L. Rev. 202 (1975). The elimination of this exemption "reflected Congress' judgment that hospital care would be improved by extending the protection of the Act to non-profit health care employees." Beth Israel Hospital v.

*Of the United States District Court for the District of Kansas, sitting by designation.

[1] The bargaining unit certified consists of:

INCLUDED: Al full-time and regular part-time registered nurses, including in-service education nurses, cardiovascular specialists, diabetic stroke technicians, hyper-elementation nurse clinician, float pool nurses, certified anesthetists, and all other registered nursing employees at the St., Luke's facility of the employer located at 601 E. 19th Avenue in Denver, Colorado

EXCLUDED: Unit supervisors, assistant unit supervisors, department directors, assistant department directors, patient representatives and other supervisory and managerial employees, and guards as defined in the Act and all other employees of the above facility.

[2] It is settled that "an employer may secure judicial review of a unit determination by simply refusing to bargain with a union after its certification." Osteopathic Hospital Founders Asso. v. NLRB, 618 F.2d 633, 640 (10th Cir. 1980).

One area of concern encompassed by the legislation dealt with disputes over bargaining units. Unable to agree on specific legislation, the House and Senate committees considering the amendment chose to address the problem in their respective reports. Each committee wrote:

With most of it we agree. In one statement, we heartily concur:

> Congress directed the Board to apply a standard in this field that was not traditional. Proliferation of units in industrial settings has not been the subject of congressional attention but fragmentation in the health care field has aroused legislative apprehension.

St. Vincent's Hospital v. N.L.R.B., supra, at p. 592.

A.

Unit Scope

The appropriateness of a bargaining unit depends on both its scope and composition. We here deal with the first consideration—whether the bargaining unit should comprise employees solely at St. Luke's Hospital or at all employer facilities.

The Board has declined to accede to Congress' directive in determining issues of unit scope. In Memorial Medical, 230 N.L.R.B. No. 140 n.5 (1977), the Board held that the legislative history of the 1974 amendments demonstrated that concern with bargaining unit proliferation was solely with the composition of units within particular facilities, not with the question of whether the unit's scope should include one facility or several facilities.

Rather than apply Congress' directive, the Board has presumed single facility units appropriate "where there is no bargaining history in a more comprehensive unit of the degree of functional integration with other facilities is insufficient to negate the separate identity of the facility in which a union seeks representative status." Samaritan Health Services, Inc., 238 N.L.R.B. 56 (1978). The presumption is, of course, rebuttable. Id. Among the factors considered are the geographic proximity of the facilities, history of collective bargaining unionization, extent of employee interchange, functional integration of operations, and centralization of management, particularly in regard to control of personnel and labor relations. See e.g., N.L.R.B. v. Groendyke Transport, Inc., 417 F.2d 33 (10th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 935, 90 S.Ct. 944, 25 L.Ed.2d 116 (1970); Magic Pan, Inc. v. N.L.R.B. 627 F.2d 105 (7th Cir. 1980); N.L.R.B. v. Chicago Health and Tennis Clubs, Inc., 567 F.2d 331 (7th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 437 U.S. 904, 98 S.Ct. 3089, 57 L.Ed.2d 1133 (1978).

Consistent with the Board's views, the regional director applied the presumption here holding that "while a systemwide unit may be appropriate, the evidence does not rebut the presumption." R., Vol. I, p. 4. The Medical Center argues that the application of this presumption is inconsistent with the congressional admonition against undue proliferation of bargaining units in the health care field.

The issue as to what unit is appropriate for bargaining rests in the sound discretion of the Board. Packard Motor Car Co. v. N.L.R.B., 330 U.S. 485, 67 S.Ct. 789, 91 L.Ed.2d 1040 (1947); Newspaper Printing Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 625 F.2d 956 (10th Cir. 1980). Nevertheless, we must insure that the Board's exercise of discretion is not unreasonable, arbitrary, unsupported by the evidence, or in conflict with congressional intent. S.E.C. v. Sloan, 436 U.S. 103, 98 S.Ct. 1702, 56 L.Ed.2d 148 (1978); N.L.R.B. v. Brown, 380 U.S. 278, 85 S.Ct. 980, 13 L.Ed.2d 839 (1965).

Our reading of the legislative history underlying of the 1974 amendments confirms the Board's views that the references "cautioning against undue proliferation in the health care field refer to matters involving unit composition, that is, the types of employees to be represented in a bargaining unit * * * with which any single institution must collectively bargain." Memorial Medical, supra, at n. 5. We do not agree, however, that this concern necessarily demonstrates congressional insensitivity to proliferation problems caused by the mechanical application of the presumption to issues of unit scope. Nor do we believe Congress' silence in this area blindly constituted ratification of the single facility presumption in health care facilities. In our view, it appears more likely that Congress did not anticipate the issue.

The Board is given broad authority to determine the unit appropriate for collective bargaining under section 9(b) of the Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 159(b). Neither the Act nor the legislative history offer conclusive answers to the issue at bar. "But the absence of specific legislative history in no way modified the conventional judicial duty to give faithful meaning to the language Congress adopted in light of the evident legislative purpose in enacting the law in question." United States v. Bornstein, 423 U.S. 303, 310, 96 S.Ct. 523, 528, 46 L.Ed.2d 514 (1976).

It has long been a "familiar rule, that a thing may be within the letter of the statute and yet not within the statute, because not within its spirit, nor within the intention of its makers." Steelworkers v. Weber, 443 U.S. 193, 201, 99 S.Ct. 2721, 2726, 61 L.Ed.2d 480 (1979), quoting Holy Trinity Church v. United States, 143 U.S. 457, 459, 12 S.Ct. 511, 512, 36 L.Ed. 226 (1892). In the construction of labor legislation the principle has "particular application". Woodwork Manufacturers v. N.L.R.B., 386 U.S. 612, 619, 87 S.Ct. 1250, 1255, 18 L.Ed.2d 357 (1967). This is so because legislation such as that involved here is "to a marked degree, the result of conflict and compromise between strong contending forces and deeply held views on the role of organized labor." Local 1976, United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. N.L.R.B., 357 U.S. 93, 99–100, 78 S.Ct. 1011, 1016, 2 L.Ed.2d 1186 (1958); Woodwork Manufacturers v. N.L.R.B., supra.

The legislative history here reveals a strong current of congressional concern for the problems engendered by unwarranted unit fragmentation whether it be in composition or scope. As we view it, the Board's refusal to consider Congress' directive with regard to scope issues has subjected the health care industry to the very dangers Congress sought to prevent.

We hold that the traditional factors used in scope determinations "must be put in balance against the public interest in preventing fragmentation in the health care field." St. Vincent's Hospital v. N.L.R.B., supra, at p. 592. Moreover, the Board must specify "the manner in which its unit determination[s] * * * implement[ ] or reflect[ ] that admonition." N.L.R.B. v. West Suburban Hospital, supra, at p. 216.

We recognize that labor legislation should normally be construed in a liberal manner to effectuate its remedial purposes. However, in our anxiety to aid the congressional purpose of promoting industrial stabilization through collective bargaining, we must guard against extending the scope of the statute beyond Congress's intent. 62 Cases of Jam v. United States, 340 U.S. 593, 600, 71 S.Ct. 515, 520, 95 L.Ed. 566 (1951). The Board has failed to recognize Congress' directive in unit scope determinations.

Unit Composition

We now turn to the question of whether the Board erred in its determination of the unit's composition.

In the representation proceeding, the regional director ruled that (a) a unit restricted to registered nurses is presumptively appropriate, and (b) based on the Board's singularity of interests analysis, the presumption in favor of the registered nurses unit was not overcome by the Medical Center. Inasmuch as the Board erred in accepting the presumption of appropriateness, we must deny enforcement of its order.

The use of rebuttable presumptions is tied to various rationale—judicial economy, regularity and fairness; probability; and public policy. Louisell and Mueller, Federal Evidence § 68, pp. 541-542. Yet, the procedural effects may differ. Most affect only the burden of producing evidence. See e.g., Fed.Rules Evid. rule 301, 28 U.S.C.A. Others affect both the burdens of producing evidence and of persuasion. See e. g. Keyes v. School District No. 1, Denver, Colo., 413 U.S. 189, 93 S.Ct. 2686, 37 L.Ed.2d 548 (1973). In those presumptions falling within the first category, "the presumption disappears upon introduction of evidence sufficient of the presumed fact. [Emphasis supplied]. Louisell and Mueller, supra at § 69, pp. 554-555. See Fed.Rules Evid. Rule 301, 28 U.S.C.A.; Comm. of Conf.Rep.No.93-1597, 93d Cong. 2d Sess., reprinted [1974] U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News pp. 7098, 7099. Rebuttable presumptions falling within the second category "retain their vitality until the trier of fact is persuaded as to the nonexistence of the presumed fact." Louisell and Mueller, supra at § 69, p. 555.

Our review of the record convinces us that the rebuttable presumption applied in this case shifted both the burdens of producing evidence and persuasion. The regional director specifically held that the presumption was not overcome by the Medical Center's evidence.

In our view, there was sufficient evidence adduced to sustain the appropriateness of an all professional unit, excluding physicians. We, of course, focus on the "disparity of interests between employee groups which would prohibit or impede fair representation of employee interests." N.L.R.B. v. St. Francis Hospital of Lynwood, supra, at p. 419. A multidisciplinary team approach to patient care is employed by the Hospital. Interaction between registered nurses and other professionals is encouraged. Decentralization of the pharmacy has occurred with the physical relocation of individual pharmacists to nursing stations at patient care units. Social workers at the facility spend one-half their time in the patient care units. This, of course, results in substantial interaction between these professionals and the staff nurses.

Several nurses at the facility observed that they have little contact with nurses from units other than their own. One postoperative nurse observed that she had more contact with physical therapists than nurses outside her specialty. Other specialty nurses supported this view. Christine Tanner, a noted nurse educator, testified that nurses who specialize often have more in common with persons in disciplines related to their specialities than other registered nurses practicing in other speciality areas.

Certain of the registered nurses work 3:00 p.m.-11:30 p.m. or 11:00 pm.-7:30 a.m. This factor alone, however, is not dispositive. Id. at 419. Similarly, the licensing-education requirements, and departmental segregation are not wholly controlling. Id. at p. 419. "The fact that a state may choose to regulate a particular occupation should not be controlling in the determination of an appropriate bargaining unit." Id. at p. 420.

In sum, the evidence presented was sufficient to sustain a finding of the inappropriateness of the proposed unit had it been accepted. If the presumption had simply shifted the burden of producing evidence to the employer, the offer of this contradictory evidence would have neutralized the presumption.

In unfair labor practice hearings, such as that presented here, the Board, to the extent practicable, must apply the rules of evidence governing proceedings in the district courts of the United States. N.L.R.A. § 10(b); 29 U.S.C.A. § 160(b); N.L.R.B. v. Process & Pollution Control Co., 588 F.2d 786 (10th Cir. 1978). When the Federal Rules of Evidence were adopted, Congress provided that "a presumption imposes on the party against whom it is directed the burden of going forward with evidence to rebut or meet the presumption, but does not shift to such party the burden of proof in the sense of the risk of nonpersuasion, which remains throughout the trial upon the party against whom it was originally cast," Fed.Rules Evid. rule 301, 28 U.S.C.A.

Application of the presumption employed here violated the mandate of Federal Rule of Evidence 301.[3] Such a presumption cannot be used to alter General Counsel's burden to establish by a preponderance of evidence that an unfair labor practice has occurred. See N.L.R.B. v. Dillon Stores, 643 F.2d 687 (10th Cir. 1981); N.L.R.B. v. First Nat. Bank of Pueblo, 623 F.2d 686 (10th Cir. 1980); N.L.R.B. v. Silver Spur Casino, 623 F.2d 571 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied,——U.S.——, 101 S.Ct. 1973, 68 L.Ed.2d 294 (1981). The Board's order was impermissibly tainted by the presumption's application.[4]

We do not rest our decision on this ground alone. In our view, any use of a presumption which casts upon the Medical Center the burden of producing evidence of the inappropriateness of the unit violates Congress' directive of nonproliferation in the health care industry. The legislative history underlying the 1974 amendments expresses concern that egregious unit proliferation such as found in the construction trades, could impede effective health care delivery. We agree with our sister circuits that "the Board must expressly consider the congressional admonition in making unit determinations," Mary Thompson Hospital, Inc., v. N.L.R.B., supra, at 864, and focus on the "disparity of interests between employee groups which would prohibit or inhibit fair representation of employee interests." N.L.R.B. v. St. Francis Hospital of Lynwood, supra, at p.419.

We hold that requiring health care industry employers to bear the burden of producing evidence that limited bargaining units are more inappropriate than broader bargaining units runs contrary to Congress' admonition. Rather, the Board must specify "the manner in which its unit determination in this case implement[s] or reflect[s] that admonition." N.L.R.B. v. West Suburban Hospital, supra, at p. 216.

"The power of an administrative * * * board to administer a federal statute and to prescribe rules and regulations to that end is * * * [only] the power to adopt regulations to carry into effect the will of Congress as expressed by the statute. [An administrative decision] which does not do this, but operates to create a rule out of harmony with the statute, is a mere nullity." United States v. Larionoff, 431 U.S. 864, 873 n. 12, 97 S.Ct 2150, 2156, 53 L.Ed.2d 48 (1977) quoting Manhattan General Equip. Co. v. Commissioner, 297 U.S. 129, 134, 56 S.Ct. 397, 400, 80 L.Ed. 528 (1936).[5]

Conclusion

We must give "due observance [to] the distribution of authority made by Congress as between its power to regulate commerce and the reviewing power which it has conferred upon the courts under Article III of the Constitution." F.C.C. v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 141, 60 S.Ct. 437, 440, 84 L.Ed. 656 (1940). Recognizing this, our function "ends when an error of law is laid bare." F.P.C. v. Idaho Power Co., 344 U.S. 17, 20, 73 S.Ct. 85, 87, 97 L.Ed. 15 (1952). At that point, our only recourse is to remand to the Board for reconsideration in light of our holding.

"Application of that general principle in this case best respects the congressional scheme investing the Board and not the courts with broad powers to fashion remedies that will effectuate national labor policy." N.L.R.B. v. Food Store Employees, 417 U.S. 1, 10, 94 S.Ct. 2074, 2080, 40 L.Ed.2d 612 (1974). See also, South Prairie Construction Co. v Local 627, Intern, Union of Operating Engineers, 425 U.S. 800, 96 S.Ct. 1842, 48 L.Ed.2d 382 (1976) (per curiam). "For purposes of affirming no less than reversing its orders, an appellate court cannot intrude upon the domain which Congress has exclusively entrusted to an administrative agency." Securities

[4] The decision and order of the Board was entered on stipulating of the parties. This does not, however, change our views. That stipulation, specifically approved by the Board, provides in part:

> It is agreed that this case shall be in the same posture before the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit as it would have been if the standards procedures has been followed, i.e., after a Complaint had issued, the Employer would have filed an answer defending the allegations on the grounds that the bargaining unit is inappropriate, the Union would have moved for summary judgement, the Employer would have responded to the motion again asserting the bargaining unit defense, the National Labor Relations Board would have granted the motion for summary judgement, and the Employer would have then appealed to the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit.

[5] For these same reasons, the Board erred in applying its single facility presumption to the issue of unit scope. See infra.

Comm'n. v. Chenery Corp., 318 U.S. 80, 88, 6b3 S.Ct. 454, 459, 87 L.Ed. 626 (1943).[6]

458

The petition for review is granted. The cross-application for enforcement is denied. The cause is remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so Ordered.

[6] In our case remand is especially justified. Following the decision in this case, the Board reconsidered its prior opinions in the health care industry as regards registered nurse units. See Newton Wellesley Hospital, 250 NLRB No. 86 (1980). See also: National Medical Convalescent of San Diego, 254 NLRB No. 163 (1981); Doctor's Hospital of Montclair, 254 NLRB No. 175 (1981); Federick Memorial Hospital, Inc., 254 NLRB No. 2 (1981); Addison Gilbert Hospital, 253 NLRB No. 141 (1981); Mount Airy Foundation, 253 NLRB No. 139 (1981); and Brookwood Hospital Management Corp., 252 NLRB No. 107 (1980). An appellate court reviewing an agency decision following an intervening change of policy should remand to permit the agency to decide in the first instance whether it should reframe its order to better effectuate the policies underlying the Act it is charged with administering. NLRB v. Food Store Employees, supra, at p. 10, 94 S.Ct. at p., 2080. In this connection we note our disagreement with the Board's view that the "community of interests" test and the "disparity of interests" test are essentially identical. It is not the similarity of employees' training, hours, conditions and activities which determine the appropriateness of the Unit. It is, rather, the dissimilarity of interests relevant to the collective bargaining process that determines which employees are not to be included in a proposed unit. The proper approach is to begin with a broad proposed unit and then exclude employees with disparate interests. One should not start with a narrow unit, such as registered nurses, and then add professionals with similar interests.

NLRB v. Boston Beef Co., Inc.

652 F.2d 223 (1st Cir.), July 9, 1981—252 NLRB 711

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Coffin, Chief Judge, Bownes, Circuit Judge, Mazzone, District Judge*

224

Mazzone, District Judge: This case is before us upon application of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) under section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act), 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), for enforcement of its order issued against the Employer, Boston Beef Co., Inc., on September 30, 1980, and reported at 252 N.L.R.B. No. 101. The Board ordered Boston Beef to cease and desist from violating sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (a)(5), bargain with the Union,[1] and post appropriate notices.

I.

The action arises out of a representation election involving certain employees of Boston Beef, a wholesale meat distributor located in Worcester, Massachusetts. On October 18, 1979, the Union filed a representation petition with the Board's Regional Office in Boston, seeking certification as the collective bargaining representative of employees at the Employer's plant. On November 6, 1979, the Union and the Employer entered into a stipulation for certification upon consent election, authorizing a representation election in a unit consisting of the following employees:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees including drivers, loaders, shippers, receivers, packers, maintenance employees, shipping clerks, head shippers, head receivers and plant clericals of the Employer's plant located at Lafayette and Franklin Streets, Worcester, Massachusetts, but excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Acting Regional Director approved this stipulation on November 15, 1979.

In the election, which was held December 5, 1979, fifteen votes were cast in favor of the Union and twelve against it. In addition, there were four challenged ballots, a sufficient number to have potentially affected the outcome of the election. Only one of the challenged ballots, however, that of Thomas Westerberg, is at issue here.[2] The Union challenged Westerberg's ballot on the ground that he was a "casual" rather than a "regular part-time" employee as provided in the stipulation, and therefore not entitled to vote in the representation election.

---

*Of the District Court of Massachusetts, sitting by designation.

[1] Local No. 170, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America.

[2] The Board sustained a challenge to the ballot of one employee on the ground that he was no longer employed by Boston Beef. The Employer does not challenge that determination. The Board did not rule on the Union's two other challenges pending determination of this case because they would only become critical if we reversed and an evidentiary hearing would be necessary to resolve them.

The Regional Director recommended that the Board sustain the challenge to Westerberg's ballot. A three member panel agreed, and on May 19, 1980, the Board certified the Union as the exclusive representative of employees in the stipulated unit.

Thereafter, the Employer refused to bargain with the Union, claiming that the Board incorrectly excluded Westerberg from the relevant bargaining unit. The Union filed unfair labor practice charges, and on June 30, 1980, the Regional Director issued a complaint. On August 29, 1980, the Board transferred the case to itself and, in the order issued September 30, 1980, granted the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment. The Board held that the Employer's refusal to bargain with the Union violated sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the Act, and ordered the remedial actions outlined above.

II.

The facts underlying this controversy are not materially disputed. Thomas Westerberg began working for Boston Beef in June, 1979. During the summer, he worked an average of three nights a week, eight hours per night, loading trucks. At the end of the summer, Westerberg was laid off and returned to complete his final year of high school.

Westerberg was rehired in October, 1979, to do "display work" for the Employer at certain supermarkets in which Boston Beef had previously agreed to maintain display coolers for its products. He replaced another employee who left the respondent's employ due to illness. The display work involved replacement of old stock and rotation of Boston Beef products in the display coolers. Identical work is performed at other supermarkets by Westerberg's father, a full-time salesman for Boston Beef.[3]

Westerberg spent approximately five hours a week doing display work, and was paid a flat rate of fifty dollars per week. While performing this work, Westerberg did not spend time on the Employer's premises, and had no contact with unit employees. The record indicates that if Westerberg had any questions concerning his display work, he asked his father for assistance.

On November 1, 1979, some five weeks before the election, Westerberg began unloading trucks at the Employer's beef division on Thursday nights. Each week, Westerberg's father inquired as to whether sufficient work were available for his son on the upcoming Thursday night shift. Westerberg was not required to work Thursday nights, nor was he penalized for failing to appear for work. In fact, during the five weeks prior to the election, Westerberg worked only three Thursday nights. On the remaining Thursday nights, Westerberg did not work because of a conflict with his participation in his high school football program. When Westerberg did work the Thursday night shift, he generally worked for three hours and was paid by the hour.

He worked alongside unit employees, took the same breaks, and had the same supervision.

On these facts, the Regional Director and the Board concluded that Westerberg was not a "regular part-time" employee, and was therefore excluded from the relevant bargaining unit.

III.

The Employer concedes, and we conclude, that the Board's order should be enforced if it properly substained the Union's challenge to Westerberg's ballot. Summa Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 625 F.2d 293, 295 (9th Cir. 1980). Our standard of review is restricted to an analysis of whether the Board abused its discretion in sustaining the challenge and certifying the election. N.L.R.B. v. New England Lithographic Co., Inc., 589 F.2d 29, 31 (1st Cir. 1978), quoting N.L.R.B. v. S. Prawer & Co., 584 F.2d 1099, 1101 (1st Cir. 1978).

The Employer first contends that the Board erroneously applied a "community of interest" test in determining that Westerberg was not a regular part-time employee. The community of interest standard is one traditionally relied on by the Board in determining whether an individual employee or job classification should be included in a particular collective bargaining unit. The test includes a consideration of whether the employee works at regularly assigned hours a substantial number of hours per week; performs duties similar to those of unit employees; and shares the same supervision, working conditions, wages, and fringe benefits as the unit employees. See Westchester Plastics of Ohio, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 401 F.2d 903, 907–08 (6th Cir.

[3] It is undisputed that the Union and the Employer intended to exclude salesmen from the relevant bargaining unit.

1968). Boston Beef concedes that application of these principles is appropriate where the Board determines the appropriate bargaining unit in the first instance. However, it argues that community of interest principles are inapplicable where the Union and Employer have agreed upon a definition of the relevant unit prior to the election. In such cases, the Employer contends, the Board's only function is to ascertain the intent of the parties. See The Tribune Company, 190 N.L.R.B. 398 (1971). The Board may not rely upon community of interest principles to override a clear expression of the parties' intent. Tidewater Oil Company v. N.L.R.B., 358 F.2d 363, 366 (2d Cir. 1966).

The Board contends that the phrase "regular part-time employees" is a phrase of art in the field of labor law. By including the phrase in this stipulation, it argues, the parties manifested their intent to resolve any dispute concerning unit membership according to the Board's established principles for determining "regular part-time" status, which includes a consideration of community of interest principles.

Although there is some support for the Board's contention that the phrase "regular part-time" employees has an established meaning in the labor context, see, e. g., N.L.R.B. v. Sandy's Stores, Inc., 398 F.2d 268, 272 (1st Cir. 1968), we think the record in this case is unclear on the meaning the parties intended to give the phrase. More precisely, in view of his rather unique employment status, it is unclear whether the parties intended to include Westerberg in the category of "regular part-time employees" at the time the stipulation was drafted.

Under these circumstances, however, resort to the community of interest principles was nevertheless appropriate. While concededly the Board may not rely upon the community of interest test to subvert the clear intent of the parties, where the intent is unclear or the stipulation ambiguous the Board may properly rely upon community of interest principles to help resolve the ambiguity. N.L.R.B. v. Mercy College, 536 F.2d 544, 548 at n. 11 (2d Cir. 1976); Knapp-Sherrill Co. v. N.L.R.B., 488 F.2d 655, 659–60 (5th Cir.) cert. denied, 419 U.S. 829, 95 S.Ct. 50, 42 L.Ed.2d 53 (1974); see New England Lumber v. N.L.R.B., 646 F.2d 1, 3 (1st Cir. 1981). Accordingly, we find no error in the Board's use of the community of interest test in determining whether Westerberg should have been considered a regular part-time employee.

IV.

Turning to the Board's substantive conclusion, the Employer argues that the Board abused its discretion in concluding that Westerberg was not a regular part-time employee. Concededly, there are facts in the record which arguably support the Employer's position, notably the fact that Westerberg's employment was not limited to a fixed period, and the fact that his working conditions during the Thursday night shift were substantially identical to those of the unit employees.

The Board has frequently attempted to define the circumstances under which student employees will be considered regular part-time employees. Our review of the cases indicates that the Board has often reached opposite conclusions on the basis of seemingly minor factual differences. Compare San Francisco Art Institute, 236 N.L.R.B. 1252 (1976); Highview, Inc., 223 N.L.R.B. 646, 649 (1976); enforced in pert. part, 590 F.2d 174, modified, 595 F.2d 339 (5th Cir. 1979); Pawating Hospital Association, 222 N.L.R.B. 672, 672–73 (1976); and California Inspection Rating Bureau, 215 N.L.R.B. 780, 782–83 (1974) (part-time students excluded from units which included, inter alia, regular part-time employees) with Dick Kelchner Excavating Co., 236 N.L.R.B. 1414, 1415 (1978); Femco Machine Co., 238 N.L.R.B. 816, 826 (1978); Hearst Corp., San Antonio Light Division, 221 N.L.R.B. 324 (1975); Serv-U-Stores, Inc., 225 N.L.R.B. 37, 39 (1976); and Dee Knitting Mills, Inc., 214 N.L.R.B. 1041, 1048–49, enforced, 538 F.2d 312 (2d Cir. 1975) (students regarded as regular part-time employees). While concededly, the Board's application of the community of interest standard in this context has not always been a model of consistency, see generally, Malin, Student Employees and Collective Bargaining, 69 Ky.L.J. 1, 5–15 (1980), we are especially reluctant to substitute our judgment for that of the Board on an issue, such as this, where the Board possesses significant expertise and minor factual differences are so important, so long as there is substantial evidence to support the Board's conclusion.

In this case there is ample support in the record for the Board's conclusion that Westerberg did not share a community of interest in wages, hours, and working conditions with the remaining unit employees, and thus was properly not regarded as a regular part-time employee. To begin with, Westerberg's display work was performed at a geographically remote location, under the general supervision of his father, a nonunit employee. He was paid a flat weekly salarly, as opposed to an hourly wage, for the display work. While performing the display work Westerberg had no contact with unit employees.[4]

Turning to the Thursday night work, the Board could reasonably have placed great reliance upon the small number of hours Westerberg spent engaged in that work; the fact that he was not required to work Thursday nights and was not penalized in any way for failing to work; and the fact that he skipped work two out of the five weeks immediately preceding the election, in order to participate in his high school's football program. Compare Sandy's Stores, 398 F.2d at 273 (reversing the Board's finding of regular part-time status where employee, a high school student, worked only one day a week and missed work twenty per cent of the time).

Having found substantial evidence in the record to support the Board's conclusion that Westerberg was a casual rather than a regular part-time employee, and therefore properly excluded from the relevent bargaining unit, we affirm the Board's finding that the employer's refusal to bargain constituted an unfair labor practice and enforce its September 30, 1980 order in its entirety.

Enforcement granted.

[4] The Employer attempted, in its brief and at oral argument, to characterize Westerberg's display work as being similar to the Thursday night loading work. The record clearly indicates significant differences in almost every aspect of the two jobs.

NLRB v. Keystone Steel & Wire Division of Keystone Consolidated Industries, Inc.

653 F.2d 304 (7th Cir.), July 9, 1981—248 NLRB 283

On petition to review and cross petition for enforcement

Before SWYGERT, Senior Circuit Judge,* SPRECHER, Circuit Judge, and WYATT, Senior District Judge

305

SPRECHER, Circuit Judge. In earlier proceedings, the National Labor Relations Board ("Board") found, and this court affirmed, that Keystone Steel and Wire, Division of Keystone Consolidated Industries, Inc. ("Company") had violated section 8(a)(1), 8(a)(5), and 8(d)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act ("Act"), 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), 158(a)(5), and 158(d)(30, by unilaterally changing a term and condition of employment covered by a collective bargaining agreement in force between the Company and the Independent Steelworkers' Alliance ("Union"). But although this court affirmed the Board's finding of an unfair labor practice, we found that the Board's remedial order was too broad. We remanded the case to the Board for issuance of a more limited order. The Board has now issued a new order. The Company challenges the supplemental order as again being too broad. Rejecting the Company's argument, we order enforcement of the supplemental order.

I

The Company and the Union were parties to a collective bargaining agreement which provided, among other things, for a hospital, medical, and surgical benefit program administered by Blue Cross-Blue Shield ("Blue Cross"). The Company, without bargaining with the Union, and in the face of the Union's refusal to consent, discontinued the Blue Cross plan and implemented a hospital, medical, and surgical benefit program administered by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company ("Metropolitan"). The Board found that the Company's switch in health benefit packages amounted to a unilateral modification of a term and condition of employment which violated sections 8(a)(1), 8(a)(5) and 8(d) of the Act. Keystone Steel & Wire, 237 NLRB No. 91 (1978). The Board rejected the Company's argument that the switch in the health insurance plans was "merely" a switch in administrators, and held that the identity of the plan administrator was sufficiently related to the type, quality, and delivery of benefits to employees as to qualify as a mandatory subject of bargaining.

306

---

*At the time of oral argument, Judge Swygert was a circuit judge in active service; he assumed senior status on July 1, 1981.

Honorable Inzer B. Wyatt, Senior District Judge for the Southern District of New York, is setting by designation.

The Board ordered a three-part remedy. First, it ordered the Company to cease and desist from refusing to bargain regarding the administrator of the health care program. Second, the Board ordered the Company to cease and desist from any "like or related" unfair labor practice and from "otherwise refusing to bargain collectively in good faith" with the Union. Third, it ordered the Company to reinstate Blue Cross as the program administrator, if the Union requested such reinstatement, and to post the appropriate notice.

On review by this court, we affirmed the Board's conclusion that the switch of the health benefits programs is mandatory subject of bargaining. Keystone Steel & Wire v. NLRB, 606 F.2d 171, 179 (7th Cir. 1979) ("Keystone I"). Rejecting the company's argument that its action merely changed administrators, not benefits, we concluded that its action not only changed administrators but also "brought other changes which have a material and significant effect or impact upon the terms and conditions of employment." Id. Among the effects of the program change were the loss of a labor consultant to help with claims problems and the establishment of a lower payment allowance for certain medical or surgical procedures. Id. Thus, we affirmed the Board's finding of an unfair labor practice.

We concluded that the Board's remedy, however, was overly broad and seemed heavy-handed. Id. at 180. Specifically, we rejected a requirement that, upon request, Blue Cross be reinstated as the program administrator, because the parties had conceded that Blue Cross would have been unable to provide the program for all of the Company's divisions across the country. Id. We thus remanded the case to the Board for a more limited remedy.

Now, the Board has issued a supplemental remedial order having several aspects. Keystone Steel & Wire, 248 NLRB No. 40 (1980). First, the Company must restore all benefits and services that were eliminated by the switch to Metropolitan. Second, the Company may not revoke or lessen any benefits currently enjoyed under the Metropolitan plan. Third, the Company must "make whole" any employees for any losses caused by the switch. Finally, the company must post the appropriate notices. To implement the requirement that benefits and services be restored, the Board ordered two specific corrective measures:

> (a) Utilization of the same geographical areas used by Blue Cross/Blue Shield for determining its usual and customary charges, or, in the alternative, payment of at least the same level of usual and customary benefits as Blue Cross/Blue Shield.
> (b) Provision of a "labor consultant" to handle the health insurance claims of unit employees.

248 NLRB No. 40 at 4. The Board emphasized that the Company's restoration obligations were not limited to just these measures.

The Company now challenges this supplemental order as being too broad; the Board applies for enforcement. We reject the Company's arguments and enforce the Board's order.

II

We begin with a review of the Board's power to fashion remedies for violations of the Act. Section 10(c) of the Act empowers the Board, upon finding that an unfair labor practice has been committed, to correct the effects of the unfair labor practice by requiring the violator "to take such affirmative action * * * as will effectuate the policies" of the Act. 29 U.S.C. § 160(c). The Board's power to fashion remedies is broad and discretionary, subject to limit judicial review. As the Supreme Court stated in Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct 398, 405, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964):

> "[T]he relation of remedy to policy is peculiarly a matter for administrative competence * * * ." * * * "In fashioning remedies to undo the effects of violations of the Act, the Board must draw on enlightenment gained from experience." * * * . The Board's order will not be disturbed "unless it can be shown that the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other then those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act."

(citations omitted).

In developing remedies for specific situations, the Board, drawing on its expertise in industrial relations, must attempt to create "a restoration of the situation, as nearly as possible, to that which would have obtained" but for the unfair labor practices. Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 194, 61

S.Ct. 845, 852, 85 L.Ed. 1271 (1941). The Board's choice of remedies to effectuate the policies of the Act is "peculiarly a matter for administrative competence." Id. In reviewing the Board's remedies, "courts must not enter the allowable area of athe Board's discretion and must guard against the danger of sliding unconsciously from the narrow confines of law into the more spacious domain of policy." Id. The Board's discretion to fashion remedies in not unfettered, however. The Board's remedies must be "calculated to effectuate a policy of the Act." NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 349, 73 S.Ct. 287, 290, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953), and must not be punitive, Local 60, United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. NLRB, 365 U.S. 651, 655, 81 S.Ct. 875, 877, 6 L.Ed.2d 1 (1961).

III

The first question, then, is whether the supplemental order does effectuate a policy of the Act. A major policy of the Act is to stabilize industrial relations by fostering collective bargaining agreements equally binding employers and unions. See, e.g., Textile Workers Union v. Lincoln Mills, 353 U.S. 448, 453–54, 77 S.Ct. 912, 916, 1 L.Ed.2d 972 (1957), and H. J. Heinz Co. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 514, 523–26, 61 S.Ct. 320, 324–25, 85 L.Ed. 309 (1941). Industrial stability depends, in part, upon the binding nature of collective bargaining agreements. Both employer and employee acceptance of any given agreement, and indeed, of the very concept of collective bargaining, depend upon a guarantee that their agreement will not be unilateraly altered. Applied to this case, which involves terms and conditions of employment, the policy behind the Act requires that no change in those terms and conditions be made without the express consent of the employees, through their union.

Where, as here, the employees' expectation for "no change without consent" is defeated by the unilateral action of the employer, the stability of the bargaining relationship is impaired. The likely effect of such instability is to create perceptions of unfairness and of union weakness.[1] The reaction to these perceptions may be increased militancy and labor unrest. Thus, we conclude that the Board's remedy here, correcting a unilateral change in a term or condition of employment,[2] is consistent with an important policy behind the Act.

The next question is whether the Board's supplemental orders is punitive or otherwise beyond the scope of the Board's authority. To determine the propriety of the supplemental order, we must consider it in light of the defect in the original order. In Keystone I, this court found the unilateral change of program, administrators to be an unfair labor practice because the Union did not consent to the change. Although the Metropolitan progream offered some additional benefits, it also caused the loss of a labor consultant and it provided lower benefits for some medical procedures. We found the order requiring reinstatement of Blue Cross to be too broad, but suggested that an order requireing the Company to correct detrimental differences would be more appropriate. Keystone I, 606 F.2d at 180. The supplemental order complies precisely with our suggestion. The supplementary order no longer requires reinstatement of Blue Cross, but requires the Company to restore all benefits enjoyed by the employees before the change in administrators, including the labor consultant and any health benefits reduced by the change. The supplemental order also directs the company to "make whole" any employees who sustained any monetary losses as a result of the Company's action.

Not only is the Board's supplemental order fully encompassed within the scope of our remand, but it is also consistent with precedent. The Board's order here is a traditional "make whole" order which this court and others typically have upheld in unlawful unilateral change cases where the orders provide both for restoration of working conditions or benefits improperly denied and for monetary compensation for any losses sustained. See, e.g., Fibreboard, 379 U.S. at 215–17, 85 S.Ct. at 405–06; Davis v. NLRB, 617 F.2d 1264, 1273 (7th Cir. 1980); Zim's Foodliner, Inc. v. NLRB, 495 F.2d 1131, 1144 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 838, 95

[1] Cf. NLRB v. C & C Plywood Corp., 385 U.S. 421, 429 n. 15, 87 S.Ct. 559, 564 n.15, 17 L.Ed.2d 486 (1967) ("For the real injury in this case is to the union's status as bargaining representative * * *. ").

[2] As in our previous decision, Keystone I, 606 F.2d at 179, we should not, and do not, consider the merits of the Company's action. That the Metropolitan plan offers some additional benefits to employees is irrelevant. The relevant fact is that the Union never consented to the change.
